We have before us a copy of the constitution and by-laws of the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance. The constitution outlines a broad and substantial platform. It was right and proper that everyone should be invited to join. But unless a fitting penalty is provided for a violator of the constitution and by-laws, even to making it impossible for him to continue in the business, the Alliance will fall short of fulfilling its mission. One section of the constitution provides for giving legal protection to members out of the common fund. Some of the members take decided objection to this clause. Suppose that an Alliance manufacturer should be sued by the Patents Company, and, after wasting all the money of the Alliance members in litigation, without a decision having been arrived at, what is to prevent this Alliance member accepting a license to manufacture and market under the Patents Company? What do the other Alliance members gain who have subscribed to the fund?

The Modern Moving Picture Theatre.

Chapter VII.

Advertising the Theater.

The other evening our attention was drawn to a boardman carrying the printed advertisement of a moving picture theater. This was in the neighborhood of Harlem, and it started in our mind the idea, or rather the question, of how best to advertise the moving picture theater. Of course, in the downtown sections of a great city, where many picture theaters cluster pretty closely, they advertise themselves. Take Fourteenth street, New York City, for example. These houses chiefly rely upon the enormous stream of pedestrians constantly passing at all hours of the day. So, in a measure, with Eighth avenue and 125th street. In these cases there is no necessity for other advertising than that which is done by means of electric signs and posters.

But not all theaters are situated in these centers. They are dotted about in all corners of the city. They are to be found in out-of-the-way and most unexpected places. Only the other evening we ran across two theaters situated on a main thoroughfare, the existence of which we have never previously heard. But they were doing good business, nevertheless.

It is the outlying theater which is not known to the generality of the surrounding inhabitants which stands in need of advertising other than on its facade. In cases like this the boardman is a very effective means of drawing attention to the theater. But there are other devices open. There is the distribution of handbills, the display of posters in the various stores, and advertising through the mail.

The latter, though an expensive form of advertising, is, in a manner, the best. Cheap and tastefully gotten up booklets containing effective reading matter and well-shown illustrations, are permanent advertisements in the home. The owner of a high class theater might do worse than obtain a mailing list of all the best families in his immediate neighborhood, and send them a well compiled illustrative booklet descanting on the value of the moving picture in modern entertainment, drawing attention to the excellence of the pictures which he shows at his house; the sanitation, the safety, the comfort and the other attractions of the house should also be set forth.

Some moving picture theaters, especially those situated remotely from New York, systematically issue broad sheets descriptive of the films, and containing news items, advertisements of their pictures, and the like. This sort of thing draws attention to the theater and keeps it constantly in the minds of possible audiences. Then press notices in local papers are always easily to be had and form good reading matter. Wherever possible, the moving picture theater exhibitor should constitute himself his own press agent and keep his local editor well supplied with stories of the films. The stories of the films, as we know from repeated observation, supply attractive reading matter to a mass of people.

Of course, the very best possible advertisement the moving picture exhibitor can have is an excellent entertainment in a suitable hall. People who go there, if impressed, tell their friends, and so the nucleus of a constant patronage is built up. But it must never be overlooked that it is still the minority of the entertainment-seeking public that supports the moving picture theater. The great majority has to be won over. These people have never been to a moving picture theater. They look down upon it. Their prejudices have to be overcome, and the best way to overcome them is by judicious advertising upon the lines suggested. That advertising should not be intermittent; it should be constant, dignified, and effective. Conducted on such lines, it is tolerably certain to pay for itself.

Instigated by jealousy, no doubt, because the Film Import and Trading Company selected the Moving Picture World as the best medium in which to make their announcements to the trade, certain people have circulated the ridiculous report that the F. I. & T. Co. own or control this paper. It so happens that we are next-door neighbors but there is no closer bond of unity, and, if the truth were known, we made less advances for the patronage than some of our contemporaries. We hold no brief to exploit the cause of the F. I. & T. Co. They send us their advertising copy and they pay their bills promptly. They ask for and get no other favors than an impartial review of their pictures. Their policy as at first outlined to us we agreed with. Their business methods in carrying out that policy we have never sustained. That is their own affair. What we are interested in seeing is that the very best pictures that the whole world produces are exhibited to the American public and that the film business is conducted on clean and business-like lines. If the Film Import Company attempt to market pictures that in our opinion lower the standard or fall down in any other respect, the Moving Picture World will be the first to jump on them, irrespective of advertising patronage.

WHAT BECOMES OF LICENSED FILMS WHEN THE EXHIBITOR AND THE EXCHANGE MAN ARE DONE WITH THEM?—Foolish persons on the Independent side have not scrupled to allege that these films are again sent out to do duty in moving picture theaters. In other words, that the licensed manufacturers are not loyal to their exchanges and exhibitors. It is time that this absurd rumor was disposed of once and for all. The other day we were present in the manufactory of a well-known licensed film manufacturer, when we were taken into one of the rooms where an employee was working. Before him was a pile of returned films which he was busily destroying, by means of a saw, preparatory to the final disintegration of the pictures. We were assured that all the films were treated in a similar way; that is, at the expiration of the stipulated period of their life, they were put out of existence so that there is no risk of them ever findiing their way into circulation again. We think the fact should be known that in respect of this matter of the destruction of films, the licensed manufacturers are scrupulously keeping to the letter of their agreement amongst themselves and with the exchanges and exhibitors.

N. I. STOCK SHOULD BE SO MARKED.

The writer would like to suggest, in all meekness of spirit, to the makers of N. I. film, that there should be some unmistakable distinguishing mark thereon—some mark by which the operator could readily distinguish this stock from the ordinary inflammable stock. As matter stand now, so far as the writer is aware, there is no method of telling which is which except by close examination, or an actual test. This is no serious drawback, but it would be very much better the other way allee samee. The writer believes that makers owe it to the operator, the manager and the public to plainly mark N. I. stock. The designation "Non-inflammable" could be printed along one margin even as one maker now prints his name on the margin.

At Keith & Proctor's Bijou Dream awestruck crowds are spellbound by the magnificent 2,000-foot presentation of Zola's powerful drama, "Drink." It is hardly possible to imagine a more convincing moral lesson than this Pathe film in which the art of the actor is seen at its best. It is the film of the week and for many weeks to come.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

CHAPTER XXII.

Seating.

So far as price goes a theater may be seated with opera chairs costing from as low as $1.25 each to as high as one wishes to go, a very comfortable, substantial seat being available at about $1.40 each. Upholstered seats are not desirable in moving picture theaters from any point of view. They would be a distinct disadvantage any way one might look at it. The audience remains seated such a comparatively short time that the non-upholstered seat, provided it be properly made, is perfectly comfortable and in Summer it is much cooler also. Second-hand chairs are often available at very low figure, but you should either see them or have a guarantee in writing as to their size, condition, etc., with privilege of examination before paying if shipped from a distance. Theater seats should always have a wire hat holder beneath the seat and on the back of each seat should be affixed a very small ring or staple through which the ladies may thrust a hatpin to hold their headgear instead of being obliged to hold them in their laps. Two small staples, one one-half inch above the other, are best. You will probably have to throw a slide on the screen calling attention to the arrangement until the ladies become accustomed to it. You will find it will be highly appreciated by ladies who remove their hats. Advertisements in The Moving Picture World will put you in touch with manufacturers of theater seats who will send prices, descriptions and illustrations of the various style seats.

One very essential and important feature in seating is to utilize all available space, but at the same time not get the rows so close together that the user will experience discomfort. The requirements of Chicago will serve as a safe guide in this respect. It is as follows: 32 inches from chair back to chair back. Chicago law is good to follow in the matter of aisles also. It calls for aisles 3 feet wide if more than one and 4 feet if but one. Taking the above as a basis to measure seating capacity of a room, proceed as follows: Measure from the stage to the point you wish to locate your front row of seats. From this point measure to the point where the rear of your last row of seats will be. Multiply this measurement by 12, to reduce to inches, and divide by 32. The last result will be the number of rows. Next measure the width of the room and subtract width of the aisle, or combined width of all aisles if more than one. Multiply remainder by 12, to reduce to inches, and divide the result by width of chair you propose using, which may be 18, 19 or 20 inches. Next multiply the number of rows by the number of seats per row and the result is the seating capacity of your room. Of course if length of all rows is not the same you will have to subtract the deficiency of short rows or else measure all rows separately, adding all together and dividing by chair width. Theaters having curved rows will undoubtedly have an architect's floor plan to figure from. All theaters should have a sloped floor. The day of the flat floor is past. Such a house is hopelessly out of date and behind the times. What this slope will be will necessarily depend somewhat on how much you are able to get if the installation be in a building already erected. All the slope you can get up to the point where the rows of chairs must be on steps is an advantage. The best floor slope result the writer has seen is a newly constructed Chicago moving picture theater. The floor is of cement and the slope is about 5 feet in 50. There are two ways of getting a slope in an old flat floor room, viz.: Build an incline on top of the old floor or drop the front end of the old floor down into the basement. The latter is much the best where it can be done. The first named plan has the disadvantage of requiring a slope from the entrance up to the new floor level. Never use steps for this, since in case of panic people would certainly pile up on them and many be injured or killed. They are not likely, however, to fall on an incline, even though it be quite steep, especially if it be carpeted with heavy coarse matting, securely nailed down.

As regards seating plans, I think it would be somewhat a waste of space to elaborate upon them. The main thing is to have no long rows of seats unbroken by an aisle, and so arrange your exit, which in all cases should be entirely separate from the entrance, so that there will be the least possible congestion when the crowds are passing out. It is by far the best, where it can be so arranged, to have the exit at the opposite end of the house from the entrance. This is in some cases possible where there is an ample passage between the theater building and the next adjoining, provided it be not a public alley. This plan relieves all congestion caused by interference between people coming in and those passing out. In ordinary storeroom theaters the central aisle plan is almost invariably the best. Where it is practicable to have a center aisle and one at either side, it is a most excellent plan to use the center aisle exclusively for persons passing out, the incoming ones being steered into the side aisles, none being allowed to enter the center aisle. As the people usually do not come in in big bunches, the side aisles, where this plan is adopted, may be comparatively narrow. Where there are long rows of seats unbroken by an aisle, it is dangerous in case of panic; also it is annoying to patrons, in that late comers have to crowd past many seats to reach center seats in the row. In picture theaters, the further the front row of seats is from the curtain, the better, since when one is very close to the curtain, all sense of perspective is lost; moreover, the picture is little more than a blur. It is much the best to locate the piano in a pit in the center under the curtain or stage front, since the piano player then has a constant view of the picture without effort. This is essential, if he or she is to produce the best results in following the film action with music. Carpet all aisles with heavy matting or linoleum. The sound of people walking on the bare floor is very annoying to an audience. The curtain should be at such height, if possible, that the head of a man standing at the front row of seats will not interfere in the picture. As regards picture size, there is no rule. It depends on the house entirely. But it may be said that the picture should, if possible, be at least ten feet wide. A picture twelve feet wide is called life size from the fact that in this size there are a greater percentage of life-size figures than in any other. From twelve to fourteen feet in width usually makes the best appearing picture. Unless it is absolutely necessary, do not throw the top of the picture clear up to the ceiling. It does not look so well as when there is a margin of from six inches to two feet. After all other cleaning is done for the day, every seat should be carefully dusted. There is nothing more annoying to a lady in a light-colored dress than to find her costume soiled by a dusty theater seat. It amounts to an outrage.

Music.

Music is a matter of greater importance than many moving picture theater managers seem to imagine. Get a good piano player, who can read any music at sight and make him or her attend strictly to business. Pay a salary which will justify you in demanding the best work and then see to it that your player makes good. A piano player who cannot read music at sight has no rightful place in a moving picture theater, especially if illustrated songs are run. But the song is a comparatively small matter. Always and invariably the piano player can help out a film wonderfully if he or she wants to and knows how. Often and often have I entered a theater while the film was running and seen the piano player industriously engaged in talking to a friend, dividing her attention impartially between the friend and a wad of gum. He or she would have got busy or been fired in just one minute had I been managing that house. The piano player should have a wide range of "know it by heart" music; should watch the picture closely and play suitable music, with due attention to producing as many of the noises as is practical with that instrument. There is no reason, where a drummer cannot be employed, why an auto horn, a chime bell and a whistle cannot be manipulated by the piano player. They can easily be attached to the instrument within easy reach, and such things help. A piano player can do much if he or she wants to and mighty little if he or she don't want to and don't have to. Of course you will have to pay more for good service, but it pays to do it.

Where the house has seating capacity to justify there should always be a drummer. But get a good one. A good drummer can perform wonders in adding to the effectiveness of a film, but a poor one is worse than none. The up-to-date moving picture theater drummer has contrivances for imitating almost any sound and he knows how to use them, too. It may be safely said that any 300 capacity house which has available capacity business should have a drummer and piano player. More need not be added except in large houses. I feel that I cannot impress too strongly on managers the advisability of getting all you can out of the available music.

Mr. R. Prieur, American agent for Lux films, is back again in New York and is making direct connections with Independent exchanges. He may be addressed at the Broadway Central Hotel.

Film Renters as a Class.

An exhibitor writes asking if in our experience we find the veracity and reliability of film renters compares, on the average, with men in mercantile circles. There is some humor in this question. Some may call it sarcasm. There are good film renters, bad ones, and darned bad ones. It has not been our privilege to strike an average. We know some who really try to conduct their business on a fair and square basis and endeavor to live up to the letter of their contracts with the exhibitors. Others spend most of their time in figuring on the number of loopholes in the contracts. Another class sail along on the theory that it is foolish to live up to a contract because the other fellow never intended to do so. There are some renters who never make written contracts with their customers. They observe a verbal agreement with the same fidelity that they would their bond. Many of these renters hold customers for years and have been known to make good exhibitors out of some who have put many a thorn into the sides of other renters. These men do not give short weights, put water in the milk, or sell cotton for wool. And they are not few in number, either. Yes, we know of several, but we do not wish at this time to indulge in flattery. One thing is certain, many good renters are either spoiled or led from the narrow path by exhibitors. As a rule the latter look upon the renter as a "con artist." He is looked upon with suspicion from first to last, and gradually the renter becomes tired of or disgusted with his own rectitude, until at last the exhibitor is stung. The trouble lies in the false impression that the moving picture business is not a legitimate one. It is just as much so as the real estate, banking or commercial lines, but somehow there are too many who cannot see it that way. This is due to certain peculiarities. The exchange men greet each other most cordially and wine and dine together in the heartiest spirit of brotherly love, but crawl under the table and you will find a good-sized club within easy reach under each chair. These men admire each other, but take no chances with brain storms. Then look at the renter and exhibitor: see the cordial greeting the latter receives when he enters the exchange for the first time, and listen to the yards of advice he receivs gratis on how to manage his show successfully. And see how the exhibitor behaves. His looks indicate that he has found a great benefactor, that the paternal solicitude evinced by the renter will put him on the highway to prosperity. It is a perfect picture of legitimate business, and as they part eternal vigilance for mutual welfare is pledged. Only the experienced observer knows that the exhibitor looks upon the renter as a highbinder and the renter looks upon the exhibitor as the makings of a first-class chicken thief. Each has been palavering for the best end of the deal. But who shall say it is not business? Just as much—and legitimately—as transactions we see in the real estate exchanges every day, or the financial circles. But the lack of confidence in each other unfortunately keeps the business from ranking with the higher spheres of commercial circles, where more of the man to man spirit prevails. This lack of confidence is so deep-rooted that we know of some men who are brothers by birth and will not deal with each other. The main thought of most exhibitors is to get the most for the money, and the first move on the part of most renters is to find out how much the exhibitors know about the business. There is the issue as framed, and each goes in for a checkmate. Experiences related at a gathering of film renters recently indicated that the exhibitors who know too much fare as badly as those who know little; that the middleman who has a line on the business and is open to conviction generally gets the best run for his money. This is in all probability quite true. The fellow who enters upon an enterprise in entire ignorance of its bearings in almost every case knows he can only profit by experience. The fellow who knows it all is frequently trapped by his own over-confidence. Yes, there is a pretty fair average of veracity and responsibility among the film renters (and the exhibitors), all conditions being equal.

Colchester, Ill.—William Dickerson & Son have opened a new moving picture show in the Moore Building.

Clear Lake, Ia.—A. R. Martin has purchased the Jewell Motion Picture Theater here and has taken possession.

Chillicothe, Ill.—J. F. Lynch has sold his Orpheum Theater, at Henry, to the Dreamland Company.

Wilmington, Del.—A. Hirschman has opened a new moving picture theater at 117 Market street. It will be known as the Palace.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

It seems to be as unpleasant to hold a prominent position in the motion picture world as it is to hold public office; at least, one job seems to be fully as thankless as the other, and it evidently makes no difference whether the prominent picture man is on the licensed side, or with the independents This is a cold, ungrateful world! When Mr. Dwight McDonald, who is now buried in the volumes of his law library and apparently wholly forgotten by the "change every day" man, was the active, if not the leading star of the licensed moving picture forces, he was at the same time the chief target in the shooting gallery of public opinion as reflected by the exhibitors and exchange owners. If Mr. McDonald was actually shot at as he was in a figurative sense he would have been so full of holes when he retired to his fee-earning hive that his appearance would have suggested an exaggerated porous plaster to his friends. Now Mr. J. J. Murdock, the active figurehead of the independents, is going over the same route. A few months ago he was heralded and lauded as the modern Savior. He was pictured as healing the lame and the blind; the St. George that could alone give the dragon of oppression the proper solar-plexus treatment; the only leader of the leaders; and now as he leaves these shores to transact business in lands where film manufacturers are as thick as flies about a molasses barrel we see bunches of the most unkind sentiments hurled after his fast-receding figure. Since Mr. Murdock has left these shores we learn that he has been a four-flusher; that he has been as active and effective in his work in behalf of the independents as a fly that thoughtlessly lands on a well-prepared "made in Germany" piece of fly-paper. However much Messrs. McDonald and Murdock may have antagonized and disagreed with each other, it cannot be denied that in one respect at least they occupy the same berth —a bed of seeming ingratitude, or at least scant appreciation. But both gentlemen can find consolation in the thought that if the people appreciate the efforts of a man they almost invariably withhold an expression of their sentiments until after he is conveyed to his final resting place. Speaking conservatively and impartially, it cannot be claimed that either Mr. McDonald or Mr. Murdock accomplished anything outside of a routine character. Neither accomplished, either directly or indirectly, the smallest portion of the vital work their followers were led to believe they would. To be plain, in practical results, both men failed to score. At the same time, both must be credited with having worked earnestly, persistently and relentlessly in behalf of their followers; but all their energy has been exerted at a period when the establishment of routine monopolized attention. They were pitted against each other as Gen. Grant and Gen. Lee, but they did not have the advantage of a real battle in which to display their generalship, and they probably never will. Mr. McDonald has retired to his field of law practice and no longer holds the reins as leader of the licensed forces. If Mr. Murdock has completed his work of systematizing, he may have a chance to show his generalship now that he has returned to our shores. Meantime, both the licensed and the independent people are impatiently waiting to see something practical accomplished.

The writer dropped into a licensed film exchange the other day when the owner was entertaining another licensed exchange man. I remarked that the Patents Company was showing signs of life by revoking licenses of exhibitors that were sub-renting or exhibiting unlicensed films, two very serious infractions of the Patents Company contracts. "Yes," said one of the exchange men, "there does seem to be some sign of life, but not of the nature that partakes of the robust. I have here three postal cards that tell me the licenses of as many exhibitors have been revoked. Let me see; yes, one exhibitor is located in Indian Territory, another in Dakota, and the third somewhere in Arizona. I have been pestered almost to death by complaints of my customers that exhibitors next door, opposite and all about them are exhibiting both licensed and independent films, but I can now show them that steps are being taken to stop this, and some time between the present and the months of the year 1920 these double-dealers will be pounced upon and have their licenses taken from them."

"Surely, you do not intend to have me believe that the only places affected are those located at great distances," the writer ventured.

"Oh, no; not exactly; but the ratio is practically the same. If my memory serves me, about half a dozen licenses have been cancelled in Brooklyn and an equal number in New York, but as about a third of these places were open-air shows I fail to see the true effect. I cannot recall that any licenses have been revoked in New Jersey. Now there is the place. That New Jersey is certainly the king pin of the moving picture alley. I don't know whether it is due to the law or the climate, but you can take it from me that the New Jersey exhibitors care as much about licenses as the mosquitos do about a slap on the wrist. I have a customer in Newark, and upon learning that he was giving the use of the films he was renting from me to four or five other exhibitors, I notified him that unless he stopped doing that I would stop his service and have his license cancelled. What do you think he said? With the most tantalizing smile, he replied, 'Quit your kidding.' Well, he got my goat with such a strong hold that I stopped his service, and what do you think? My friend, sitting here, is now serving him and getting more money from him than I got. Can you beat it?"

"Is sub-renting openly done in Newark?" the writer asked with assumed surprise.

"It's the baldest city of the Union," was the answer. "Paterson is the home of the anarchists, they say, but, Oh, you Newark for the moving picture deals!"

The writer followed the cue and personally confirmed the situation. The position is simply this: There are numbers of exhibitors in Newark and other towns who do not care a rap for the Patents Company or its regulations. If a licensed exchange draws the line on sub-renting or the use of both licensed and independent films, the exhibitor, like the Arab, folds his tent and silently steals away to some other exchange, and if service cannot be secured from a licensed place, then he goes to a place where "all kinds can be had"—"the old curiosity shops," some of the exhibitors call them, because, they say, you can get anything you want.

Here is a story the writer heard the other day. It is the more interesting because it is based upon facts and it forms one of the solutions of the mystery as to how some of the independent exchanges secure the use of up-to-date licensed films. An exhibitor sends his operator to a licensed exchange for his daily supply of films—say, three reels. After securing them, the operator goes to an independent exchange and secures a reel, in return for which he gives that exchange one of the reels he secured from the licensed place. The next morning the operator goes to the independent house, returns the reel he borrowed, gets the licensed reel and returns it with the other two to the exchange with which his employer deals. For cleverly conceived schemes the moving picture business puts Wall street in the shade. The exhibitor beats the game without incriminating the licensed exchange.

Here is another story. An operator with a licensed reel and another with an independent reel board the same car. They become deeply interested in conversation, during which both lay the reels aside. Each grabs a reel hurriedly on leaving the car and neither has the reel he carried when they met. Through the mix-up the licensed man finds himself with an independent reel on hand, and vice-versa with the independent exhibitor. The exhibitors have no time to make a switch, because it is time for their shows to go on, so they must use the reels accident has brought to them. The next morning the reels are returned to the exchanges, the licensed place getting the independent films and the independent exchange getting the licensed film. Of course, explanations follow. The case being apparently one of excusable mistake, due to the thoughtlessness or stupidity of operators, the licensed and independent exchanges arrange over the telephone for the return of their respective reels. It is only recently that the trick was discovered. It is one that cannot be worked every day or too frequently, but it fits in very nicely where an independent exhibitor is anxious to secure a certain licensed reel and a licensed exhibitor has his eye on some particular independent film.

The comedy that marks some of the plays made by exhibitors is sufficient to dull the keenness that attends the rivalry and competition between the licensed and independent interests. It has been our privilege to be in the company of some of the leading lights of the licensed field when they have been irresistibly convulsed with laughter upon hearing recitals of some of the games played to beat their rules. At times it strikes us that the humor of some of the cases make all interests akin. Imagine two film renters meeting each other on the street. One is an independent renter, and he says to the other, "Say, that film your people turned out the day before yesterday was a bird."

"Yes," says the other, "it was certainly a winner. It is too bad your people cannot turn out stuff of that kind."

"We don't have to," rejoins the independent, "when your people make it. One of my customers had the picture yesterday."

"Is that so? Where in Jericho did he get it?"

"Oh, forget it! What'll yer have?" says the independent man.

OLIVER.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

As the literature of the Urban-Smith Kinemacolor process of making moving pictures in natural colors has been circulated in this country, and some of it has fallen into my hands, it manifestly creates an opportunity for some reference to the process in these pages. It is a fair assumption that this literature is an advance guard of the introduction of the process into this country. Hitherto the only data available upon which an opinion may be expressed has been obtained from English sources. Still as this includes the patent specification, the reports of lectures, press comments, inspired articles and other matter, it is thoroughly easy for any one conversant with the subject to analyze the rationale of the method, and predicate its chances of success in practical hands.

The circular literature is very highly colored. You have a programme of the Palace Theater, London, where these Kinemacolor results are said to be shown. The Palace Theater, I may say, is a kind of Hammerstein's. Then there is a beautifully gotten up pamphlet dealing with the wonders of the process and quoting many press opinions. No doubt specimens of the process will be shown in America. Many subjects appear to have been taken, and to have created considerable favorable comment. So that on paper, at any rate, the Urban-Smith Kinemacolor process would appear to have something in it. Unquestionably something has been done and that something is a valuable step. Not for an instant do I wish to decry the value of what has been done and nobody more sincerely wishes the inventor's success than I do. Nobody is more convinced, however, that the process, as it at present stands, is quite uncommercial; that is to say, it has not been worked up to that pitch of practical simplicity where it could be placed in the hands of any film maker of ordinary intelligence with a certainty of turning out good results. This is the only test of any method of making moving pictures, either in monochrome or color. Experimental or laboratory results are one thing, results obtained in a factory from day to day are another.

It is significant that the inventors of Kinemacolor are the only people who are using the process to produce results. One would have thought that if it possessed all the virtues claimed for it some of the British and European manufacturers would be using it. Not so. You do not find Warwick, Hepworth, Paul, Williams, Lux, Ambrosio, Gaumont, Eclair —you do not find anybody in England or Europe using the process, although it is said by its inventors to be the greatest advance in Kinematography ever made. Nor do you find Pathe using it. Pathe has his own color process which the inventors of Kinemacolor somewhat foolishly deride.

With these facts before me the American film maker may be pardoned if his attitude towards Kinemacolor is a somewhat sceptical one. I doubt very much whether anybody in this country will take it up. Of course it remains for the Kinemacolor people to come here themselves and exploit the process as they are doing in England. In that case the process may stand some chance of attracting public notice. I should have thought that if the process, to repeat myself, possesses all the virtues attributed to it, some of the English manufacturers would have taken out licenses to work it. But they have not. This is a very significant position of affairs. As I have said before and written on many occasions, I am no enemy of the process, but I doubt its practical efficiency in its present form.

To begin with, the patent itself is of doubtful value. In my opinion, and I am conversant with the annals of color photography ever since color photography was attempted, I doubt if the patent would stand the test of a fight in the courts, which is the only way of establishing the validity of a patent. There is little or nothing about Kinemacolor that is distinctly original. You take two pictures through color screens on a panchromatic film; you make positives, you project them through color screens and at the same time you color the light which you use for projecting the pictures. Here is the Urban-Smith process described as tersely as possible from the patent specification and from Mr. Smith's recorded lectures. Anybody who knows anything at all about the subject will realize that the difficulties at the panchromatic end of matters, in the taking and viewing filters, and in the coloring of the projection light, are so great they are almost insuperable except in very skilled hands. From what I know of modern moving picture plants, I doubt if there is anybody connected with them who will trouble about this process.

Of course I may be wrong in all this. I hope I am, and if I am I will be the first to admit my error, and to congratulate the inventors, or any American moving picture firm who takes up the process and successfully works it. But I am like the Scot, "I hae ma doots," and I consider it a simple duty to put them on paper, so that if anybody takes up the process, "monkeys" with it and fails, he will not be able to say that public attention has not been drawn to its difficulties. For, as I pointed out, it is one thing to devise a process in the laboratory and to produce good specimens from it, but it is another thing to make it so obviously good commercially and practically that persons less skilled in practice than the inventor can make just as good results. One of my objections to the Urban-Smith process is that nobody but the inventor, so far, appears to be able to work it. If it was really practical and workable you may be tolerably sure that it would have been taken up by some of the European manufacturers, because as I have pointed out, or rather in my opinion, the patent being open anybody can work it. The main principles of the Urban-Smith process were known to the scientific world before either Mr. Urban or Mr. Smith took up the matter.

James L., who has hitherto claimed so much of my attention, has had to make way this week for the discussion of more important matters. But I am pleased to see that he is at last making his sheet readable by freely quoting from the Moving Picture World. He is even becoming truthful in his serious moods and there is no truer statement in his whole paper than the line at the foot of the first column on the third page of his last week's issue, viz.:

"It pays to run two-page ads. in the M. P. World."

Many others, whose opinions carry more weight, will say the same thing, nevertheless we thank James L. for his magnanimous deliverance.

I also notice that James L. has "declined, with thanks," the invitation of Mr. Raleigh to call and see on the screen some of the Independent output. A similar invitation was accepted by the representative of the Dramatic Mirror, and this is what he says: "In a thoroughly impartial spirit The Mirror must state that the pictures inspected by its representative are fully equal in quality of photography, scenic background, story and pantomime to the general run of licensed films. If the same average of excellence be maintained the Film Import Company must prove a most important factor in the Independent field, and the relative standing of Independents as compared to the licensed interests will be materially strengthened." And so on in the same strain. In the same number of the Mirror "Spectator" mildly twits James L. for his one-sided views and calls him to order for quoting adverse criticisms of Independent films from the Mirror, omitting any words of praise. The same attempt to distort our views has been noticed in side quotations from the M. P. World. But—there is a reason. One thing we at least will give James L. credit for, and that is his consistency in his own inconsistency.

An immediate special release by the Vitagraph Company of America will be poses of Judge Gaynor, the Democratic and Independent candidate for Mayor of New York, and the Hon. John H. McCooey, the candidate for President of the Borough of Brooklyn. The two candidates were taken in front of the Gaynor residence and show Judge Gaynor in characteristic action. It will be remembered that the motion picture exhibitors have adopted a resolution in favor of Judge Gaynor's candidacy because of his sane decisions in motion picture cases, and this release is in answer to the demand for pictorial material.

The newest film de luxe to be put in hand at the Vitagraph studios is an elaborate production of "Twelfth Night." This Shakespearean production will be one of the most elaborate releases ever put out by the Vitagraph and special scenery and all new costumes will be employed, while the interpretation will be in the hands of a special cast, several Shakespearean players of note having been added to the regular stock company for this production.

Leroy, N. Y.—Lee Belson and Claude Bailey, of Oakfield, have purchased the Robert U. Criswell moving picture theater here.

Colchester, Ill.—Clarence Maguire, of Macomb, will open a moving picture theater here, in the Moore building.

Evansville, Ind.—Ed. Ropke, of Louisville, Ky., will erect a new modern vaudeville theater here.

EUROPEAN MANUFACTURERS OF RAW FILM.

The Paris correspondent of The Kinetograph (London) gives the following details relating to the manufacture of celluloid film in Europe:

Prominent among the stock film manufacturers, J. Hauff, of Feuerbac, near Stuttgart, Germany, has been manufacturing for two or three years; the factory sells directly to the user, the positive and negative film, in quantities which show a steady increase. The same can be said of the Neue Photographische Gesellschaft, of Steglitz, Berlin, except that the company sells only positive film. The celebrated Belgian manufacturers, Megevaert & Co., of Vieux Dieu, near Anvers, have been working for a year on the film problem, and they have now produced, according to one of our correspondents, a positive film fully deserving confidence; information received more directly states that positive and negative film is now quite ready for sale, direct to the film users. Photofilms, of Asnieres, Paris, is also now ready to make positive and negative film, after persistent researches and improvements which have been very successful, securing an extreme sensitivity in the negative emulsion created by Mr. Ziegle, a renowned chemist formerly connected with the Jougla Company.

English Advances.

The Ensign make is too well known in England to necessitate more than a mention, and the Austin Edwards film works at Warwick will certainly share in the future sales of kinematograph film in the markets of the world. They will now have a by no means negligible competitor in the Birmingham Photo Works, with the able collaboration of the able chemist Mr. Dawson, formerly with the Blair and Photofilm companies.

Some Other Stock Films.

The Crumiere works, which we mentioned in our last issue, will probably be completed by the 1st of March, 1910.

The Goerz Company, so well known for its lenses, has worked steadily for about a year on the film manufacturing problem, and we have received the assurance that they have obtained satisfactory results.

La Luminosa, La Ditta Danesi, and G. Scagliotti di Roma are three Italian concerns of recent date, which are considered to have nearly approached the stage of production.

The Astra and the Agfa, whose names were mentioned in a previous issue, must not be forgotten in the list of producers, as they will shortly rank among the most productive in the world. Agfa, is, as we know, the abbreviation of the name of the "Actien Gesellschaft fur Anilin," while the Astra is the name given to the film manufactured by the Deutsche Rollfilms, of Cologne, Germany.

Mention should also be made of the C. Schleussner Ges., of Frankfort.

Some results may also be expected from the last two German factories mentioned: The Kino Film Company, of Duren on the Rhein, and L. Langebastels, of Charlottenburg.

The Bayer film, worked out by Dr. Eichengrun, does not seem to have reached the practical stage; it belongs to the class of non-flam films, which already have several representatives in the field, and still more in the laboratory.

Lumiere's Non-Flam.

The Lumiere film has been in use for a long time, and while not mentioning at first the Lumiere flam or non-flam films in these notes, we have not in any way forgotten their merits, one of them very uncommon and precious, because it means autonomy and independence, viz., entirely home manufacture. The other makers of films we have mentioned are bound to certain dependence. The raw film is not an article of their own manufacture, but has to be imported from elsewhere. With the Lumiere Company the constituents only of the celluloid are imported, and the films, flam and non-flam, are entirely their own. It should be added to this list that the Cines Company has acquired the rights from the Lumiere Brothers for the same manufacture in Italy.

"Just Let Me Prove My Love to You" is a new song from the music house of Laemmle, and is one of the best things since "Love Me and the World Is Mine." The slides for this great hit were made by the Neosho Slide Company, of 100 South Wood street, Neosho, Mo., and are genuinely good. The ideas, photography and coloring of this great set of slides are all that the critical public could desire, and from the amount of orders for slides received by this manufacturer since the publication of their ad. last week indicates a big success for "Just Let Me Prove My Love to You" and its beautiful complement of slides. Detailed announcement of this splendid offering may be found in the advertising columns.

WEEKLY COMMENTS ON THE SHOWS.

The moving picture theater at 151st street and Amsterdam avenue is rather unique in its way. You go upstairs to the hall, which has a capacity of many hundreds, extending on a pinch to a thousand. The hall was not specially built for the purpose; it was originally a part of a manufactory. But still a better apartment for a moving picture exhibition could not be desired. It has exits on three streets. It is lofty, and there is plenty of room to move about on the floor of the hall. This theater, which is situated in the Washington Heights district, is now in the third year of its existence, and is a very well administered moving picture house. The operator shows a good picture; the attendants are courteous and obliging, and Professor Alfred Singer, the pianist, provides well-played and suitable accompaniments to the pictures. Important as all these features are in making the house a success, they would be insufficient to insure it if they failed to impress the surrounding public. But they do not fail. The public responds, and it is a very fine public, too. Your Broadway theater, even an opera house, might be proud to have such a high class patronage as this theater enjoys. The best people of Washington Heights compose the audience. They follow the pictures attentively and intelligently; they take a real interest in them, and they appear to be thoroughly well satisfied with the pictures and the excellent manner in which they are shown.

We have never seen a better audience than that which supports this theater, and we look upon it as a distinctly powerful sign in the progress of the moving picture in popular favor that you can find the inhabitants of such a fine section of the city as Washington Heights lavish in their support of local moving picture entertainments.

There is one feature which calls for special mention, and it is this: That before each picture is started, an especially prepared slide with very distinct lettering announcing the title is thrown on the screen. This is plainly visible to the audience who may be seated at the back of the hall. Another feature is that the operating booth is situated right at the back of the hall, and well away from the audience. Such an element makes for safety.

A WARWICK RECORD.

The Warwick Trading Company have this week established a record that will take a deal of breaking. They have had operators in America taking film pictures of the great Hudson-Fulton celebrations in New York, which commenced on the 25th of September. On the 28th and 29th they took pictures of the Hudson-Fulton review, showing replicas of the two first steamers, the Hudson "Half Moon" and the Fulton "Clermont." The review included about twenty miles of steamers, warships, etc., of all nations, including a gallant contingent of our British Navy. A street procession was also taken, representing in tableaux 300 years of New York's history. The pictures have an appropriate finish (by the courtesy of the Cunard Company), showing the loading up of the "Lusitania" ready for the voyage to England. The boat was kept waiting for a few minutes until the negatives were packed up and conveyed to the steamer by a small cutter. They were then thrown on board through a porthole, and the vessel went on her way. On this voyage, fortunately, the "Lusitania" beat all her previous records, and leaving New York at 10.30 on the 29th of September, reached Fishguard at 3.30 on Monday afternoon, October 4. The film was sent to London by express train, arriving at 9.30, and before 11 o'clock the complete set of pictures were shown at the Empire, Leicester Square, well within five days of the pictures being taken in America. Surely this feat is one to be proud of, and shows that all the "hustle" is not on the American side.—The Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly.

CHANGE IN MELIES' RELEASES.

Instead of bringing out, on October 27, "For Sale, a Baby" and "Hypnotist's Revenge," the film called "Cinderella Up to Date" was issued on that date by the G. Melies Company. "For Sale, a Baby" and "Hypnotist's Revenge" will be released November 3.

Baltimore, Md.—The Dixie Amusement Company has purchased the Dixie Moving Picture Theater, at 312 West Baltimore street, from A. H. Lavine, and has taken possession.

Two Harbors, Minn., October 11.—The Glen vaudeville and moving picture show opened here to-night with a crowded house.

Comments on the Week's Films.

HIS LOST LOVE (Biograph).

When this house undertakes the development of a heart subject it never fails in its purpose. In the acting of the capable company there is a quality which appeals irresistibly to all persons, whether young or old. In a drama like this, where personal sacrifice is the theme and where the heart is laid bare, one acquires a comprehension of some of the uncontrollable influences of human action which weave tangled skeins in a good many lives. When a brother sacrifices his own happiness because he believes he is benefiting the woman he loves, one is ready to applaud him for his unselfish act; but the years roll away, and when he holds the dead body of the same woman in his arms it is understood how futile has been his sacrifice and why one should never condone a wrong. The drama is beyond description. Its power lies in its subtle suggestion, rather than in the open illustration and development of the theme. Like most of the Biograph dramas, it depends more upon the acting than the action; and yet it is sufficiently powerful to hold the attention of the audience unbroken from beginning to end. It tells a heart story in such a convincing way that he who sees is forced to enter into it because a chord in his own heart is touched. He sees in the picture a reproduction of something that might occur in his own case, and his very spirit is chastened by its influence. Technically the picture is quite up to the Biograph standard, with its strong tones, speaking vigorously from the screen. Staging and accessories are alike satisfactory and pleasing. One must admit that the subject is depressing, but it is strong and its influence is for good.

THE CATTLE THIEVES (Kalem).

This subject is purely Canadian. It deals with the life of that celebrated body of men known as the Northwest Mounted Police, whose duty it is to preserve law and order in these vast agricultural wilds. Scene after scene is shown in which an idea is given of the life of the Northwest. The picture is educational in this, because it shows types of police and people with which perhaps the great American public is not quite so familiar as it might be. A Canadian half-breed figures in the plot, which centers around the undoing of some cattle thieves and the final release of the hero, who is suspended by the wrists from a tree, from that unfortunate position by a truly marvelous shot by a mounted policeman, whose bullet cuts the rope. The heroine of "The Girl Scout" again figures in this picture in a sympathetic part, and we again find ourselves admiring the whole-hearted way in which this young lady "lets herself go" in her acting. But then, we imagine, the atmosphere of Canada is favorable to vigor of action. If the Kalem Company have not, to quote the old phrase, "brought the scent of the hay across the footlights," they seem to us in these scenes of Canadian life to have reproduced the very atmosphere of the place. It is not merely acting that we are looking on, but life as it is lived in Northwest Canada. It is all natural, unstagey and untheatrical. We would like to pay a special word of praise to the quality of the photograhps. The scenes are well chosen, they are pictorial in composition, and then the printer has done such justice to the negatives that again we single out the richness of deposit of the positives for commendation. These Canadian subjects of the Kalem Company will no doubt go well. There is nothing of the made-up photograph about them. They are naturalistic, i. e., they are from nature. The proper way, we might almost say the only way of making photographs, as it is the proper way of making other kinds of pictures.

THE DIVER'S REMORSE (Vitagraph).

An unusual subject, worked out with the careful attention to detail characteristic of the Vitagraph Company. Its most interesting features are the deep sea diving scenes, which were posed by actual divers. All the paraphernalia and accessories are correct, and the pictures were made from a wrecking tug at work. The deep sea pictures were made from careful descriptions of divers long in the work and are as accurate as possible. The appearance of the submarine and the amount of dramatic license in the carrying out of the plot detracts from the realism, but the picture has valuable educational points. The story is one of jealousy, and the cutting of the air tube and life line are realistic bits which would bring about the results intended if rescuers did not appear. The staging and photography are both of high quality, and the picture is, in reality, a strongly educational film, affording those who never saw a diver at work opportunity of acquiring an understanding of their methods.

"The Man and the Girl" (Kalem).—A love story laid in a Western mining camp, which shows how love can triumph over brutality and transform a careless, indifferent and seemingly cruel man into one quite the opposite. The usual melodramatic qualities which make Kalem films interesting to the masses are present, and the picturesque scenery about the mining camps adds to the attractiveness of the film. There is an accidental death that could as well have been made merely an accident, followed by recovery. It was not absolutely essential that this man die, but perhaps it adds an element of dramatic force which would not have been manifest had he recovered. It left the two girls alone and sent them wandering away where they came upon Morgan unexpectedly and all was made right. To develop the story in this way the death was a necessity, yet it seems cruel to kill a man merely to carry out a story in a certain way. However, the action is lively enough to hold the interest and the dramatic situations are fully developed, with the result that the film affords an entertaining change from the heavier dramatic films which have an even more tragic development and ending.

"The Romance of a Poor Girl" (Pathe).—A story of a poor girl unfortunate enough to be beautiful, which subjects her to the advances of lecherous men, who take advantage of her in her extremity. Happily she escapes from the den of vice to which she is taken, and after numerous unpleasant episodes by flood and field, is discovered by her sailor sweetheart and goes with him to be married. The picture possesses a strong interest.

"Blessington's Bonny Babies" (Pathe).—A picture illustrating how a mass of dolls suddenly assume life and act like real live babies. The maker awakes to find he has been dreaming.

"The Belated Wedding" (Pathe).—To be ready to be married and then discover that the most important official is away on a vacation is extremely disturbing for the couples who call on the mayor and find he is away. He is hastily sent for, and while on his way home has numerous moving accidents by flood and field. When he does arrive he gets all that is coming to him, and finally ends by rushing into a pond, whither he is pursued by one determined couple, and he marries them while standing in the water. The principal interest in this film lies in its rough-house accidents and the drubbing the mayor gets on his arrival home.

"Bob's Electric Theater" (Pathe).—A beautifully colored trick picture, which shows Bob representing what his electric theater will do. It is a child's picture, but does not fail to interest older persons as well.

"The Broken Violin" (Gaumont).—A touching children's story, which has a strong appeal to older people, as well. The pitiful expression on the faces of the little ones when their violin is smashed goes straight to the heart. But the scene in the court room is pleasing, since it brings them release from the effects of an unjust accusation and finds them a good home. Anything dealing with child life, particularly its misfortunes, appeals to any audience, and this picture is no exception. The photography and staging are both excellent.

"Alphonse, the Dead Shot" (Gaumont).—Just what its name indicates, an exhibition of marksmanship, into which a number of funny incidents are woven. When he shoots out the light, his wife objects, and in her attempt to destroy the revolver an explosion occurs, which ends the picture.

"One-Legged Pete and Pat" (Gaumont).—An amusing exhibition of the methods adopted by two one-legged men to care for themselves in the ordinary vicissitudes of life.

"Chums" (Pathe).—A dog story, well told, well acted and well photographed. The chums are a little girl and a big, handsome dog. When tramps throw Fanny down a cellar she lets the dog know. He summons assistance and the thieves are captured after a sharp battle. The work of the dog is the main feature of the picture and excites admiration by its excellence.

"Physical Culture Fiend."—A story of an enthusiast who goes to a gymnasium to learn the best method of acquiring strength. His awkwardness is a source of amusement which never fails to please an audience. But his acquisition does not save him from arrest, and he is marched away by an officer for assisting a burglar.

"The Mexican Bride" (Centaur).—A picture brimful of melodramatic action, prompted for the most part by jealousy. The mixed situations around which the jealousy centers form a combination of thrilling scenes difficult to describe, yet thoroughly enjoyed by the audience. Attempted murder, a deliberately planned poisoning plot, and all the accompanying features of melodramatic action which revolve around them, are graphically reproduced, and one almost holds one's breath as the scenes change. All this blood-quickening action, set against the romantic background of Mexico, leaves little to be desired in the way of pulse-quickening movement and swift change of scene. And it all ends happily, with the young couple devoted to each other in their new home.

"The Gold Seeker's Daughter" (New York Motion Picture Company).—A dramatic picture, with details well worked out, giving a story of mining life, attempted murder and robbery, and the discovery of the robber as the daughter's husband later. Perhaps the strongest scene in the picture is where the old man forgives the daughter's husband and they all live together in peace and plenty. The acting of the grandchild is unquestionably the strongest work in the piece.

"The Helpmate" (Gaumont).—A farce based upon a sentence in the French marriage ceremony which reads that a wife should follow her husband. In this particular instance the husband is a policeman, and in her endeavors to follow literally the law's requirement some extremely amusing incidents are developed. But after she has been the important factor in the capture of a prisoner and affords ample evidence that she is as capable as her husband, the judge directs that in her case the provisions of the law may be reversed, and she leaves the court room walking majestically ahead of her husband.

"Husband's Strategy" (Gaumont).—Perhaps the most attractive feature of this picture is the staging. The costuming is of the style of 1830, affording an interesting diversion from the usual run of costuming of motion picture plays. A marriage for expediency did not please a romantic young woman, and only by the exercise of strategy does her husband succeed in winning the young wife's affections. While the subject is commonplace, the interesting costumes, the clear photography and the acting are sufficiently attractive to hold the attention of the audience.

"The Mexican's Revenge" (Vitagraph).—A love story, the scene of which is laid in Southern California, with a picturesque old Spanish mission, a United States cruiser and her dashing officers, and a group of Mexicans for a setting and the actors. It is one of those stories of jealousy, followed by an attempt at revenge on the part of the Mexican. The scene where the captain lies bound under a huge boulder suspended by a rope under which a fire is burning. Eventually the rope will burn through and the stone will fall and kill the captain. Just before it falls, the girl rushes in and drags the man away. Here are all the elements of a melodrama, and the capable company has worked them out to good advantage. The story is well told and the acting is in harmony with the subject. The picture is also excellent from the technical side, a combination of good qualities which will cause it to appeal strongly to any audience. Such pictures do not require the highest type of acting, but the action is lively and interests a larger proportion of the visitors to motion picture theaters. It should have a good run.

"The Dull Knife" (Vitagraph).—A bit of fun built around a domestic who rushes out with a knife to a street grinder, starting a panic among the people, who believe she is insane and running amuck. A crowd follows in the usual rubber-neck way, and not until she hands her knife over to a grinder do the followers understand the situation.

"The Telephone Call" (Phoenix Film Company).—Most pictures with telephone scenes have seemed to lack something, either because there has been an attempt to criticise the service, or because the real dramatic features of the telephone were not understood. In this picture the telephone has been used to good advantage, with no straining after effect, and no introduction of inconsistencies. The wife's frantic efforts to inform her husband of the danger she is in, and the husband's facial expression as he hears her story, are alike good acting. Moreover, the action is sufficiently vigorous to hold the attention, even where the dramatic features are somewhat questionable. Further, the setting is good, some of the outside views showing beautiful scenery. The picture should prove a favorite, since it combines the principal attractions which make films popular.

The Powers Company have changed the date of their first release to Tuesday, instead of Monday, so as not to conflict with the "Imp" release.

E. K. Koff, who photographed the Ketchel-Papke fight, has traveled 1,192 miles in one week, making one-night stands in Pennsylvania, which we think is the world's record for a picture machine. E. K. Koff is of Miles Brothers. The Johnson-Ketchel fight, which was fought on Saturday, October 16, was also photographed by Miles Brothers.

CARL LAEMMLE RETURNS FROM EUROPE AND ENTHUSES OVER "IMP" FILMS.

Reports of phenomenal sales of "Hiawatha," the first "Imp" release, has reached us. Around the headquarters of the Independent Moving Picture Company, 111 East Fourteenth street, there are signs of hustle and bustle, and the staff are working nights to fill orders. Carl Laemmle, the president, who has just returned from Europe, the picture of health, wears a continual smile. Said he: "'Imp' films are made by the best talent money can secure. No amount of energy will be spared to produce the best work only. Each release will be better than the last. Quality, not quantity, is our motto. 'Imp' films will be in every independent theater because the public will ask for them. I have procured the most up-to-date and accurate machinery. I see you spoke favorably of our first release, 'Hiawatha.' Come in and see our second film and tell me if it is not even better."

We accepted the invitation and "Love's Stratagem" was shown on the screen. This is a simple little story, well told with good acting and with that touch of humor all through that will ensure its popularity. The slight technical faults visible in the first film have been overcome and the photographic quality in "Love's Stratagem" is high and even all through. Altogether a very creditable piece of work. Mr. Laemmle leaves for Chicago, but will return in a few days to personally superintend the affairs of the Independent Moving Picture Company.

At Keith & Proctor's Fifth Avenue Theater the latest Independent films are now shown and the announcement is flashed on the screen that the service is from "Laemmle, the largest film renter in the world." This week an interesting film of "Roosevelt in Africa," the work of the Warwick Trading Company, was shown. Next week "Hiawatha."

Among the Exhibitors.

Stroudsburg, Pa.—Clarence H. Dreher is planning to build and open a new moving picture theater here.

Fairbury, Neb.—The Majestic Theater, F. L. Kerns, manager, is enjoying a very prosperous business with motion pictures only. Mr. Kerns says he has been using the Motiograph for the last ten months and has not had one break down or any repairs for same in that time.

Schenectady, N. Y.—The Dorp Theater, under the management of Joseph Galaise, has been running all the Summer to good business. The theater seats 400 and presents four vaudeville acts and three reels of film. It caters to and secures the patronage of the best people of the city. Mr. Galaise keeps his theater well lighted and clean, and insists on all courtesy on the part of his attendants. His place is really superior in style of construction and other respects to most places of exhibition. It is large, roomy and well aired, constructed in theatrical style with a pitched floor. The theater is wider than deep and the seats are very comfortable. Mr. Galaise himself is an old member of the theatrical profession and knows how to cater to the public.

Amsterdam, N. Y.—The Lyceum Theater opened October 18 to excellent business. It is a new house, specially constructed, and seats 1,000. Two operators are employed, also uniformed attendants, and the place is provided with all the modern theater facilities. It is under the management of Mr. Galaise, who also runs the Dorp Theater in Schenectady, and presents the same program of vaudeville and three reels.

Brigham City, Utah.—James G. Ellis, of Ogden, has purchased the Globe Motion Picture Theater here from Norman and Edgar Stark, and has taken possession.

Granville, Vt.—Joseph Daley has disposed of his interest in the moving picture business to his partner, J. J. Hayes.

Osage, Ia.—Bert Ellis is making arrangements to open a new moving picture theater in the Hitchcock Block.

Akron, Ohio.—Frank M. Foye, of Chicago, Ill., has purchased the Luna Theater here, from Chas. Decker, and has taken possession. Mr. Foye has already inaugurated some new features and improvements to beautify the theater.

THE PROPER WAY TO MAKE LANTERN SLIDES.

By An Old Lantern Slide Maker.

The first attribute of a lantern slide maker is to be a good photographer, which the writer is free to confess that too many of those now bidding for custom are not.

The next thing is to have suitable apparatus with which to make lantern slides, namely, a good camera and lens to make negatives, and a reducing camera to make the positives with; and half a dozen other cameras for all purposes.

The last and most requisite thing is to know how to use these things, how to develop the negatives and positives and compound the necessary chemicals. That's all there is to the making of lantern slides.

But there are some other things, too, that the slide maker must know. They are all summed up in one thing, and that is: "To know a good slide when you see one."

There never was nor never will be a good slide made by contact. Practical slide makers never make a slide by contact. In spite of the elaborate treatises which have been published from time to time on how to make lantern slides, no one has advised lantern slide makers to learn their business before attempting the art of slide making. To learn their business they must put aside the toilet-room dark room, the small printing frame and the cheap toy camera, and even the costly snap shot camera. There are no slides like those made from time exposure negatives and the rapid camera should never be used, except where a time exposure cannot be made. The practical lantern slide makers have to a great extent discarded the very rapid exposure of negatives because of the fact that there is not latitude enough in the exposure. The camera must be focussed with the lens wide open if a snap shot is taken and then unless the lens is stopped down to a small aperture in the vast majority of instances the immediate foreground and often the background will be out of focus and the slide will be fuzzy. If the lens is stopped down an under exposure results. In making time pictures the focus can be gotten with the lens wide open and then the diaphragm turned down to the smallest opening and about ten seconds will suffice to give a good negative. All these things are details that the average camerist never thinks of and seldom practices. More often he does not know about them.

As to contact slides the fact should be remembered they must be made from a portion of the negative plate only three and a quarter by four inches in size. If the figures on the various negatives in the set are of different sizes they will be on the slide the same size as they are on the negative. That will make a set of slides the incongruity of which will be startling. And another thing. There were never made two sheets of glass (except optically worked) that came in perfect contact. All are to a degree buckled and wavy. Without perfect contact the slide will not be sharp. In making them by contact there is no way to get the figures in the whole set, where that is necessary, of the same size; while with a reducing and enlarging camera they can be adjusted to measurement on the ground glass. Besides, by making slides by contact much interest in detail on the negative must always be left out, simply because the size of the positive plate will not take them in its scope.

I have read most of the treatises published during the past two years on lantern slide making, but I have noticed that none of them were written by men who are recognized in this country as practical slide makers. Such names as Phillip H. Wheeler, John Kress, George McLeod, William B. Moore, DeWitt C. Wheeler, William M. Shoemaker, Caspar M. Briggs, Shippen, Little, Hawkes, Keller, Van Altena, Simpson and others were notably absent. The writers were generally those who enlarged upon the practice of making slides by contact, probably because they had no knowledge of making slides in any other way. Mr. DeWitt C. Wheeler, of this city, has an establishment that could not be duplicated for $25,000 ,and pays more rent every year than the entire receipts of any contact slide maker in the country. Yet these lantern slide slop shop workers presume to put their work in the market to compete with the work of a man who has not less than $50,000 invested in the work. The writer in establishing his business put fully $2,500 in the way of apparatus in his studio before he began work, and uses a lens that cost more than one of the principal contact slide makers was willing to sell out his entire establishment for after he found out that he could not get rich in a hurry by making slides by contact.

Photography, in spite of the fact that great prizes are being offered for Kodak pictures, is a science that must be learned by long and patient study. You cannot make good pictures with toys. To mix chemicals according to the formula in the plate box simplifies matters to a degree, but it is often and more often than otherwise misleading and meant to advertise certain chemicals. The photographer must watch the effect of the developer on his plate, he must know what causes the plates to turn red in the high lights, or gray in the shadows, and he must have experimental knowledge enough to know either how to remedy or prevent it. Who ever heard of a contact slide maker using a thermometer in testing his developer before he began developing? What contact slide maker knows about chemical decomposition taking place in dry chemicals by age? None.

The writer insists that the only way to become a good lantern slide maker is to be a practical photographer in other lines. There is one man now working in a slide shop in this city who has been around the slide shops for years, yet he didn't know any better than to make a snap shot of a subject not long ago with the bright sun shining full in his lens. Then he wondered why he had made a failure. He cannot mix a bottle of developer, neither does he know the base of any chemical, yet he presumes to direct the work in the establishment. His product is a laugh when it reaches the public. This is the kind of men who are turning out the trash with which the country is flooded. This man is always bemoaning the fact that he has not enough money to start a shop of his own. The writer told him a few days ago that it was the most fortuitous circumstance in the world for him that he didn't have the money, because he wouldn't have it long.

The writer once landed in New York after a long trip from Texas. He wanted a new suit of clothes. That was before the denizens of the Bowery had invaded Broadway. Not having enough ready cash to buy at a Broadway store, he went down to the Bowery and bought a suit. Then he got caught in a rainstorm, and his Bowery suit looked like a dish rag. The trousers, when they dried, crept almost up to his knees. He had to throw his new suit away. He looked like a public scandal. That's just the way the slides made by the contact shops look alongside the product of men who know their business. They ought to be consigned to the junk box.

Good slide makers do not always make slides that are a credit to them. Frequently they get hold of a good song that it is impossible to get life subjects to illustrate from. They are put at their wits' ends what to do and frequently have to turn to copies of paintings, steel engravings and mezzotints to get copies from. This is especially true of historical songs and songs that require old battle scenes and historical subjects. These pictures do not stand up well and they might better let them alone. They do not possess good color values and take color poorly. The writer speaks from experience and he has paid the penalty, because purchasers of slides do not judge the work of a slide maker from his best work, but rather from the nondescripts which he once or twice in a lifetime turns out. The managers of many moving picture theaters are very emphatic in denunciation.

And now let me say that when I have to make slides by contact I intend to quit the business. I heard a contact slide maker boast a few days ago that he had made one thousand slides that day for a certain song. I saw some of them a few days later and the man they were made for thought they were elegant. There was a funeral in one scene and every woman present either had on a bright red or a royal purple dress. There were plenty of yellows and garish greens in the coloring, but the only thing black was the hearse and the underexposed half tones. And they were so black that no detail showed. There were no two slides in the set uniform.

And so the merry war goes on, but the people are learning. They are beginning to discriminate, and their discrimination is beginning to be felt. That's the reason that many of the purveyors of trash are selling out or trying to sell out.

Just one brief remark about coloring slides. I notice an article in your last issue, quoted from an English publication, saying that all slides should be hardened, preferably with alum, before coloring. Now every practical lantern slide maker and colorist knows that to harden slides with alum before coloring is fatal. All slides hardened with alum will not hold aniline colors and will fade out over night even when put in a dark box. The color creeps away from the edges of the subject and will not take hold and, even with the best of care, alum with its astringent nature will leave reticulation marks on the plates. Practical makers have all discarded alum as an enemy fatal to their business. There is one reliable hardener which all practical slide makers use, and it is unnecessary to mention its name here, as all who know their business know what it is.

That the Independents are steadily gaining customers is evidenced by the many exhibitors who are giving up licensed service. The Exclusive Film Company alone has taken on the following customers who formerly used trust film: Wm. F. Bernel, Colonial Theater, Oklahoma City, Okla.; California Theater, Twenty-sixth street near Trumbull avenue, Chicago, Ill.; Howell Graham; Theato, Chattanooga, Tenn.; E. E. Mathias, 50 South Howard street, Akron, Ohio; President Theater, Garfield Building, Chicago, Ill.; Princess Theater Company, Columbus, Ohio; Vaudette Theater, 812 Sixty-third street, Chicago, Ill.; Virginia Theater, Madison and Halsted streets, Chicago, Ill.

The Independent Western Film Exchange, Portland, Ore., has separated the following theaters from the trust and is now serving them: Bijou Theater, Washington and Seventh streets, Portland, Ore.; Orpheum Theater, Pendleton, Ore.; Electric Theater, Baker City, Ore.; Dreamland Theater, Salem, Ore.; Bijou Theater, Tacoma, Wash; Ideal Theater, Walla Walla, Wash.

That the N. I. M. P. A. is on the alert for the general good of the moving picture business was evidenced on Thursday, October 20, when Secretary Swanson called a meeting of Chicago exhibitors to take up for discussion the revision of the ordinance relating to moving picture theaters. The prompt action of the secretary will no doubt avert the threatened drastic legislation, similar to that which was permitted to be enacted in New York City.

Learning that the municipal code was to be revised, Mr. Swanson ascertained the committee on theaters, and secured information as to the proposed changes. The new ordinance provided for an increase in the license fee, and it was also proposed to bar from picture theaters children under sixteen unaccompanied by parent or guardian.

A circular letter was sent to every exhibitor in Chicago to meet at 106 Randolph street, where the Alliance had engaged a hall for the purpose. The time was very limited, as the aldermanic committee was to meet on Friday, October 22.

The exhibitors responded to the summons, and a large gathering enthusiastically greeted the secretary of the Alliance at the appointed time, when he called the meeting to order.

On motion duly made and seconded, Mr. Swanson was elected chairman, and H. J. Stryckmans, secretary, unanimously.

Mr. Swanson made an address, in which he called attention to the fact that there was no partisanship in the movement, and that personally he represented himself as an exhibitor, and officially the Alliance, as secretary; that the Alliance had taken the matter up in pursuance of its constitution, which provides that it shall, "by exerting its influence, prevent, in all lawful ways, the passage of oppressive local ordinances and State legislation, and of furnishing funds by which to test the legality of such ordinances and State legislation, as well as claims of others it may deem illegal."

Fred Schaeffer stated that he was present with forty members of the Chicago Vaudeville Managers' Association to cooperate with the committee to be appointed by the picture men.

Mr. Swanson said that he had consulted Alderman Nolan, who was on the committee drafting the ordinance, and that the Alderman had extended an invitation to the exhibitors to confer with the City Fathers before passing it; that the Aldermen were fair-minded and just, and would listen with attention to any suggestions which might be made, and that he did not believe there was any influence at work detrimental to the picture theaters. He showed the exhibitors that the opportunity was before them to get together and act while there was time, and called for general co-operation.

The speaker then called attention to the various abuses which had crept into the business, the outcry of reform societies and clergymen against the picture theaters, and stated that the pictures were not alone to blame, but that some of the vaudeville which was being shown in the cheap theaters was hardly the kind for young children to witness, and that he had been told so by an Alderman, which brought up the question of whether or not they would bar children under sixteen from these theaters.

General discussion followed, and the matter of free prizes as a means of attracting patronage was gone into, with the result that the exhibitors, with one exception, voted to taboo this.

It was proposed that the Operators' Union be represented on the committee, which was disposed of by agreeing that George Gilmore, proprietor of the Ideal Theater, who organized the Operators' Union, would act as honorary representative for the union.

The following committee was then unanimously elected to confer with the council committee: Wm. H. Swanson, George Gilmore, Luke H. Mithen, Arthur McMillan, D. L. Swartz, George Hines, F. L. Hirshfield and D. Brunswick.

This committee went into session with the Chicago Vaudeville Managers' Association committee, in the afternoon.

D. Brunswick made a speech in favor of a permanent organization, and the secretary was instructed to call another meeting for this purpose. D. L. Swartz, an officer of the old Exhibitors' Association, volunteered to lend his assistance in this direction and to submit to the secretary the names and addresses of the former members.

D. L. Swartz told of his experience with the ——— Film Exchange, a licensee of the Motion Picture Patents Company. Mr. Swartz stated that he had two theaters, close together, and that he used independent film in one and licensed service in the other. He was paying $35.00 a week for the licensed service, and was notified by the exchange that unless he took service for both houses from a licensed exchange they would cut him off, and if he wanted licensed service he would have to pay $50.00 for each house. He refused to be dictated to, and the exchange cut him off in the middle of the week, breaking his weekly contract. They then attempted to collect for the few days' service, which he declined to pay, and invited them to sue him, which they have not done.

All the exhibitors were much pleased with the result of the meeting and the social intercourse engendered, and with the spirit of co-operation manifested there is no doubt that the permanent organization to be perfected will prove highly successful.

A number of those present represented more than one theater. Among those at the meeting were the following: I. M. Weingarten, J. J. Sullivan, Harry Hyman, Geo. J. Gilmore, L. Solomon, A. Lewis, Geo. Freedman, Maleck & Pearce, H. Lemm, W. B. Malcolm, L. Salken, D. Brunswick, J. R. Cahill, B. & A. Bolaban, D. L. Swartz, H. Schoenstadt, Jos. B. Weisenfreund, A. O. Smerler, L. C. Jacobs, Wm. E. Fogel, C. M. Bromley, J. Ed. Green, Edw. Brooks, Krumholz & Koumowsky, E. Kraemer, Abrams & Sons, Bilharz & Lewis, A. G. Rider, J. W. Brickhouse, E. D. Hopson, S. H. Lynagh, I. B. Bair, T. L. Hirshfield, R. Navigato, Ligon & Hall, Louis Kolovakos, S. Krumholz, A. McMillan, Wm. H. Swanson, Jack Brown, Luke H. Mithen and G. T. Hesch.

Mr. Mithen is one of the attorneys for the Alliance, and was present at the meeting, representing several theaters. He explained the legal situation to the exhibitors, and also called attention to clauses in the ordinance covering moving picture operators which he contended should be remedied. This resulted in a lively discussion with George J. Gilmore.

LADIES AND THEIR HEADGEAR.

By F. H. Richardson.

Ladies who will not remove their hats voluntarily, should be requested, in a courteous manner, to do so. Should they still refuse, they should be tendered their admission fee, and, still courteously, requested to leave the house. This may lose you a little custom at first, but for every one you lose you will gain two. Such procedure may seem at first glance to be harsh, but you owe it to the other patrons of the house to give them a chance to see the show in reasonable comfort. It is not a matter of choice, but a matter of plain justice. The woman who is selfish enough to deliberately interfere with the enjoyment and rights of others is not worthy the name of lady, no matter what her standing in the social scale may be.

By the way, the writer witnessed an extremely amusing incident last week. He was seated in a North Clark street theater, enjoying a beautiful picture, when a lady (???) with a goodly sized sample of feminine headgear sat down in the seat next in front. He sat in eclipse a couple of minutes, and then, as she gave no indication of intending to remove the arrangement (miscalled hat), he leaned over and asked her politely if she would not kindly do so. The only response was a twist of the head and a haughty glare. Properly squelched, I subsided. Not more than two minutes afterward another woman with a hat which was first cousin to a full-sized umbrella came in and (O joy!) planked herself down in the neat next ahead of woman No. 1. Did she take her hat off? No! If she had, I would have felt tempted to murder her in cold blood. Woman No. 1 rubbered sidewise both ways, but that hat was a total eclipse and—nothing doing. She stood it maybe two minutes and then got up to look for another seat, but (again, O joy!) the house was jammed full, and she wound up by walking out. I still couldn't see the curtain, but still I was almost happy. Can you guess why?

CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS ENDORSE GAYNOR.

At a meeting of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York, held on Friday, October 15, 1909, at the Crown Theater, West 116th street, Manhattan, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association of New York, remembering the sound legal decision rendered by Judge Gaynor upon the application for an injunction restraining Mayor McClellan from revoking all licenses for moving picture shows on December 24, 1908, and knowing Judge Gaynor's liberal ideas regarding Sunday closing and personal liberty, hereby indorse his candidacy for Mayor and pledge him the support of the members of the Association, and ask all citizens of the city who believe in personal liberty to join them in securing Judge Gaynor's election; and it is Further Resolved, That all the members of this Association will do what they can through their moving picture shows to further Judge Gaynor's candidacy in every practical way by throwing on their screens such pictures and slides as may be necessary.

DANIEL M. DONEGAN,

Secretary's Office, 1565 Third Avenue, New York City.

New York, October 19, 1909.

TO NEW YORK EXHIBITORS:

On the theory that everyone in the moving picture business wants the good will of the next Mayor of New York, we have made a short picture of Mr. Otto T. Bannard, the Republican candidate. The Patents Company has given special consent that this picture, as well as any that may be made of the other candidates, be run in licensed houses, and we would respectfully suggest that you secure Mr. Bannard's picture from your exchange at the earliest opportunity. Your audience will be interested no matter what its politics may be.

Yours very truly,

IT PAYS TO ADVERTISE.

New York, October 20, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—We are pleased to advise you that our advertisement in your recent issues has given us good results, and has helped us to acquire a number of standing orders for the greatest hits of the season, such as: "If I Had the World to Give You," "I Lost My Gal," "Then We'll All Go Home," "Heinz is Pickled Again," "Bonnie Annie Laurie," "Wild Rose," and several others published by the foremost house in this line, Jerome H. Remick & Co., for whom we are the exclusive makers of slides. If the readers of your paper are interested, we are prepared to send them lists of new releases of songs weekly, also copy of music for our slides, giving them a chance to judge of the hits which we have in stock for them. Yours truly,

EXCELSIOR SLIDE COMPANY.

Chicago, Ill., October 16, 1909.

TO THE TRADE:

Gentlemen—We are confident you will be glad to learn that more American Independent film will be at your disposal, and we wish to inform you we will release two reels of Phoenix film weekly instead of one as heretofore.

Beginning Monday, November 1, we will ship another reel and will continue to ship one reel every Monday thereafter, in addition to our regular Thursday shipment. In other words, we will ship one reel Monday and one reel Thursday of each week.

In point of action and photography, the recent Phoenix productions are very fine and each treats of a subject that is sure to appeal. Our films continue to improve, so much so, that we do not hesitate to say that future shipments will agreeably surprise you, as we are going to spare no expense in our efforts.

As you already know the quality of our goods, we feel certain you will place a standing order with us for our Monday shipment, and we enclose herewith postal card, which kindly fill in and return to us.

Yours very truly,

THE PHOENIX FILM COMPANY.

MOVING PICTURE THEATER PROGRAMS.

Fayetteville, N. C., Oct. 6, 1909.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—I am reading your article of this week's issue, "The Modern Moving Picture Theater—Chapter IV.—Handling the Visitor," in regard to programs. I enclose a few of mine that I have been issuing for the past year, and find it the best all-around handbill and program. I would like to know just what you think of it. As to the Moving Picture World, I only wish it were published every day, as it is all I can do to wait until Sunday for it to get here. It is in my opinion the best moving picture magazine in existence—in fact, it is my greatest help in making write-ups for the newspapers and for my programs. With best wishes, I am, Yours very truly,

The New Dixie Theater. S. A. LAMBERT.

[Mr. Lambert's program is plain, but effective. It is a 9 x 12 sheet, printed on one side. In the center column are the titles of the films for two days, as he changes three times a week. Under the titles, which are in bold type, he prints a brief synopsis of the story, just enough to awaken curiosity to see the picture and help the people to understand it. On each side is a column of advertisements of local trade people, the receipts from which should fully cover the expense of getting out the bulletin. It is a sensible solution of the moving picture theater program, and as Mr. Lambert speaks so well of its benefit, we believe others could profit by his example.—Eds. M. P. W.]

THE "POWERS" COMPANY'S FIRST RELEASE.

New York, October 20, 1909.

Postponement of our first release: In deference to the wishes and suggestions of a majority of the film rental exchanges, we have decided to postpone the release of our first subject, "A Change of Complexion," to Tuesday, November 2, 1909.

Reasons therefore: As at least one new manufacturer intends to release his first subject Monday, October 25, (of which fact we had no knowledge), and as several other manufacturers are releasing on Mondays, we have decided upon the above action, rather than embarrass the exchanges with too many subjects for one day.

Tuesday will be our regular weekly release day.

Very truly yours,

THE "POWERS" COMPANY.

PREVENTS TIRED EYES AND HEADACHES

The rapidity of our new shutter has been so perfected that 30 to 40 per cent. less non-exposure (which has heretofore caused the tremulous vibration producing so many tired eyes and headaches) is found in the Motiograph than in any other machine, making perfect brilliancy of picture and sharpness of outline. Together with the rocklike steadiness of the pedestal the flicker is thus entirely eliminated.

Five-cent Theatre and Vaudeville-House Managers increase their bank account with the Motiograph. Patrons who come once will always come again where they know they see the best pictures, positively rest their eyes instead of tiring them, and where all fire risks are removed.

The Motiograph

OTHER POINTS OF EXCELLENCE IN THE MOTIOGRAPH found in no other machines are: A special Film Rewind by which the film can be rewound with the main crank in two minutes without removing either reels or magazines, saving time between pictures and entertainments; perfected Fireproof Magazines, Fire Traps, with four rollers and with spring actuated flanged guides, preventing side movement and making it impossible for fire to pass them; never failing Automatic Fireproof Shutters; Perfect Framing Device; Flanged Sprocket Rollers to prevent film being torn or ruined by accidentally running off sprocket wheels; Enclosed Gears and working parts; Perfect Take-up with new form of belt adjuster; Lid Off Wide Open Lamp House making it easily accessible; Improved Arc Lamp with all Hand Wheel Adjustments; Slide Carrier Swing, saving one-third more illustration for the Motion Pictures.

LINES OF WHITE ON A SULLEN SEA.—A story of unrequited love. "Oh, the love of woman! No coldness, no neglect, no harshness, no cruelty, can extinguish thee!" These lines of William Carleton were never more forcibly exemplified than in this Biograph film story, which shows the unswerving constancy of a pretty fishermaiden, who sacrificed her life upon the altar of unrequited love. Emily Brackett is wooed by two fishermen of the village, and rejecting the proffered engagement ring of Joe, accepts Bill, who places upon her wrist a bracelet, which he locks, he keeping the key. In this manner they plight their troth. Joe is almost heart-broken, but dissembles, wishing Emily well. The time arrives for Bill to ship and the parting with Emily is undoubtedly sincere. He promises to make her his wife upon his return. But, alas, Bill is one of those impressionable beings, susceptible to conditions, and when he arrives at the foreign port he meets a pretty girl whose charms and innocent mien appeal to him. Hence, little Emily is forgotten. Bill being a handsome fellow, his proposal is accepted by the girl and they are married, taking up their residence in this foreign village, where he becomes commander of a fishing ship. But what of Emily? The poor soul is waiting ever hopeful. Each mail she is disappointed at not receiving any word from Bill. She watches the return of the boats after each fishing trip, but all in vain. Day after day she goes to and scans the sullen sea which only brings to the beach huge lines of white, which seem to taunt her as they break upon the sands. Often has faithful Joe importuned to place upon her finger the ring he still holds hopefully for her. But she has pledged her word to Bill. Weeks, months and years pass, yet she waits in vain, until finally she gives way under the strain of anxiety and death is inevitable. Six years have rolled around and the sands of her life have almost run, when Bill makes his appearance in the village accompanied by his wife and child. When Joe meets him, he is at first inclined to strike him down, but no, there is at least, a chance to make the last few moments of Emily's life happy, thereby easing death's sting. So Joe forces Bill to go with him to Emily's bedside, place his ring on her finger, pretending it's his own, and that he has returned to fulfill his promise. This he does, and not too soon, for the poor girl, a victim of a charitable deception, smiles and trying to raise herself from her pillow, drops back to yield up her pure faithful soul to God. Length, 975 feet.

IN THE WATCHES OF THE NIGHT.—A story of the silver lining of the clouds of despair. More torturing than the "rack" is desperation, for the being is in just as complete a state of helplessness. Furthermore, desperation almost invariably affects not only the desperate one, but all dependent upon him, making his anguish the more intense, for very often the sufferer could his quietus make without a qualm, were it not for the thought of those he would leave behind him in a state of uncertainty. In the honorable, desperation is almost lacerating to the heart, for the unscrupulous would resort to means of amelioration that the upright would resist. Edward Forbes, a mechanic, has been up against a siege of bad luck. Out of work, with his little child dangerously ill, his home is indeed a house of despair. As a last resort he writes a note and goes with it to Mr. Henry Brainard, a wealthy merchant, applying for some employment no matter how humble or meager the pay. It would at least relieve in a measure his anxiety and help to meet his obligations. Mr. Brainard, however, though kindly disposed, has nothing to offer, as Forbes has made it clear that he doesn't seek charity, but work, and bearing a reputation for honesty and conscientiousness, Brainard is grieved to have to turn him away. Back to his home Forbes goes in the extreme of despondency. The sight of his sick child and his woe-stricken wife fairly turns his brain, and induces in his mind thoughts he never entertained in all his life before—robbery. Quite beside himself he makes his way back to Brainard's house, and being now late at night, effects an entrance easily and from a desk drawer secures articles of jewelry. Returning home, his wife is amazed at his story and recalling him to his better self compels him to take back the loot. This he does, entering the house as easily as before, and putting the trinkets back into the drawer. Unfortunately, Brainard is aroused and apprehends him before he has time to escape, and hands him over to a policeman, who happens to be an old friend of Forbes. The officers on the way to the station allow him to go and say good-bye to his wife. Learning the true nature of the affair, the officer steps into the hallway ostensibly to allow them to say good-bye alone, but in reality to dispatch his brother officer to Brainard's to induce him to be merciful. While alone with his wife Forbes picks up a pistol that had dropped from the officer's pocket and is about to resort to desperate means to wipe out his disgrace, when the officers enter with Brainard who not only withdraws the charge, but lends material aid to the poor family. Length, 996 feet.

EDISON MFG. CO.

THE LIE.—A story of the Franco-Prussian War. The scenes of this aptly named silent drama are laid during the time of the Franco-Prussian War and, although devoid of the cannon's roar, the wild cavalry charge, the smoke of battle and flying flags, yet, nevertheless, abounds in that wealth of dramatic situations and startling climaxes that will hold and thrill the audience from the opening scene in the little German cottage to the reunion of the lovers at the close. This is due to the fact that it deals with that eternal triangle which never fails to interest and affect.

Two soldiers of the German army fall in love with a peasant girl whose heart does not decide which is to be the favorite one until the call to arms is heard when, by the old mill stream, love's old sweet story is told once again. She consecrates her life to one, while the other does not learn the truth until the time comes to say farewell, when he discovers, to his chagrin, that his comrade has won her heart. Little time is left for explanations; the bugle sounds, the comrades march to the front.

While escaping from the French her lover is shot and grievously wounded. Dictating a message to his sweetheart telling of his love and claiming her for his bride on his recovery, he entrusts its delivery to his comrade. The comrade, although torn with conflicting emotions, is loyal to his brother-in-arms up to the moment he approaches the cottage, but there he falters in his duty and, tearing up the letter before entering, he informs her that her lover is dead.

"The Lie" strikes deeper than he thought. It unseats the girl's reason and she wanders out into the woods with the vision of her lost one, as she believes, ever before her beckoning her on. To the edge of the dreaded black pool she wanders, where, ninety feet below, she sees her soldier lover calling to her to come. A moment she stands upon the brink of that awful abyss and then leaps down the dizzy height into the black waters below.

Meanwhile her brother, having found the torn letter, puts the pieces together and learning the truth starts in pursuit of his sister to acquaint her with the deception. He arrives just a moment too late, for he sees her leap from the high rocks of the black cliff into the water. Without a moment's besitation he leaps after her to the rescue. The heroic rescue and the ultimate reunion of the lovers are something it were better to see than attempt to describe.

ALL'S FAIR IN LOVE.—In this comedy of the time "when George the Third was King" we see the course of true love running very much as it does in this 20th century. Two very delightful young people, very much in love with each other, by the entrance of the green-eyed monster upon the scene, become involved in a harmless lovers' quarrel. The quarrel grows to the point where Katherine returns the Captain's engagement ring, and vows that she will never dance with him in all her life again.

Now all this takes place at a ball in Katherine's own home, and the Captain wants a dance very badly, so he is disposed to dispute her decision, and when she insists upon it they make a wager. He is to make her dance with him before 12 o'clock—if he can. There are only twenty minutes left in which to accomplish this result, now doubly desirable, but the Captain has an inspiration and his love finds a way. Bargaining with the footman for his livery and powdered wig, the Captain waits until the other guests have gone and, while the lonely little Katherine is writing a note asking him to come back, he appears before her in his disguise.

In the dimming light she is deceived by the powdered wig and livery and only notices that the footman has apparently had too much of the punch and is slightly tipsy. Though a brave little lady she is so badly frightened at being alone with a man in this condition, that when he boldly proposes that she shall dance with him she dare not refuse. In perfect measure they dance the beautiful old-time minuet, presenting a picture that is not only charming because of the grace with which the dance is performed, but delightfully comic as well, because we know that the little lady has so little cause for her fear of the footman (?).

While they are dancing the clock strikes twelve, and the Captain pulls off his powdered wig and tells her he has won the wager. While we laugh at her discomfiture we cannot blame her for tearing up the note she had written and throwing it in his face; nevertheless do we sympathize with the gallant Captain when we see her pick up the old flint-lock pistol and, presenting it at his head, force him to throw down the rose the other girl has given him, get down on his knees and swear to be good forever and ever.

THE THREE KISSES.—A Hallowe'en story. A comedy from the pen of Carolyn Wells. It concerns itself with a mischievous young woman, a more than audacious youth, an automobile breakdown and a domestic hurricane—good elements for trouble of the comic sort.

The first of the three kisses herein to be made famous is taken by our hero only after more than usual provocation. He lends "first aid to the injured" by helping the little heroine's chauffeur to repair her automobile and she does not even deign to smile upon him. This added to the fact that she is a most bewitching young woman is surely ample excuse for his stealing the first kiss and promptly whirling himself away in his own machine before she can tell him what she thinks.

Of course only Fate herself could so arrange matters that these two young folk should find themselves guests of the same host that very evening and only Fate could provide that the cook and maid should quarrel and so the hostess be left with no one to serve the dinner so carefully planned to please our hero, young Astorbilt. But even fate might not have thought of the next move, for the young woman promptly offers to dress as the maid, serve the dinner and so perhaps play a joke upon the young man, who is still ignorant of her arrival at the house.

The plan succeeds admirably—for the young man. He sees the girl be had kissed appear as the maid in the house where he is being entertained and of course a young social lion really ought to be privileged to kiss a pretty housemaid. Therefore he does so, and scores kiss the second.

But the plot thickens when there appears among the guests at the Hallowe'en party a young woman who seems to be the same, but who appears not to know him and to treat him with quiet frigidity. Our hero is puzzled and unable to guess whether his eyes deceive him or whether it is the girl, but when in the course of the games the girl is sent out to try the time-honored way of reading the future by walking backward holding a lighted candle in one hand and a mirror in the other, in the hope that "the one man" will show himself over her shoulder in the dark, our hero decides to try to solve the mystery.

Of course he does so and of course he gets the third kiss, but this time he doesn't really have to steal it.

MAUD MULLER.—"The saddest words of tongue or pen, The saddest are those: 'It might have been!'" A story based on Whittier's beautiful poem, "Maud Muller," in which the pretty pastoral atmosphere is preserved, and the spirit that moved the great poet finds expression again in a simple, sweet story.

> Maud Muller, on a Summer's day,
> Raked the meadow, sweet with hay."

Maud Muller, beautiful and pure, a model of the rugged New England lass of Whittier's day, works with her brothers in the hayfield, singing blithely as she rakes into little windrows the sweet-smelling, newmown hay. Nothing to allure her from the pure-hearted love of the green meadows, she labors diligently for her father, unambitious and satisfied with her lot in life.

While at her work a horseman rides into view. He is the Judge, a handsome and courtly gentleman, and a wealthy aristocrat in the village. He is attracted by Maud's rustic beauty and draws rein as he approaches her to pass the time of day. Their eyes meet and the message they bear is only too evident: "I love you." Yet, he merely asks for a drink of water, which the girl brings him from the spring nearby. Then the Judge, bidding her good-bye, mounts his horse and rides away.

The girl looks after him, her heart beating fast. So different is he from the rough men of her acquaintance, so kindly courteous, so straight and handsome, that:

> "The sweet song died and a vague unrest
> And a nameless longing filled her breast."

It is her first desire for something better than her lot, a peep into the other side of life. A newborn ambition conjures up vague dreams of "stately halls" and we hear her murmur, "Ah me! That I the Judge's wife might be!"

On the other hand the Judge, though he feels he could give all his wealth to work in the hayfield with Maud Muller, realizes the social gulf which separates them. So

> "He wedded a wife of richest dower
> Who lived for fashion as he for power."

> "She married a man, unlearned and poor,
> And many children played around their door."

Maud Muller is forced into an unhappy union by a scheming and avaricious mother. She is married to a rough, boorish country fellow, who spends most of their little earnings over the bar of the village tavern. Striving hard to clothe and feed the many hungry little urchins, Maud finds happiness in sweet dreams of the past and of "what might have been" had the Judge but spoken the word.

> "Sometimes her narrow kitchen walls
> Stretched away into stately halls,
> And for him who sat by the chimney log,
> Dozing and grumbling o'er pipe and mug,
> A manly form at her side she saw
> And joy was duty and love was law."

The drunkard husband goes from bad to worse. Finally, under the influence of liquor he commits a serious crime and is haled before the Judge. He is tried by the Judge, who, when he hears Maud's pitiful story, is shocked and horrified and removes the wicked husband.

When she is left a poor, struggling widow, the Judge is able to befriend her. Ever a kind and indulgent husband to his ambitious wife, the Judge sighs and lives in dreams of the past, of the sweet-faced Maud in the hayfield, and the message of love her eyes spoke when he foolishly turned away.

> "God pity them both! and pity us all
> Who vainly the dreams of youth recall.
> For the saddest words of tongue or pen,
> The saddest are these: 'It might have been!'"

(George Kleine.)

THE OLD LORD OF VENTNOR.—The Lord of Ventnor, despite his beautiful estates and vast wealth and many vassals, is a rather ridiculous old person in many ways. In fact, he has, in the parlance of to-day, passed into his second childhood.

The first scene of the comedy shows us a street in one of the villages of his exceedingly picturesque domain. A village peasant dance is in progress, and the mirth runs high among the carefree young people.

It chances that the old lord passes the group of dancers, catches sight of a beautiful girl among them, is infatuated by her pretty face, proposes a union of autumn, personified by himself, with spring, symbolized by the rural belle, is readily accepted, and carries his bride to her new and wonderful home, his castle.

The bride soon becomes disdainful and irreverent to the old lord, who has given her so much, while his affection is so great that he does not reprimand her.

Before long war is declared against the old lord and he is forced to depart at the head of his troops.

During his absence, his wife, to divert her mind, goes to her old companions in the village and joins in their dances. The husband returns during the festivities, sees his lady dancing with a peasant, orders her arrest, has her taken to the castle, tries her case before a burlesque jury, decides on execution by beheading as just punishment for her inconstancy, and arranges the courtyard for the awful deed. Now, by a clever piece of magic, the madam substitutes for her own head that of a dummy and when the old husband is grief stricken because of her supposed death, she shows him the secret and is forgiven.

AMBULANCE VENTILATORS.—A short, intensely amusing film showing the many surprising effects of the heavy wind emanating from a new portable ventilator for use in cities.

People, vehicles, small buildings, in fact all movable portions of the landscape are sent shooting through space by the impetuous breath of this powerful machine.

THE SONG OF THE CRADLE.—In the grounds of a magnificent castle on the banks of the beautiful Loire river, we are introduced to the mistress and her wee baby, cooing in its heavily bejeweled cradle and lulled to rest by a song from its mother.

While we watch the stately chatelaine playing upon her guitar and note her royal pose we easily transport ourselves to her time, the 16th century, and are in humor to almost expect the things which later happen.

When the child finally sinks to sleep the mother leaves the nurse maid with the baby, while, with her page she walks about the garden. The nurse, careless of the child's safety, leaves him to while away her time with a soldier of the guard, and during her absence two traveling knights of gypsy type steal the child.

We are shown several scenes in the child's life between this time and his fifteenth birthday, when he gains his freedom. During these years he is taught to sing and makes his living as well as that of one of the highwaymen who had captured him. The old lullaby of his babyhood has ever been one of his favorite songs, and now meets with great favor as he wanders from one castle to another singing for food and lodging.

Next we see him come near nightfall to an inhospitable castle where he is refused admittance, for they are in mourning. He turns to go and as he passes beneath the windows of the building hums the old melody.

He has come to the home of his childhood and through his song has been recognized by his mother, who sends her servants to call him back and great rejoicing follows his return to the old home.

A BARROW RACE.—Hilarious comedy in every foot of this film, with excitement intermingled, of a very startling kind.

A race in which each barrow contains a man who must indicate the way to the blindfolded contestant.

One marvels at the great endurance exhibited and the many very dangerous falls and collisions which are suffered by the racers.

THE GIRL SCOUT; Or, The Canadian Contingent in the Boer War.—Scene I.—War Declared—The Girl Neltze Begs to Go. At the time of the opening of the first scene all hope of a peaceful settlement had been abandoned. Actual war had begun and we see a Boer messenger dashing across the country carrying the news to the scattered farmers. At the Voorhaut farm the elder Voorhaut and his son are discussing the rumors of war. Even the Kaffir servant, Schrake, stops to listen. Now they are joined by Neltze, Voorhaut's only daughter. A shout is heard in the distance and up dashes the war messenger. In a few words he tells of the declaration of war and of the appeal to the burghers issued by the President, then rides on. Voorhaut orders his son and the Kaffir to bring their horses. Neltze begs to go with her father. She offers to show him how well she can shoot. He holds out his hat and stepping back a few paces Neltze pulls the trigger and the bullet pierces the hat exactly in the center. But still her father refuses to let her go. Now young Voorhaut and Schrake return with the horses and the two Voorhauts mount and ride off to join the army. Neltze watches them out of sight then tells Schrake she is going to disguise herself in her brother's clothes and follow them. Schrake agrees to go with her, for he has been her devoted servant since she was a small toddler.

Scene II.—Neltze Follows Her Father and Brother. By the time the next night has arrived Neltze and Schrake are ready. He is waiting for her at the gate leading to the farm house. Now he whistles softly and Neltze hurries down the path. A long coat of her brother's completely covers her. Handing her rifle to Schrake she throws off the coat and asks him if she will pass for a boy. Schrake chuckles at the sight of his young mistress in boy's clothes but assures her she is the image of her brother. But they must hurry for they need the aid of this bright light from the friendly moon to guide them across the veldts. Schrake leads the way to the barns where their horses are waiting. Soon Neltze is mounted on her pony and impatient to be off she calls to Schrake to hurry. Now he joins her mounted on one of the farm's plow horses and jogs along after her.

Scene III.—Neltze Becomes a Recruit. Out on the broad expanse of the rolling veldts a small party of Boers have camped on their way to join the main army. The leader is reading his well thumbed Bible to the burghers lying about when a distant shout brings them to their feet with rifles ready. Into the camp ride Neltze and Schrake waving a white flag to show their errand is friendly. Neltze approaches the leader. He inquires her business. She wants to enlist. What! a mere girl enlist and fight with his hardy men. He laughs at the idea. Neltze grows indignant and tells him she is a better soldier than he will ever be. At this the leader, a stern old Boer, grows angry and lifts his whip to strike her. But faithful Schrake who has kept near his mistress wrests the whip from his hand. At this moment the general in command enters and inquires the cause of the commotion. Neltze is telling him when her father and brother enter, attracted by the crowd. Neltze sees them and rushes into her father's arms. She tells him of the leader's threatened attack. Voorhaut starts toward him, but he humbly begs pardon. Now Neltze renews her pleading to her father to be allowed to join the army. Finally he consents, the general calls for the Bible and Neltze with her hand on the book, standing straight and firm, her eyes eager, her young body pulsing with patriotism, takes the oath that makes her a soldier fighting for her country's freedom.

Scene IV.—Neltze and Her Brother Ordered to Reconnoiter. The little band of Boers soon joins the main army. In the stern conflict that is being waged Neltze proves herself of invaluable aid to the general. With untiring enthusiasm she is ever ready for any difficult task that requires a keen brain and daring riding. Time and again she has saved the army from blunders that would have cost many lives. But now the general is troubled. Over beyond the enemy's position is a little band of Boers that are bringing much needed ammunition to his army. They are unconscious of the enemy in their front. Someone must ride over the hills and warn them. He thinks of Neltze. Never has she failed him. An orderly is dispatched for her. Soon she returns accompanied by her brother. The general tells them of the dangerous mission he is about to send them on. They gladly consent to go. Soon the dispatch is in Neltze's hand and she and her brother are away, leaving her father and the general standing looking after them and silently praying for their success.

Scene V.—Sergeant Cameron of the Canadian Contingent Volunteers as a Scout. Over the top of the hill we see approaching a small detachment of Canadian troops, those gallant soldiers who did so much towards winning the victory for England in the war. They are in the heart of the enemy's country. Scouts must be sent out. Who will volunteer? Two ride forward, the commander sends them off in different directions. Now only the most dangerous route is left. Straight ahead through the low hills where a bullet from a hidden enemy may come singing at any moment. For this Sergeant Cameron volunteers. With a word of commendation for his bravery the commander orders him away. Now the gun convoy halts. The cannon is brought forward and the soldiers dismount to await the return of their scouts.

Scene VI.—Cameron is Captured. Cameron makes his way slowly over the broken ground. To all appearances there is not another person within a hundred miles of him. He looks intently out with shaded eyes, for any one of those distant hills may secrete the silent enemy. And now we see Neltze and her brother riding down a little valley. They have reached the Boer detachment, delivered their warning and are now returning to the camp. Suddenly they catch sight of Cameron as he stands silhouetted against the sky. A daring resolve enters their minds to capture him. The brother jumps from his horse and creeps towards Cameron down a little gully that hides him from Cameron's sight. He sees Cameron approaching and crouches down behind a small bush. As Cameron, entirely unconscious of danger, reaches him, he steps out and leveling his rifle tells Cameron he is a prisoner. But Cameron slides from his horse and throwing up the rifle seizes Voorhaut. Soon they are struggling desperately, Cameron's superior size tells and he is about to throw the brother to the ground when Neltze approaches and by a skillful shot in Cameron's arm forces him to release her brother. Cameron turns to find out who his new assailant is and seeing Neltze's face over her threatening rifle removes his hat and bows with a smile to such a charming captor.

Scene VII.—The Canadians Attack the Boer Laager. Cameron is now a prisoner in the Boer laager. His modest winning manner has made him a favorite with the stern Boers even and they have allowed him all the privileges they can. He and Neltze are fast becoming dear friends. He tells her of his home in Canada and shows the locket containing his mother's picture. Suddenly two Boers dash headlong into the laager. The English are upon them! Hurriedly rifles are seized. Crouched down behind the rocks and using smokeless powder the Boers offer no target for the enemy while their own rifles are dealing death to the approaching English. The noise stampedes the horses. Over goes the supply wagon. Neltze's father drops. A stray bullet has killed him. Neltze falls weeping across the body. Far over the hill Cameron can see his own company of Canadians moving to the attack. Twice they move forward only to be stopped by the cannon on the hill back of him. A daring thought comes to him. If he could only silence that cannon.

Scene VIII.—Cameron Silences the Cannon—The Boers Surrender. And still the battle rages on. The Boers although few in number are fighting desperately. Now the English have moved their cannon within range and death dealing shells are dropping down in the center of the laager. With their own cannon the Boers are still firing regularly. So long as it can be worked the English cannot make a successful charge. Crash it goes again. One of the gunners fall. Through the crowd comes Cameron. Now is his time. Dealing savage blows right and left to the gunners he seizes the breech-piece and throws it far away. The cannon is useless now. Over the hill come the Canadians. Cameron's own company leading in a desperate charge. The Boer commander realizes resistance is useless and waves the white flag of surrender. The firing ceases and the Boers are soon surrounded by the victorious English. The attack is successful and Cameron's bravery has won the day for his comrades.

Scene IX.—War is Over—Neltze a Prisoner of Love. Down the street of one of those quaint little villages that are scattered sparsely about the upland veldts come the victorious English and their prisoners. Under the new orders all combatants captured are to be conveyed to the nearest concentration camp. With bowed head and lagging step the Boers march along. Meanwhile out over the veldts another messenger is dashing along as did the war messenger in our first scene, only this one carries a message of peace. Reaching the troops he pulls up and delivers his message to the commander. He glances at it then turning to his men reads it aloud to them: "Cronje has surrendered. Parole your prisoners." Hats and guns are waved in the air. Soon the prisoners are given the oath and depart to take up again their quiet lives on their deserted farms. As Neltze and her brother turn to depart, Cameron holds out his hand to her. He tells of his love and begs her to go back to Canada with him as his wife. The brother consents and Neltze goes to Cameron's arms, for although all war prisoners are released she finds herself a prisoner to a stronger power than war, the power of love.

FOR SALE A BABY.—No one will dispute the fact that it is very unfortunate if one is so poor that he cannot buy things that would make his life interesting and worth while living. Children having poor parents are always beset by this misfortune. All children like toys and if they do not possess them, they will sometimes go a long way to get them.

In this picture a poor mother who has only recently lost her husband finds it hard to find employment sufficient to provide her children and herself with food without ever thinking of such a luxury as toys.

One day one of the children, a boy of twelve, takes his infant brother out in a self-constructed vehicle for a ride. On the way he meets another little friend of his and they walk together. Suddenly one of them spies a sign near a house stating "For Sale." He quickly removes it and reconstructs it to read "For Sale, a Baby," and places it on the little cart. They plan to buy toys if they can find a buyer for the babe. Soon a woman passes and arranges to buy the child. The deal is made and the child is given to the woman. The boys then buy toys and are about to go home when at the thought that the babe has been sold to satisfy their own pleasure and that the mother will give them a very warm reception, they become conscious stricken and return to the woman and tell her that they want the child back. They also leave with her all the purchases which they made and are glad to get the babe even though they will have to get along without the toys. The good woman is of a sympathetic nature and besides returning the babe, she also gives them the toys which they had bought. Then she goes to the children's home and brings necessaries for the mother. Length, about 600 feet.

In the Watches of the Night

A Story of the Silver Lining of the Clouds of Despair.

More torturing than the "rack" is desperation, for the being is in just as completely a state of helplessness. Furthermore, desperation almost invariably affects not only the desperate one, but all dependent upon him, making his anguish the more intense, for very often the sufferer could his quietus make without a qualm, were it not for the thought of those he would leave behind in a state of uncertainty. Edward Forbes, a mechanic, has had a siege of bad luck; out of work, with his little child dangerously ill. In the extreme of desperation, he commits his first theft, but his wife insists that he return the loot. This he endeavors to do, and is caught. His captor will not believe his story, and hands him over to a policeman, who happens to be an old friend. The officer, learning the facts, intercedes and saves the man, not only from prison, but from the committing of a greater crime—self-destruction.

Lines of White on a Sullen Sea

A Story of Unrequited Love.

"Oh, the love of woman! No coldness, no neglect, no harshness, no cruelty can extinguish thee!" These lines of William Carleton were never more forcibly exemplified than in this Biograph film story, which shows the unswerving constancy of a pretty fisher-maiden, who sacrificed her life upon the altar of unrequited love. Emily Brackett is wooed by two fishermen of the village, and rejecting the proffered engagement ring of Joe, accepts Bill, who places upon her wrist a bracelet, which he locks, he keeping the key. In this manner they plight their troth. Bill leaves on a fishing trip and locates in a foreign port. Forgetting Emily, he marries another girl. Poor, faithful little Emily is ever hopeful of his return, steadfastly rejecting Joe's repeated proposals. Thus she sinks into the depths of decline, and it is only a matter of a few hours of life, when Bill returns to the village, accompanied by his wife. Joe meets him and forces him to pretend that he has returned to fulfill his vow, that her last moments, at least, may be happy ones—indeed a charitable deception.

host and his guests. He is invited to perform several of his best known tricks to amuse the company. After delighting them with many feats of prestidigitation which are truly interesting, they partake of some refreshments and some of the men get together for a friendly game of cards. To make the game more interesting, the magician suggests that they play for money. He is soon seated at the table and an interesting game is now in action.

It does not take very long before he wins all the money from those with whom he is playing, but they also perceive that he has come to his gains unfairly. By his sleight of hand tricks he is able to conceal cards and make rapid changes to come out ahead.

When his trickery is discovered they immediately chase him from the house and he is pursued by all the guests. The chase is a good one in which the incidents are very amusing. He is finally pursued back to the house where he turns about, hypnotizes them and then leaves the house in peace. Length, about 350 feet.

CINDERELLA UP-TO-DATE.—A young girl buys a nice pair of shoes. Delighted with her purchase, she takes the shoes home to show to her mother.

What a disappointment! She finds only one shoe in the parcel! She returns to the store and tells the proprietor of her loss. He informs her that he has not found the other shoe. She looks in vain to recover her loss, but nowhere is it to be found. Not having any more money to buy a new pair, she is very much vexed.

She reads in a newspaper an advertisement that a gentleman has found a very pretty little shoe and that he will be glad to return same to the owner any day. The young lady is convinced that the shoe belongs to her and decides to call on the gentleman. In the meantime, several other girls who have read the advertisemnt, see an opportunity of seeing the gentleman. When all these girls call on the man, he is very much provoked over the trouble that he has had with all the callers. There is not a pretty girl among all those who appeared. At last the young girl makes her appearance and the shoe fits her to perfection.

The gentleman is fascinated with her and asks permission to call. The girl accepts. They fall in love and are shortly after married. The newspapers devote much space to the romance of the Cinderella up-to-date. Old maids and young girls are very much excited over the news and consider it a good method of securing a husband. The shoe store is besieged by ladies who purchase the best shoes. Each of the girls loses a shoe and hides herself until some gentleman picks it up. Then the girl leaves her place of concealment and at once lays claim to the shoe, incidentally complimenting the man very profusely. Some of the girls are successful in getting lovers, others are less fortunate.

The last girl has an original idea. She attaches a string to a shoe and as soon as the man, who happens to be in this instance a poor invalid soldier, has picked it up, she runs quickly to him and thanks him very much. He likes her and they agree to marry. Length, about 950 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

ROMANCE IN THE ANDES.—A beautifully colored and cleverly portrayed picture representing life in the Andes Mountains of South America. The magnificent natural scenery forms a fitting background for the excellent subject, making the picture one worth while seeing.

Tom Toro, a cow puncher, while passing a stable, discovers an Indian stealing a goat, and after giving the miscreant a thrashing drives him away from the place. The thieving Indian swears vengeance on Tom, and with other members of the tribe, keeps a close lookout for his enemy, awaiting the right opportunity to get revenge. One day Tom goes for a little jaunt through the country with his sweetheart Maud, the latter riding in her trap, while Tom rides alongside on horseback. As they near a turn in the road they discover a large log obstructing the path, and Tom is obliged to dismount to remove the obstacle. Immediately the Indians, who are in hiding, spring out and attack Tom; binding him hand and foot they carry him off. Maud who is unable to lend assistance hurries home and gives the alarm, and soon Tom's friends are on the trail of the Indians, ready to give assistance to the helpless prisoner. Fortune favors them, for while they are passing through the woods, they come upon the daughter of the chief of the tribe, whom they take prisoner, to hold as security for the return to liberty of their friend Tom. They send a note to the chief, informing him of their action, and demanding the immediate release of Tom, otherwise the girl must pay the penalty with her life. The chief, thus cornered, is obliged to obey, and Tom is released from captivity, going straightway to meet his faithful friends. Upon seeing Tom, the Indian girl is released and hastens back to the tribe. The bloodthirsty Indian who is determined to get revenge, has followed Tom from the camp and is just about to attack him, when prevented by Maud, who fires, killing the ruffian on the spot.

THE BOGUS HEIR.—This is an exceptionally funny picture abounding with many droll situations, caused by the effrontery of Jack, an indolent fellow who happens to pick up a letter which Count Galmier has just dropped. The letter is from the count's attorney, informing the lucky nobleman that a large fortune has been left to him through the death of his grandmother. Realizing at once the importance of the lucky find, Jack calls upon the attorney, who becoming reassured on the production of the letter, furnishes the imposter with ready money and gives him a letter of credit to all the tradespeople. Mr. Jack has a glorious time on the easy money, dressed in the finest clothes with a luxurious flat at his disposal, he spends money like a good fellow. Soon the rightful heir puts in his appearance, and once more poor Jack is precipitated into his former state of poverty, while the unfortunate lawyer whose fate is no less serious, is compelled to pay all the tradespeople out of his own pocket, for the extravagance of happy Jack.

THE GAMBLER.—This cleverly portrayed drama depicts the life of a foolish gambler who sacrifices his family's happiness that he might have money to throw across the gaming table. In the first picture we see the gambler entering the gambling den, leaving his wife and child on the street, unheeding their plea to come home with them. He is a heavy loser, and returns home penniless, where he vows to his good wife that he will never play again. The poor woman has to sacrifice her jewels that she might have money to buy bread, and when her husband learns that there is more money in the house, he awaits his opportunity and steals it, after which he returns to the gambling den to try his luck once more. When the wife learns of his rash act from her little daughter, who saw her father take the money, the disheartened woman decides to end it all. She locks up the room, and turns on the gas with the hope of suffocating herself and child. The gambler this time has been more fortunate, and is successful in breaking the bank. He returns home in high glee, but upon reaching the door of his apartment, is horrified to detect the odor of gas. The terrified man breaks down the door and enters the room where he finds the inanimate forms of his wife and child. He quickly opens the window, and it is not long before the fresh air has the desired effect upon the victims, and they soon regain their senses. At last the gambler realizes the enormity of his rash acts, and vows to reform. He tears up the cards and taking his wife and child in his arms, swears upon his honor, to never enter a gambling den again.

GROTESQUE MIXUP.—As might be imagined from the title of this extremely funny picture it is one of those subjects which is inadequate of description. It is a grotesque mixup from start to finish and will be the source of great amusement to the most critical audiences.

Two funny fellows appear upon the scene and perform some very funny stunts in a knockabout act, relying somewhat on the ingenuity of the camera to make their already funny work more effective and amusing.

BUFFALO RACING IN MADIERA.—This richly colored picture was taken in Asia Minor, where the natives who have marked sporting proclivities amuse themselves in a rather exciting and strenuous manner by racing wild buffalos. The half savage beasts are harnessed to frail vehicles driven by the natives, and when they are let loose and the race begins it is certainly an exciting bit of sport. They drive through the swamps and mire for a great distance, while the excited spectators cheer them on to victory. Finally exhausted and almost failing in their traces they arrive at their destination, where the prize winners receive their reward.

LIFE BEHIND THE SCENES.—We have a decidedly original conception in this film, which is very cleverly gotten up and reveals that touch of realism so greatly appreciated by the majority of animated picture enthusiasts.

The opening picture reveals the interior of a theater where a play is being produced, and we see the actors grouped around the table hearing a sumptuous feast which is given in the palace of Louis XIV. After the play we see the man who played the part of Louis, dismantled of his royal apparel, in a cheap restaurant, dining on a few slices of sausage, washed down by a cheap substitute for wine.

Next we see a stage hero of the most approved type, who evokes the greatest appreciation by his gallant deeds. Behind the scenes, his cowardice is apparent, for in a quarrel with a scene shifter, he gets the worst of the deal.

A poor orphan is next seen on the stage. She is starving and implores in vain the assistance of the passersby. After the fall of the curtain the orphan meets a group of her admirers, and they take supper at a high class cafe amidst the splendor of riches.

Next appears the Gold King of the stage. The famous financier, who can change the whole aspect of the stock market in a moment, sits conducting his affairs in the security of a luxurious office. On leaving the theater after the play, the actor receives a note from a restaurant keeper to the effect that he will not have another meal until he has settled his debts. The poor hungry artist applies to the manager for a loan on his week's salary, but is met with a prompt refusal.

BURGLAR IN THE TRUNK.—A comedy of unlimited merit, very cleverly acted by one of our best comedians who infuses into the picture a great amount of humor, making the many droll situations extremely amusing and refreshing.

A burglar breaks into a house, and is in the act of pilfering, when he hears footsteps approaching. Finding detectives the fellow jumps into a trunk and pulls the lid down. The occupants of the house are about to depart for the country, and thinking that the trunk is filled with clothing, they accordingly fasten down the lid, and lock poor Mr. Burglar inside. The latter's troubles now commence, for the trunk is sent off, and as can be imagined it is handled in no gentle way by the express men who come to remove it. The amount of banging and knocking about that it receives on its journey is not to be expressed in mere words. Finally it reaches its desination, and the burglar when released from his cramped position is in no fit condition to continue committing further felonies for some time to come.

MOUNTEBANK'S WATCHCASE.—This funny comedy opens showing two mountebanks giving a performance on the street, and when they are not successful in raising a little money among their numerous spectators, they turn away disheartened. They hit upon a better scheme, however, to get rich quickly. One of the pair feigns sickness, and when a person stops to lend his assistance, the crook steals his watch and swallows it. This performance is repeated a number of times with great success. Finally those who have been duped by the clever pair discover their losses, and report to the police. They follow the pair, and when they are searched there is no sign of the stolen goods, so they are again turned loose. The policemen then miss their watches, and knowing that the culprits have some secret about their mode of thieving they are shadowed by the crowd. The fellows enter their lodgings and to the horror of the police and victims who are peeking through a keyhole, one of the men is seen taking all the stock of watches out of his stomach. The police break in the door and the pair of mountebanks are made short work of.

NO MAN'S LAND.—Tom Black, an adventure-loving American, sails on an expedition to the South seas. A typhoon strikes the ship and she is driven many miles out of her course. Finally the vessel strikes a hidden reef and is dashed to pieces by the fury of the waves. The entire crew is lost with the exception of young Black, who seizes a broken spar and clings to it throughout the night, landing next day on an apparently desolate island where he finds on the shore among the wreckage a sailor's chest and a keg of brandy.

Now it happens that the island upon which young Black has been cast is inhabited by the old Spanish recluse and his only daughter, and a few natives who are devoted to old Castro, "the white-bearded chief," as they call him. The daughter, Beatrice, is equally beloved and has been promised in marriage to Chino, a native chief of half Castilian blood. So powerful is the influence of Castro over the islanders, that he has been made dictator of the little province, over which the nation's flag is seen. "No Man's Land" is the name given it on the chart, and by that title it is known.

Some days after the wreck old Castro, his daughter and two burly slaves, his bodyguard, are walking along the beach, when they are startled by the appearance of a stranger, who is making his way over the rocks ahead of them. The old man commands Beatrice to return to the bungalow, while he proposes to investigate the reason for the stranger's intrusion on their little island. Tom soon makes Castro understand how he happened to be on his domains. Bidding the aged man follow him, he leads him into his cave and shows him the rough abode in which he has obtained shelter. Offering the old man a sip of brandy from the cask, he is delighted to see with what evident relish he partakes of it. "Come now to my home, stranger, and bring your cask of cheer," cries the old recluse. "You are welcome to make your home with me and mine." Bidding one of the slaves fetch the cask, the party sets out for Castro's bungalow, which is situated some distance back from the beach.

Beatrice is just telling her devoted maids of the presence on the island of a handsome stranger, when the object of their conversation comes into view arm in arm with old Castro. Tom is astonished by the apparition that greets his eyes as he approaches the abbode of his new friend. A maiden of surprising loveliness he thinks, as, taking the hand of Beatrice, he presses it to his lips in admiration.

Bidding him feel at home, the old man orders a feast to be prepared. Just then Chino, the native suitor of Beatrice, hearing of the stranger's presence, hastens to investigate. Finding him seated near his inamorata, the jealous suitor shows his annoyance by refusing the proffered hand of the stranger. Calling Castro aside, he voices his uneasiness, but is laughed down by the guileless old recluse, who, cheered by the influence of the liquor, can see no harm in the presence of the genial stranger. Chino departs in anger, and for several days absents himself from Castro's house.

In the meantime Beatrice has begun to feel an interest in the stranger that strongly approaches love. Being shut away from the world and seeing only the swarthy faces of the natives about her, it is little wonder that one of her own color should awaken a deeper feeling within her breast than mere friendship.

At last Tom tells his love to Beatrice and receives the confession of the maiden's heart. For a while the two young people are extremely happy, but a shadow crosses their path in the shape of the jealous Chino, who, seeing the lovers together.

convinces Castro of his daughter's love for the castaway.

Bound in honor to keep his word to Chino, the old man's anger is aroused at the discovery, and the young American is forbidden to cross his threshold again or hold further communication with his daughter. Tom returns sadly to his cavern home, while Beatrice is dragged back to her father's house, there to remain in seclusion until her marriage with Chino.

But the plucky young lady is not so easily subdued. Watching her opportunity, she makes her escape and hurries away to seek her sweetheart. Her absence is soon discovered by the irat father, who, summoning his slaves and sending for Chino, soon takes up the chase after his runaway child.

Beatrice has no sooner reached her lover's retreat than she hears the approaching pursuers. Bidding her fear not, Tom seizees a heavy cudgel and the two lovers hurry away just as the father and his party arrive. Chino sees the flying couple and dashes after them, overtaking them as they are going through a crevice in the rocks. He attempts to cut the American down with his sword, but the young athlete is too quick for him, and bringing his club down on the descending blade, diverts it from its course. With a yell of rage Chino seizes a spear from one of the slaves and hurls it after Tom, striking him on the leg and bringing him to the ground. Beatrice sees the sad plight of her sweetheart and bravely attempts to defend him with the spear, but is quickly dragged away. Chino is for finishing his enemy then and there, but old Castro bethinks of a fitter punishment, and stays the chieftain's hand. Bidding the slaves carry the wounded American, they ascend to the top of the highest cliff overlooking the sea, and binding their helpless victim, they lower him over the precipice, there to dangle in mid-air as a warning to all who dare to cross the old recluse or disobey his wishes.

Young Black is in a bad way, and only a miracle saves him. A passing gunboat cruising in the Southern waters discerns the castaway's signal of distress flying from the mouth of the save, and sends a boat ashore to investigate. Beatrice sees this boat, and breaking loose from her tormentors dashes towards the sailors, who are just coming through the surf. Screaming out her plea for help, she makes them understand her lover's peril, and no time is lost in reaching the dizzy heights and dragging the half-dead man back to life.

Tom is quickly revived, and, accompanied by his fair one, the rescuers conduct them to the boat and the lovers climb aboard. Old Castro rages and storms. The boat is pushing off. He rushes out into the surt to hurl one last curse at his daughter, when two burly tars seize the astonished old fellow and bundle him into the boat. It is thus old Castro against his will accompanies the two young people back to America, where he finally forgives them and consents to their marriage.

BRITON AND BOER.—The story opens just before the Boer War at the farm house of John De Larey, just outside Kimberly, S. A. John's family are Boer's with all the strange customs and fierce hatreds of this mansplanted people—all except his oldest daughter Gretchen. She has attended the English school at Kimberly, and while there met and fell in love with Allen Hornby, superintendent of the mines. Knowing that her father's people mean to fight the English, she tells Allen to demand his consent to their marriage. Allen replies, "And if he refuses?" Then comes a true woman's answer—"A woman's heart belongs t oher husband or lover, not to any country or any overhears Piet Cronje tell her father to prepare for war, and that he intends to seize the mines. Gretchen sees Hans, a young Boer whom her father wished her to marry, receive from Cronje a message to the Commondoes in their district, which meant Allen's capture, if Hans delivered it. She by a clever ruse steals both the message and Han's horse and rides into Kimberley to warn the man she loves. The message is missed, she is pursued, and then at the bottom of the shaft she renounces her people and casts her lot with Allen.

Three months later we see a relief train outside of Kimberly with its traction engine, outspans of oxen and marching Highlanders. Then we are with Piet Cronje at Kleppersdorf where he captures the native dispatch bearers and the news these dispatches contain causes him to lay a trap for Hornby's scouts, a body of men the superintendent has organized and is leading against the Boers. They ride into the trap and in the stirring battle that follows only escape annihilation when a passing regiment of Gordon Highlanders comes to their rescue.

We then follow the fortunes of Cronje and his principal lieutenant, John De Larey, through a series of battles that lead up to that last fatal stand at Paradesburge where the greatest general flag." De Larey does refuse his consent. Gretchen of modern times, the unconquered Bohs of England, Lord Roberts, outwits the Boers and forces Cronje to surrender. Hans and De Larey escape the net and ride into Kimberly at night. De Larey seeks out his daughter determined to kill her for her treachery to the Boer cause. Her husband, Allen Hornby, arrives in time to defeat this plan and in the fight that follows Hans is killed.

Our closing scene occurs at Hornby's home two years after the war. Old De Larey, broken and desitute, comes to beg his daughter's forgiveness and meets with a reception that insures his passing his declining years by the fireside of the man he had so bitterly hated, but now sees is a noble man, a gentleman and one who bears no malice.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

AWAKENED MEMORIES.—Opening in a quaint city, the film shows us a happy couple of the laboring class strolling along the river front. As they pass a little flower girl the youth buys for his sweetheart a bunch of May lilies. In an exceedingly true to life scene he presents them to her and asks her hand in marriage. Several dainty scenes during their betrothal are next shown in perfect photography, followed by hits of the life in their new home after the marriage.

Time passes and a little girl comes to bless their union and make life even more beautiful for them. After a few years of absolute happiness they receive word of a strike at the factory in which the husband is employed. The leaders overcome his aversion to trouble by making him secretary of the organization.

Swift poverty comes to the little home, while the cue-time happy wife is neglected in favor of meetings and speeches and carousings of the men.

Hunder next assails the little household, but while their families suffer, the misguided husband, and his associates, still attempt to gain the concessions which they have asked of the factory owners. Finally, in despair, the wife goes to the factory where she gains a promise of work for her husband if he will return.

Now, in order to get him to leave the trouble makers and return to his shop, she secures a basket of the memory laden May lilies. She then takes her little girl to a corner which she knows the father will pass. Here she leaves the little lady to sell them.

As the poor woman expected, when her husband with one of his friends comes upon his own baby selling flowers in the street, he is touched with the memory of the days when first he bought flowers for his wife. Following these thoughts he realizes how he has made her suffer and how thoughtless he has been in his devotion to the men.

The picture happily ends by showing his remorse and repentance.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE TWO MR. WHITES.—John White, a spruce man-about-town, receives an invitation from a friend to spend a week-end with him at his country place. As the friend is confined to his home by illness, he promises that some good fellows will meet White at the station and bring him out to the house. White is delighted with the suggestion and starts for the train. Meanwhile Jonathan White, a noted temperance reformer, receives an invitation from the local branch of the Sons of Temperance to address a meeting, and he takes the same train. Both men are carrying suit cases marked with their names, and when Jonathan White is seen on the station platform the crowd of good fellows hustle him into an automobile and off for the house. The Sons of Temperance make John White welcome to their city and start uptown with him. On the way he suggests stopping in for a drink. They are horrified, but follow him into the saloon, thinking it to be the opening for some temperance agitation, but their hopes are dispelled when five beers are set before them and White half drains his glass at a single thirsty gulp. They hurry to the sidewalk, where he joins them and the matter is still being discussed when Jonathan happens upon them. He has been forced to drink with his reception committee and has jumped out of the window to escape further indignities. One glauce at his face and another at the two suit cases explains the mixup, and John White completes their confusion by absentmindedly suggesting "Let's all go in and have another drink on the strength of it." The Sons of Temperance flee the society of the wicked and John White at last finds his friends and enjoys a hearty laugh over the odd mixup. This is another of the Vitagraph's delightful little comedies in which the humor is so obvious as to appeal to everyone, while it is kept a comedy and not permitted to become a clowning farce. It will win laugbs from everyone and the incidents are so tactfully handled that not even a temperance reformer can find offense in the production. If your audiences like comedy—and they all do—this is the sort they like best. Approximate length, 543 feet.

HE FELL IN LOVE WITH HIS WIFE—"Man's love is of his life a thing apart." Robert Kendrick is bored by his pretty wife's endearments. He loves her, but the honeymoon is over and he no longer considers it necessary to make the pretty speeches that once were her delight. He does not realize her heart hunger for the loving words, the caress that is the food of love, and her timid advances irritate him. In despair she conceives the idea of arousing his jealousy. Three of his man friends are his guests and she confides her plan to them. At first they are reluctant to even appear to be making love to their host's wife, but her pleas are effective and they have noticed his coldness. One after the other each contrives that Kendrick shall oversee some apparently tender passage. At the first sight he is indignant, the second flirtation adds to his anger, but at the third tableau he sees his passion is roused and furiously he accuses her of unfaithfulness. Then the plot is explained and to his surprise Kendrick finds that post-honeymoon kisses have not lost their savor and that he still is very much in love with his wife. A dainty little story told in a series of spirited scenes enacted in the grounds of one of the handsomest private estates in America. The settings never have been surpassed in motion photography and the story, though not wholly new in theme, is given an entirely new aspect through clever treatment by producer and players.

ENTOMBED ALIVE.—A very free adaptation of a French classic which introduces the company of Italian players recently added to the Vitagraph Stock Company. Camilla Frugoni is so unfortunate as to attract the attention of Luigi Zuccari, a miserly old man, to whom her father is under heavy financial obligations. For his sake she is polite to the withered old usurer, but she shrinks from his touch and barely can endure his presence. Guido Marini, a handsome young fellow, is her heart's choice and expects some day to be accepted by the family as her husband. The match is approved by her parents and she looks forward to the time when they shall be united. But Zuccari is determined to win her, and when her father defaults in his payments the miser presses him for a settlement and at last makes formal demand for the money due, threatening to have Frugoni thrown into jail unless he meets the obligation. There is hope that the money presently will be forthcoming when Frugoni's ship comes to port, but even as they are discussing the matter a sailor arrives with the evil news that the ship is a total loss. Zuccari offers to cancel the note if Camilla will promise to marry him and in despair the girl gives her hand to save her father from imprisonment and ruin. It is the hand alone she gives, for union with the old dotard is worse than death, and she shrinks from his caresses. Zuccari knows of her love for Guido and wrongs her by suspecting her of infidelity. He pretends to go on a journey and Guido, seeing him depart, is unable to withstand the temptation to see her once more. She is delighted when he comes to her and pours for him a glass of wine. They have just settled down for a chat when Zuccari is heard returning and she begs him to conceal himself in a closet. The miser perceives her agitation and his suspicions are aroused, for in her terror she has forgotten her dislike and is unusually demonstrative. He asks why two wine glasses are filled and her explanation that she poured one for him when she heard him coming does not satisfy him. He questions her closely, but she denies that anyone has been there. A noise in the closet confirms his suspicions. He commands her to swear that no one is concealed there and she makes oath. Masons are working on the garden wall, a part of which is falling down, and Zuccari sends for them and orders the arch to be walled up. Closely he watches her face, but she does not give way until the wall is breast high and rapidly being completed. To save Guido she confesses his presence and Zuccari sends the workmen away. He throws her to the ground and is strangling her to death when Guido, hearing her cries, breaks open the door and, throwing down the barrier, is about to engage the old man in combat when the heart disease, from which Zuccari has been shown to be suffering, again attacks him and over the dead body of the dotard the lovers are united. The story is intensely dramatic and is told in graphic pantomime by a troupe of finished palyers well known to Italian theatergoers of Rome and other centers. The production has been made with unusual care and the tragic story is unfolded rapidly and with entire clearness. Approximate length, 994 feet.

THE BRACELET.—A woman's noble sacrifice. An artist, Mr. Woolward, is madly in love with Miss Ford, an actress. She poses as his model, but as he is not successful in painting her portrait, he makes her an excuse that she is too beautiful to reproduce on canvas. The actress, who is not averse to flattery, notices that he is very much in love with her, and she decides to amuse herself by playing with his feelings. She asks him to prove his love by buying her a most expensive diamond bracelet, and to show his great love for her, the artist sells everything he possesses, and buys her the desired bracelet with the money thus obtained. This extravagance however leaves him absolutely penniless, and he is forced to visit and obtain a loan from a friend, a chemist who is at work in his laboratory. While at the laboratory he carelessly tampers with some boiling chemicals, which causes a disastrous explosion. The result is that the artist is badly injured and taken to the hospital. During his illness he is visited by the actress. Shortly after, he leaves the hospital totally blind, the result of the accident. He naturally goes to appeal to his former sweetheart for whom he had sacrified all he had, but as he is now a poor cripple, she refuses to see him. A year later we find the poor blind man begging in the streets, and on one of his begging excursions he is run down by a motor car, of which a lady and gentleman are the occupants. The gentleman kindly helps the beggar up, takes him home in the auto and instructs the servants to render him every assistance. After he has been attended to, the lady appears to find out the condition of the invalid, and to her great surprise, she recognizes in him her old sweetheart, the artist. It was she, the actress, who was on her way home from the theater in her friend's motor car. When she sees the artist in such a pitiable condition, she realizes that she has done him a great wrong, and her better nature asserts itself. She consoles him with kind words, and when the gentleman comes into the room to escort her home, she tells him that her place is now by the side of the blind man. In the last scene we see them happily married, she devoting her life to her husband to make up for the wrong she had done him in former years. This subject will prove a big favorite, as it is a decidedly interesting story of real life.

MEXICAN'S CRIME.—The opening scene of this picture shows a concert hall of the West, and a Spanish dancer performing. After finishing her dance she goes among the spectators for money, and Jim Belden is the favored of them all. Alvers, a Mexican, resents this, and when scorned by the Spanish girl, draws a knife. Jim soon masters him and he is obliged to leave the place. A new admirer enters, and in the excitement of tormenting him, a shot is fired through the window which fells the dancer to the ground. Jim points to the window and all rush to it and see the Mexican mounting and riding off. The cowboys then mount their horses and go in pursuit. The Mexican sees he is being followed, but succeeds in hoodwinking his pursuers by leading his horse off the trail, and after the men pass he rides back over it, joining a band of Mexicans, who, upon hearing his trouble, go away with him. The cowboys, after much hard riding, decide to camp for the night, and after their fires are made they are surrounded by the Mexicans. A fierce conflict ensues, in which many on both sides are wounded. One cowboy, however, succeeds in capturing the guilty Mexican. After caring for the injured ones, the cowboys proceed to prepare for their homeward march, dragging the Mexican along with them. When they reach the concert hall the dancer identifies the Mexican, who pleads for mercy. This is refused him, and he is later taken away by the Sheriff to be punished for his crime. The picture ends with a tableau of the Spanish dancer holding the hands of her two admirers.

Any one of these hustling offices will supply you with the choicest and finest film hits from the fifty-seven INDEPENDENT manufacturers of America and Europe! And any one of them will go the very limit and see that you get a service that will fatten your receipts week after week. Not only that, but you'll get the kind of treatment that you're entitled to—no matter who you are. There's not a grouch on my staff. That's only one of the many reasons why I am the biggest and best film renter in the world. Don't be satisfied with the same old sing-song, lub-dub films you've been using. Get the new, live, virile stuff. I've got it!

"Gee! What a Classy Outfit and Clear Steady Pictures" was the remark of everybody who saw the

Hallberg

Exhibit at the Electrical Show at Madison Square Garden last week.

The "Hallberg" Automatic Electric Economizer

furnished the powerful current and saved 60 per cent. on the electric bill.

The Motiograph M. P. Machine produced the steady, flickerless pictures.

"Electra" Pink Label Carbon

gave the white brilliant light.

"Hallberg" Exhaust Fans

kept the air fresh and cool.

put everybody in the lime-light.

If you have not the above equipment you do not get the best results. Let me give you an estimate on a new outfit. It will pay you, as the difference is wonderful with the "HALLBERG" apparatus. I sold 26 new outfits and exchanged seven old machines and a lot of current savers, during the Electrical Show—These buyers knew a good thing when they saw it.

"DESTINY"

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 8th

A splendid, high-class drama that will grip the human interest from the jump and hold it until the last foot is reeled off. The kind of stuff you and I have wanted for years but had a darned time getting. Length about 850 feet and no cheating on measurements. Ask for it. And, by the way, is your name on my regular weekly mailing list, Mr. Exhibitor? If not, send it in. I want you to get all the bulletins I'm firing out every week.

ISN'T THIS A DANDY LETTER?

It's from the NATIONAL BOARD OF CENSORSHIP, and you know what that means. Read it: "Gentlemen, we wish to congratulate you upon the choice of subject and the interesting presentation of the film entitled "HIAWATHA," the first product of your company. It is an auspicious beginning for a new company and one that will no doubt help in many ways to dignify the motion picture theater. Wishing you continued success, we remain, Very truly yours, NATIONAL BOARD OF CENSORSHIP, by Walter Storey, Censorship Secretary."

Have you had "HIAWATHA" yet? And "LOVE'S STRATAGEM"? Yes? Then you'll insist on getting "DESTINY."

THE CATTLE THIEVES

A STORY OF THE CANADIAN NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE

LENGTH 860 FEET

Following the great Boer War film of Oct. 29, which has been pronounced by all of the trade paper critics as the acme of realism, we offer Another Great Canadian Production, THE CATTLE THIEVES, a story of the Northwest Mounted Police, for Friday Nov. 5. Remember the date, and get it if you can. This marvelous production introduces for the first time to the American public the heroes of the NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE, generally conceded to be the most wonderful organization of trained men in the world. These men, with the assistance of our own big stock company and under our own direction, have given us a thrilling story of the great Northwest, with a realism and wealth of detail which must be seen to be appreciated.

And to cap the climax, "The Cattle Thieves" is simply superb in photography, and will be printed on the new improved Eastman Noninflammable Stock, which is much tougher and more durable than the earlier output of this stock.

The N. I. Film.

Every new introduction to the photographic market has to run the gauntlet of objection and experience. It is seldom put out so perfect as to obviate objection. Let us make clear what we mean. Many of the readers of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD made collodion photographs. Then came the new vehicle for the silver salts, washed and dried gelatine. In other words, the photographer exposes a film of silver bromide in perfectly clear gelatine instead of wet collodion. But what trouble there was between 1879 and 1885 in the use of the new gelatine plates! Photographers did not know how to use them. The gelatine itself was exposed to all sorts of vagaries. It cracked, it peeled, it decomposed. After a time, however, all this trouble ceased, and the gelatine plate is now a well-established article of regular use.

Much the same sort of thing is going on with regard to the new non-inflammable film which is being used for moving picture films by the licensed manufacturers. The latter have had some difficulties, we know. The film is not thick enough, consequently it has not stood wear and tear so well as it should have done. Then there have been other complaints as to its brittleness and its general early perishability. Possibly this is due to the handling or method of handling adopted by the film companies; possibly to the limited amount of experience which the Eastman Company have had in the manufacture of the new product. Anyhow, whatever be the cause, it is satisfactory to learn that the Eastman Company, always a broad-minded, progressive concern, are doing their utmost to improve the film day by day, and from what we know of the past history of this company, we are confident that they will succeed in their work of making the film—shall we say, fool proof? No, we will put it complaint proof. The exhibitor and exchange man should therefore make a note of what is being done to remove all possible causes of objection to the new film in use. For, looked at fairly and squarely, the non-inflammable film is a great introduction. At one stroke it removes an ever-present danger to the film business—a danger in itself so great that insurance companies and legislative bodies have been forced to take cognizance of it. It is no use blinking the fact, ordinary celluloid is a very combustible product, and there is a great deal of carelessness in the world. These two factors have combined to imbue the insurance and legislative mind with a conviction that a moving picture show is a danger to the public safety, so that prohibitive rates and adverse enactments have endangered the stability and profitability of the moving picture as a factor in trade. Now the general use of non-inflammable film will neutralize, if it does not remove, all these troubles, consequently it should be to the interest of exchanges and exhibitors to co-operate with the Eastman Company and the manufacturers who are striving to improve the standard of the product. Employees should be taught to handle it more carefully and store it under conditions which will prevent its becoming brittle. Pans of water should be placed in the vaults, and the film should not be exposed longer than necessary to the heat of the operating booth. So far as we can discover, there have been no public objections to the film. The public, indeed, is generally satisfied with the quality of the pictures presented to them.

By the way, it just occurs to us to suggest that wherever possible, moving picture exhibitors should make it known amongst their patrons that non-inflammable film is used for the pictures. This will allay much simmering mistrust of celluloid.

The Qualities of Imported Films.

We have seldom devoted more time and thought to the study of moving picture films, in the course of our weekly work, than to the series of pictures imported into the United States by the Film Import and Trading Company and now in course of release by that concern. Imported films have got a bad name—a name which dates back to last Spring. That bad name has clung to them all the Summer, and, as our own pages show, while this bad name may be entirely justified, yet, judged by the standard that the MOVING PICTURE WORLD has erected, it is in parts very seriously open to criticism. It is open to criticism first of all in regard to unsuitability and obscurity of incident, both photographical and historical. It is open to criticism, too, because more often than not European films handle the sixth commandment too freely and therefore the subject is unsuitable for the average American audience. For this has to be said for the American manufacturers, that even in the darkest days of the brutal and criminal film, they stopped short of the gilded obscenity and veiled indecency of many imported films.

But, to the credit of their intelligence, let it be said that those firms who have recently entered the importing field are thoroughly alive to the exigencies of the American market. Speaking generally, we know that the Great Northern, the Film Import and Trading Company, MacMillan, Laemmle and others are quite alive to the desirability of selecting suitable subjects; and we have no doubt that anything which has hitherto been considered objectionable on the screen will be rigorously excluded. Now we come to the acting and photographic qualities of these pictures—the technique of the work, in fact; and here we must perforce generalize, although there are one or two particular cases that we will have to cite to support our generalities. Generally speaking, therefore, we may say that the best of the imported independent film in this country is quite the equal of the best of the licensed imported film. Here we are looking at the matter entirely from the production and photographic point of view. The independent manufacturers in Europe employ the best acting and producing talent; they employ the best photographic talent, and the result of their work is now seen in this country in the shape of such magnificent subjects as "Nero and the Burning of Rome," a Film Import release which is already the talk and admiration of the moving picture trade. When we saw this picture the other day we sat in simple amazement at the marvelous manner in which the production had been staged, artistically dressed, lighted and photographed. We seemed, for all the world, to be looking on a production of Mansfield, Irving or some great producing actor who is determined to give the public a chef d'ouvre. It was no simple comedy scene, but one demanding all the magnificent effects of ancient Rome shown with perfect literality. Gorgeousness of procession, brilliancy of costume and acting, and finally the great conflagration of Rome: such a marvelous realism of effect that as we sat and watched this colored part of the film we seemed, as it were, to hear the cries of the victims. The story of Nero the tyrant, of course, is familiar to every schoolboy. After Nero has fiddled over the burning of Rome, he is haunted by visions of murdered people and finally dies a miserable death by the sword.

Now, in work of this kind, the independent import reaches the very high water mark of film production. Money without stint must have been lavished on this picture, which in all our experience of moving picture films seems to us difficult to excel in the photographic and productional aspects. We single this film out for special reference because its qualities demand praise; on the other hand, there are pictures about to be released which are perhaps not so striking in effect, but which may be somewhat obscure in subject; nevertheless, they are very good photographs. Not all imported films can be feature films any more than all films made in this country can be features. The business aspect of the matter, of course, is a compromise.

Our object in writing this article is to present the case for the importations fairly and dispassionately to the readers of this paper and to the exhibitors of the United States. To come out with wholesale condemnation of it as "junk" is a vicious and deliberate falsehood. No honorable licensed manufacturer, no honorable man on the licensed side, would or could say such a thing. But the libel has gone forth, it is repeated and repeated again, and the mischief it does is of an incurable nature. It is time, therefore, that this piece of mendacity was nailed down once and for all, and that in respect of the quality of imported film the independent side should have their case impartially and justly stated.

The Moving Picture Operators' Union of New York City has, as it will be seen, secured a charter from the Theatrical Workers' Alliance which automatically lines them up with that body throughout the United States and Canada. By this means the New York operators become unionized and are thus placed in a position to regulate wages and control their members. This means in effect that there is a probability of the whole of the moving picture operators in Canada and the United States being welded into a solid body for protective purposes. Of course the receipt of the charter is the beginning of a new order of things. The membership lists of the Union should largely augment and the movement become general throughout the North American continent. We congratulate those concerned on the success of this step and we expect them to live up to their new charter so that they may succeed in lining up the whole of the operating body throughout the country, so that the interests of the members may be protected, efficient service guaranteed to every theater and the public feel assured that the operating end of matters is always in skilled, competent, well-paid hands. This is the programme before the New York men, and they are acting in such a businesslike way that we are confident that they will carry out the programme to the foot of the letter.

The Modern Moving Picture Theatre.

CHAPTER VIII.

KEEPING FAITH WITH YOUR PUBLIC.

Last week we told the moving picture theater exhibitor of the various ways open to him of getting in touch with his public; having done that, we now ask him to keep faith with his public. We ask him to give the public a consistent program, or, in other words, to quote the old showman's phrase, to let the public see inside what they see advertised outside, or vice-versa. In other words, whatever program is announced outside the theater should surely be seen inside. Many houses, or, rather, most of those we have recently visited, sin more or less in this respect. Even in the best known house it is common to interpellate with the day's releases an old subject unannounced. Possibly the object of this is to assure the public that they are getting an extra attraction for their money. We do not quarrel with this policy, but we do suggest that these interpellated items should be put on the program.

But this is a minor matter. It is not uncommon for exhibitors to go to the other extreme. They often advertise three or four films for a Saturday or Sunday evening, but only show one, or perhaps two. An instance of this came under our own observation on a recent Sunday. A refined New York moving picture theater advertised three reels, and people who went into the house to see a certain picture, never saw it. One reel, a song and a vaudeville act were repeated three times in succession as chasers. This is a common occurrence.

What is the effect of this policy upon the public? They become disappointed, they disbelieve the management, and they do not repeat their visits. The moving picture theater manager cannot be too specific in the matter of his program, nor too loyal in giving the public what he advertises to do. Better give them a little more than a little less, and best of all is to give them what you advertise to give them; so that in the minds of the public there may be instilled the conviction that a certain program can always be relied upon.

There is too much uncertainty about the ordinary program of a moving picture theater. This is contrary to the best theatrical practice. With the ordinary theater it is a maxim: Do not disappoint your public; keep faith with it at all cost and your public will be loyal. It will come, and come again. Take your ordinary vaudeville and theater house and it will be found that the management of it is very scrupulous in this regard and that the actors and actresses are always scrupulous in fulfilling their engagements. This is the spirit that we desire to see enforced in moving picture theaters.

This question of the program is of cardinal importance in the running of a modern picture house. Only last week we printed a letter from an exhibitor who seems to have got down to the business in a supreme manner. He issues a printed program and he adheres to it, and that is the whole point of this article.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Bell Wiring.

Where there is simply the installation of one bell to consider it is a very simple matter. Test your bell or buzzer (a "buzzer" is just a bell without the bell part) by holding the binding posts of a battery against the binding posts of the bell. If it don't ring either the battery or the bell is not right. If it is a new battery it is pretty sure to be the bell which is at fault. After testing fasten your bell and push button in place where you want them to be. Run a wire from one battery binding post to one side of the push button. Run a wire from the remaining side of the battery to one side of the bell and run a wire from the remaining side of the bell to the remaining side of the push button and the job is done. Where two batteries are used connect the zinc of one with the carbon of the other with a short piece of wire, using the remaining posts for your connections as above set forth. Where more than two batteries are to be used for any purpose connect the first two as above and connect the next and remaining ones the same way. This is series connection and will raise the voltage.

Few there seem to be who understand the three wire system of wiring bells. This system is the most economical of any in amount of wire used and it contemplates the ringing of any number of bells from one battery, each bell being run by its own push button and no other. Nor will any push button ring any other bell than its own. The system is quite simple and easily understood. Common No. 18 cotton covered bell wire is large enough and good enough unless the distance from button or battery to bell be excessive, which is not likely in a theater. If the wires are to be run through very wet or very damp places they should be rubber covered wires through that space or else be insulated on small porcelain insulators the same as are electric light wires. To install such a system get your bells and batteries and test them all to be sure they are in good working order. Put up the bells (or buzzers) and push buttons wherever you wish them to be. If two batteries are used connect the carbon of one to the zinc of the other by a short piece of wire. Now get three colors of bell wire. The reason for three colors is to avoid mistakes and confusion and to be able to find any particular wire anywhere afterwards, without tracing it clear from the battery or bell. The use of three colors of wire simplifies matters exceedingly. Suppose you get red, blue and white. You take one color, say the blue, and run it from one (either) binding post of the battery to one (either) binding post of each bell. You may run separate wires from the battery binding post to each bell or run one wire reaching all bells or you may branch off to a bell at any point. Next take another color (red, for instance) and run from the other battery binding post to one (either) side of each push button. You now have one side of the battery connected to one side of each bell and the other side of the battery connected to one side of each push button. You next, with the remaining color (white) wire, connect the remaining side of each push button with the remaining side of the bell it is to ring, and the job is done. The blue wire (blue in this case) is called the common bell wire, the red wire is called the push button wire and the whites are called the individual wires. It is these latter wires which determine which bell a button will ring and you may cause a button to ring a different bell by simply changing the individual wire to that bell. Fig. 41 shows a plan of this system. In running your wires they may be, except as before noted, simply stapled to the woodwork with small staples, but you should never run two wires under one staple, since if you drive the staple a trifle tight you may form a short circuit through the iron of the staple. Then, too, if the wire is in a place where it will swing a little the insulation is likely to wear through, thus forming a short circuit even though not clamped tightly by the staple. A short circuit may cause your bell to ring all the time or not ring at all, according to its location. If on the two wires leading to the push button the bell will ring continuously until the battery is worn out. If on the wire running from bell to battery and the wire running from button to bell the bell won't ring at all. Several wires may be run together in a bunch by using wood cleats. An additional bell or buzzer may be installed at any time as follows: Test the bell and install it and its push button wherever you want them to be. Now with a piece of first color wire connect one binding post of the bell with the first color wire already in use wherever you can find it. With a piece of second color wire connect one side of the push button with a second color wire wherever you can find one. Understand you can just tap on to these wires at any point you can locate one of proper color. Now connect the remaining side of the button with the remaining side of the bell with third color wire and the job is done. The rules governing this system of wiring are as follows: One side of the battery must be connected with one side of each bell by first colored wire. The other side of the battery must be connected to one side of each push button with second color wire and the remaining side of each button must be connected with the remaining side of the bell it is to ring with third color wire.

Standardization.

CHAPTER II.

THE SHAPE OF THE PERFORATION.

The exact shape of the perforation is a most important matter, for two principal reasons. First, the holes should run over the sprockets sweetly, and work accurately through the intermittent mechanism of the camera, printer, and projector; and register properly. Second, the shape should be such that the strength of the film and its durability should be diminished by as small an amount as possible. The film must be weakened to some extent by the perforations, and the difference of this weakening effect caused by different shaped holes is very great. Taking all points into consideration, it appears that the shape originated by Edison is the best all-round for use in both negative and positive films.

To see the reason for this, it will be necessary to first examine the shape of sprocket-teeth. Suppose we take a section of a sprocket-tooth, just where it starts from the cylinder, i. e., at the place where the film runs and is driven, and we shall have presented to us a shape very similar to the Edison-shaped hole. To be exact, the shape is somewhat different, in that the rounding of the corners is different. The difference is shown by the diagrams, Figs. 1 and 2:

The curves in Fig. 1 (Edison-shape) being each parts of circles struck from the points "a," while the curves at the corners of the average sprocket-teeth are part of one and the same circle struck from the center of the tooth. When these two shapes are placed one in the other the result is as Fig. 3:

This shows the condition when the teeth of the sprockets are made to fit the holes in the film. Owing to the diversity of styles of perforation, this is never done in practice, for fear that the teeth may have to deal with some films having perforations not suitable to run on them. The real condition found in most commercial machines is more like Fig. 4, in which the teeth of the sprockets are, in both directions, considerably smaller than the perforations, and especially in the direction from "a" to "b."

Now, suppose a perforation to occupy the position on a tooth as shown in Fig. 4, and the tooth to be moving in the direction of the arrow, there will be a tendency to bend the side "c" of the perforation, and after a few times of running, such a film will have a great liability to delvop cracks at the sharp corners "d" and "e." With an Edison-shaped hole, it is obvious that this tendency will be much reduced. If the teeth fitted as shown in Fig. 3, the tendency would be still further reduced, and the durability and exact registration much improved. Unfortunately, until some standard is agreed upon, no approach to a fit like Fig. 3 can be attempted for the following reasons: In the case of a hole smaller in size than the one for which the sprocket-teeth were calculated, destruction of the film would be very rapid, the teeth tearing the holes as they passed under the guide-rollers; and in the case of a hole of about the same area, but of a different shape, being applied to the tooth in question, tearing in one or other direction would be equally certain. Let us look at the case where the hole, shaped as in Fig. 4, is actuated by a properly fitting tooth. This is shown in Fig. 5. It will still be seen that although the curves at the ends of the perforation, and the curves at the corners of the tooth, are struck from the same center, there are still the comparatively sharp corners in the film so liable to start a crack.

In practice the fit of the teeth and perforations could not be made quite as good in proportion as shown in Figs. 3 and 5, respectively; a greater amount of latitude would have to be allowed at the ends "a" and "b," by making the sprocket-teeth more nearly square in section. This allowance is called for by the unstable nature of celluloid, and is to permit of expansion or shrinkage in the width of the film. I hope I have clearly demonstrated the particular suitability for our purpose which is possessed by the Edison-shaped hole. The next point to be considered is the measurement of the same. Without going into history and giving a tedious set of sizes of the many different styles of perforation usually met with during the last few years, I am going to dogmatise and state that the most suitable size for a standard would be near the dimensions of the largest size generally in use, and that a perforation of the size used by Messrs. Pathe Freres would be very suitable. This style has the disadvantage (slight, perhaps) of the comparatively sharp corners seen in Figs. 4 and 5, and the dimensions of these perforations I find as follows:

Width between parallel sides, .073 inch.

Diameter of circle forming curved ends, 0.107 inch.

I am of opinion that a perforation of the shape originated by Edison, and having about the same dimensions as those used by Messrs. Pathe Freres would be the ideal for our purpose, and that the adoption of such a shape would reduce the troubles due to the causes of which I have been writing, to a minimum.

ESSANAY WILL RELEASE TWO REELS.

The Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, makes formal announcement this week of the release of two full reels of film each week, beginning the week of November 15.

This does not come as a surprise, because it is only natural that they prepare to supply increased demand for their product. Enterprise, coupled with a zeal for making superior pictures, has won them a front rank position in the film world. The Essanay Company has aimed at popular taste and they have undoubtedly won in this endeavor. Whether it has been in the field of comedy or drama, every Essanay picture, at least of the last three months, has been remarkably good in choice of subjects, in the splendid interpretation of the stories, while the photographic qualities of the films have also shown improvement.

The New Policy.

The Essanay Company will begin releasing two reels a week, the week beginning November 15, the first release on Wednesday, November 17, the second on Saturday, November 20. The Wednesday release, we are informed, will be confined exclusively to high-class comedy subjects, while the Saturday release will be virtually devoted to stirring Western dramas. Mr. G. M. Anderson, of the Essanay Company, has been in the West the past two months, making Western subjects, and will be there indefinitely. With a stock company of about eight people and competent camera men, this clever producer should turn out some excellent Western stories.

However, though the Saturday release will be chiefly of Western subjects, it will not be fixed to exclude entirely the popular Essanay dramas, not Western. The excellent players composing the Essanay stock company will be retained, and such pictures as their Chicago dramatic producer has to offer will be of a very high standard.

Demand for Comedy.

Essanay comedy subjects have always been most popular and there has been a great demand for more. The Essanay Company, it seems, have studied with a discriminating eye the class of comedy subjects which prove most popular with the people, with the result that their comedy subjects have always been eagerly awaited by the film exchanges and the exhibitors.

Popularity of the Western Pictures.

Western subjects, in which the wild and woolly plays the leading part, have won immense popularity with the people, and there has been a great and unsatisfied demand for more pictures of such a variety. We read with interest a novel depicting life and adventures on the Western plains and mountain trails, and sit in breathless suspense in our seats at the theater, to the clank and jingle of spur, the banging of firearms and the rat-a-tat-tat of galloping ponies. Western films have been not less popular, and the manufacturer who has ever issued a series has always been eager to issue more.

The Essanay Company, in making a specialty of these two varieties, have entered a field in which they have always appeared at their best. The success of their Western series of last year was abundantly satisfying and added greatly to the reputation of the firm. Essanay comedies, it has been said, have won the name of "The House of Comedy Hits" for the enterprising Chicago firm, and in coupling the two varieties the Essanay Company will undoubtedly make a splendid record.

Spoor Confident of Big Things.

Mr. George K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Company, when interviewed by a representative of the World, spoke very enthusiastically over the future prospects of his company.

"I have every reason to believe," he said, "that the Essanay new release and the policy it has adopted will be heartily welcomed by the film exchanges and exhibitors as eminently satisfactory. Our people have worked hard to obtain results, and the subjects now on our shelves and ready for release are exceptionally good. Before making this step the Essanay Company has satisfied itself that the quality and high standard of its productions will not only be maintained, but that it is in a position to advance and increase these qualities. All future Essanay releases will be all that effort and money can make them."

A Model Plant.

The phenomenal advance in quality, evident in Essanay films, is undoubtedly due to superior equipment. The factory and studios of the Essanay Company, at 1333 Argyle street, North Chicago, are claimed to be the largest and finest in the world. The buildings and their equipment were erected at a cost of over $200,000, while every superior device and invention for making perfect pictures has been installed.

Two years ago, July 31, 1907, the Essanay Company released their first picture. It was entitled "An Awful Skate." The picture was made in the old studio at 62 North Clark street. A year later, the Essanay Company made plans for the great north side factory and studio, and moved into these quarters in May, 1909. Since the release of the first picture made in the new studios the Essanay Company has made steady increase in the quality of their productions.

Mr. George K. Spoor is to be highly complimented for the remarkable success he has had in guiding the destinies of the Essanay Company, and the Essanay's success is due chiefly to his persistent effort to give his patrons the best possible for their money. The exhibitors and exchanges will undoubtedly await with eagerness and anticipation the release of the first big Western picture, while they should be congratulated in knowing that the Essanay Company's inimitable comedies will be released more frequently.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

Misleading Posters.

Some time ago, it may have been months ago, but be that as it may, I distinctly remember warning exhibitors that nothing other than a closing up of their business could injure it more than false announcements as to programs. I noticed that many exhibitors who indulged in this practice saw the wisdom of the warning and promptly changed their tactics. I regret to see, however, that many of them are again indulging in it. This time it is not the exhibitor who has a small place, that offends, but the big fellow is guilty. No matter how large or attractive, or how well located his place may be, he is going to lose business by such methods. Many complaints of bogus program announcements have been made recently, and several of the most prominent places on Fourteenth street and Broadway are accused. There is no mistake about this; the complaints have been investigated and found well based. The public cannot be gulled very long, and the practice referred to cannot be indulged in with success for even a brief period, as the game is such an old one that acquaintance with it has enabled the patrons of picture shows to see through it quite readily. If an exhibitor has been disappointed by the film exchange he is dealing with as to a supply of films and he has the subjects he expected to receive, and did not get, billed in front of his house, it is far better for him to at once remove the billing; and if he has not sufficient time to substitute a billing of what he really has, get along without outside announcements until he can make his billing and show run together. There have been times when, through some accident or mistake, film exchanges have failed to deliver the proper subjects to exhibitors, and the latter have been placed in a false position in the eyes of the public, but such occurrences are very rare indeed these days. They are too costly to the exchanges. Besides the loss of prestige and the danger of losing a customer when competition is so sharp, they also lay themselves open to claims for losses on the part of exhibitors. Recent investigation has shown the false announcements have been a part of a faking system—deliberate misleading of the public. It can be shown that a manager learning a neighboring picture show intended to put on certain subjects that were calculated to draw has announced the same subjects in front of his own house on the same day his competitor was to run them, although he knew he would not and could not secure them.

Non-inflammable Film Improves in Quality.

Complaints by film exchanges about the lack of durability of non-inflammable films have assumed quite an inflammable character. Several exchange people of this city and other places have importuned me to take up the matter and emphasize their demand that the manufacturers using non-inflammable stock give it up and put the old kind of film in use again. Were the situation as many endeavor to picture it, I would feel justified in complying with their requests, but finding circumstances as I do, after careful investigation, I feel justified in advocating that the users of the non-inflammable film be patient. I find nothing to justify the opinions of some exchange men that the non-inflammable films are made to wear out quickly and stimulate purchases. As I find matters, the non-inflammable film is still in the experimental stage. The manufacturers who make the subjects and the company who supply what is known as the raw stock agree that the results have not been what they expected; at the same time, however, they promise to remdy defects as quickly as possible, and in many ways show those investigating that they are seriously at work to bring this about. It should be remembered that for some time before non-inflammable film was introduced film exchanges and exhibitors were bringing to bear every pressure to get that kind of film on the market, in order to better satisfy the municipal authorities. The demand was eventually complied with, but it took practical demonstrations to bring out defects the originators could not foresee.

Many exchanges are complaining that they cannot get the cost out of non-inflammable films before they break and will not run through the machines. An endless discussion could be carried on, so far as this contention is concerned, for the reason that almost innumerable points of view are presented. Rental prices are not uniform throughout the country, and it takes some exchanges longer to get back the cost of a film than others. Some exchanges require their customers to exercise more care in the handling of films than other exchanges do. Points of this character might be cited innumerably without satisfactory result, and discussion of this character can attain little when defects are acknowledged in all quarters. I understand that the manufacturers have adopted a schedule of prices for the repair of non-inflammable films that break down on account of defects in the film itself. These prices, I am told, range from 2 to 7 cents per foot. If such is the case, it certainly appears that the manufacturers are doing their utmost to lighten the burdens of the exchange men pending the efforts to remedy the defects in the film. I have never been closely enough connected with the film manufacturing end of the picture business to enable me to fix the figure that affords the manufacturer a fair profit, but I have learned enough to know that when a manufacturer, after paying for his stock and the cost of producing plays, together with fixed charges that attend the handling, marketing, etc., of films, is producing films at a big loss when he charges 2, 3, 4 or 5 cents per foot, and even at 6 or 7 cents per foot he is not making a profit that anyone can boast of. In view of the elaborate nature of the work in vogue at the present time, it is exceedingly doubtful that even 6 or 7 cents per foot affords a profit. In view of this, it would seem that the manufacturers are making big concessions as a bid for patience pending the perfection of the film in question. It may be true that the manufacturers get their original cost and a good profit out of the first sales to the exchanges; that the repair work is done from negatives already paid for, and the cost to the manufacturer is only the amount of stock used and the labor required to turn it out. On this point a manufacturer agrees to an extent, but at the same time he points out that the repair work uses up time that could be used in producing goods at a profit, and the fixed charges remain the same. He admits that the manufacturers are keeping up with their schedules of new productions, but claims that to do so either the new or repair work is done by overtime, which runs into money.

As stated before, for the interests of the picture business as a whole, let all concerned be as forbearing as possible and try to share a fair portion of the burden which experiment in the direction all seek with equal earnestness involves, especially where there are assurances that the end sought will be attained.

A Fight Well Photographed.

I have a little clipping which I hope will come before the eyes of the people who can only see in moving pictures a means for nickelodeon managers to earn a livelihood. Mr. McLoughlin, the sporting editor of the New York "World," says, in commenting on the Ketchel-Johnson fight pictures he saw at a theater:

"Well, what they (the audience) saw was this: Two men—one a giant in ebony, the other a china doll. The one, Johnson; the other Ketchel. No comparison I can make here is as striking as the moving pictures show it."

That is pretty good for the pictures, isn't it. But don't miss the full weight the critic's remarks carry with them—moving pictures can tell a story better than the newspapers.

Politics and Moving Pictures.

By the way, have you read the speech made by Judge Gaynor, one of the candidates for Mayor in the present campaign in New York City? You should read it, and it should be given widespread publicity throughout the country. While it is based upon incidents that occurred in New York, the sentiments expressed apply with equal force to every city, town and hamlet that has a picture show. The speech appears in another part of this issue. Regardless of political affiliations or preferences, all picture men should doff their hats to the maker of the speech, for he is the first to get into the columns of the newspapers a fair statement of the situation affecting the moving picture people of Greater New York. He is the first to properly spread before the public the great injustice that was done these people last Winter, the first to specifically point out why the action against them was unjust, as well as the first to have the courage to publicly denounce certain influences which worked the wrong under a false cloak of reform and the enforcement of laws. The burden of bringing these facts before the people has heretofore rested solely upon the shoulders of the moving picture trade journals. This, of course, has failed in effect, because trade papers naturally do not reach out as the newspapers do. The newspapers, for some reason, never could unearth the facts as they are presented in the speech referred to. If Judge Gaynor is not elected Mayor, we hope he will become the guiding spirit of some of the newspapers, for the stand he has taken shows that in such event the motion picture people will be able to get their side of controversies before the public. OLIVER.

Beginning November 11th, the Carson Company of Philadelphia will release one reel a week. Another American film for the independents.

Important Interview with Mr. Arturo Ambrosio

The trade-mark of "Ambrosio" having appeared on so many of the best films issued by the independents during the past year, great was our pleasure to be honored with the first private interview with Arturo Ambrosio, the head of the Ambrosio Company at Torino, Italy, on the first day of his arrival in this country. Whenever we have been fortunate enough to see any of the Ambrosio productions on the screen we have marvelled at the originality of conception, the thoroughness of execution and the daring flights of imagination, and have wondered what manner of man it was who directed these finished specimens of moving picture art.

Ambrosio—Arturo Ambrosio—the name which has been the opening gun, the slogan of the independent exchanges, is a man rather below the average stature, alert in action, pleasant in personality, and primed with enthusiasm as to the possibilities of the art of moving picture making. For Mr. Ambrosio considers it art and treats it as an art, and the early part of our interview was mainly on these lines and the effect it was having and would have on other arts. The interview had not progressed very far before we were fully convinced of the fact that Mr. Ambrosio's ambitions were entirely different from those of many who have drifted into the moving picture game. Said he: "Our aim is to produce the most impressive, most realistic and technically perfect pictures within the bounds of human ingenuity and genius." How different from the ambitions of those whose aim it is to make and sell the most film!

"Mr. Ambrosio, will you tell me how long you have been making moving pictures and something about your studio?"

"The firm of Ambrosio, of which I am—what you call it—chief stockholder, has now been doing business for five years. That we have prospered is largely due to my partner, friend and chief aide, Mr. Gondolfi. We have a glass studio 120 feet in length, but much of our work is done under the sunny skies of Italy. We have thirty trained artists in our steady employ, besides scores of supernumeraries. We are a little artistic colony, with entree into the most select circles in Italy, and Italy's best dramatic talent at our disposal."

"Mr. Ambrosio, we have seen and admired much of your work. May I ask why you have come to the United States? Are you not satisfied with the sales of your product in this country?"

The answer was an expressive shrug and "I come to see for myself and study the tastes of your people. I want to know why it is that the American selections from my output are not those which I consider my best, nor even those which I consider best adapted to the general public."

"Mr. Ambrosio, why do you think our people should buy more of your pictures? We have our own manufacturers here who can supply the demand."

"I believe our productions are the equal, if not the superior, of any in the whole world. I see the work of others. Your American pictures come to my country. We enjoy them. They are so delightfully fresh, and some of them are now even becoming artistic. No, I do not wish to criticise the work of your manufacturers or their art, or lack of art, but the superficial nature of much of the output is apparent. Is it from lack of effort and concentration, or lack of ambition, or is it because they do too much? At any rate, they seldom seem to rise above a certain level. Understand me, I am not making a comparison. I have not yet seen enough of your work to judge."

"Mr. Ambrosio, the manufacturers of this country may be said to work to a schedule. They have to supply a regular output, released on stated days. It sometimes happens that circumstances will delay a certain subject and a manufacturer may have to rush out some simple production to fill his orders. Working to a schedule is not conducive to art, but our American system of standing orders is a sound business basis for the manufacturers to work upon and it has not interfered with the quality, which has materially advanced and is advancing. Do you have a regular output and regular release days?"

"No, we have no fixed output. In Europe this is governed by the demand, and the demand is governed by the quality. We may make one picture a week, or three a week, or we may spend weeks or months on a production, but we always have on hand an ample supply of finished negatives to meet any demand. Take, as an example, our 'Nero,' which you have seen. This was made months ago, and its date of issue in Europe is October 28. It is one of a series of spectacular subjects which we call the 'Golden Series.' Others of this series are ready, and some of them will far excel 'Nero' in my estimation. Yes, we adhere to a uniform release date in the various countries, as far as possible. Films are sold by sample in Europe, and up to now we have taken orders for 342 copies of 'Nero.'

"Mr. Ambrosio, you have mentioned 'Nero'; this picture must have cost you much money and much hard work."

"Money! There you are! American—Money. Money—American. We do not take cost into consideration in making our pictures. We set out to attain a desired result—and we get it. We rehearse and rehearse and take and re-take scenes until I am satisfied we cannot do it better. And work? Yes, we work. I seldom ate or slept while this same 'Nero' was being produced, and if I did sleep I dreamed 'Nero.' Yes, we work until we perspire, and I can tell you that after directing the scene of the burning of Rome I almost collapsed."

"Do your sales in Europe warrant the expense and effort you put in your work? In other words, if the American market was closed to you, could you afford to do things so elaborately?"

"No, not on the European trade alone. We would barely come out even. That is one reason why I am here. We need the support of the whole world to give the world the best that can be produced in motion pictures. My correspondence and not my vanity leads me to believe that more Ambrosio films can be sold in America. And we need the money to expend in making still better pictures."

"Mr. Ambrosio, that leads up to the question, Who is your representative in this country?"

"Messrs. Raleigh & Robert, of Paris, are our exclusive agents for every country except Italy and Spain."

"Did you ever have any direct dealings with the International Projecting and Producing Company of America or its president, Mr. Murdock?"

"No. I had a letter from Mr. Murdock during his recent visit to Paris, saying that illness prevented him from visiting our plant. Here it is. I have never met Mr. Murdock, but I hope to have that pleasure."

"Are Raleigh & Robert still your agents, or have you come here to make other arrangements?"

"Raleigh & Robert are still our exclusive agents and will be until I announce to the contrary."

This ended a very interesting chat. The following day we again saw Mr. Ambrosio in the presence of a representative of the "Billboard" and of the "Dramatic Mirror." His attention was called to an advertisement published in a trade paper, dated October 9, stating that a certain company had exclusive control of his films in this country.

Mr. Ambrosio emphatically denied the right of anyone to make such a statement, and at the suggestion of the "Billboard" representative gave out a signed statement that Messrs. Raleigh & Robert, and through them the Film Import and Trading Company, of this city, were the only concerns authorized to handle his output in America.

MR. ARTURO AMBROSIO.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

The remarkable personal success achieved by R. G. Knowles in the series of Sunday evening travelogues that he is giving this month at Carnegie Hall reminds me of the enormous field which seems to be open to the conjunction of a good talk with a good moving picture. I am just old enough to have heard some of the most renowned lecturers who made fame and money by talking to large audiences with the lantern slide as a theme. But, except in the pale and aseetic field of the Sunday-school or the church, the lantern slide is dead as a public draw. The moving picture has taken its place, and so along come Knowles, Niblo, Elmendorf and others to conjoin their personalities with the pictures that move rather than with the pictures that stand still. Once more the personal equation is asserting itself.

The personal equation made the old lantern slide lecturer a huge success. Whenever it failed, it was the personal equation that was at fault. It is the personal equation that is at present wanting in the moving picture field. I speak generally and not particularly of Knowles and his peers. A little while ago I sat and watched a Biograph picture. A tame lecturer was turned on to talk with it. His name was announced outside the theater in black letters on a white sheet, so I went and paid my five cents to listen to the celebrity. Well, he "could not talk for nuts," as the phrase goes; let alone orate, elocute or depict. He was just an ineffective conversationalist. He bored his audience, he bored me, and I hope he has been killed. For that is all that he was good for.

This is not a solitary instance. Here and there, in a half-hearted way, a lecturer is turned on to talk with the picture as it moves. Well, he just talks like a parrot. He is not in sympathy with his subject; he does not understand it. He cannot orate; he is no elocutionist; his acquaintance with English is of a distant nature; he just meanders on in a harmless way, and so the effect upon an audience is that of distressful mediocrity. He is a stick at $10.00 per week. He is a grim reminder of the enormous possibilities of the lecturing end of moving picture exhibitions that I want to speak about on this occasion.

I wonder if any of my readers have ever heard Harrison, Bellew or Brandram? No doubt they have, for they were monological elocutionists of world-wide reputation. These men, like the late Charles Dickens, could take for a theme an entire play or a story, and talk and act it alone before an audience for an entire evening. Old-timers will, of course, recollect Charles Dickens' readings. Comparatively young men will recall Bellew, Harrison and Brandram, who could go right through a play, hold an audience with it, and make money.

Now this is the kind of talent I would like to see on tap in a moving picture theater. It is to be had. A friend of mine has recently started out to engage the services of a talker or lecturer, and it is astonishing to find the load of talent available in the ordinary theatrical market—educated men who can talk well and talk sufficiently well to hold the attention of an audience of thousands for an entire evening. There is no getting away from the fact that the average moving picture, as it is shown to-day, lacks something which perhaps neither music, the phonograph, nor sound effects can supply. What is that something?

In many cases it is an accomplished lecturer or talker. Let me illustrate what I mean. Take Selig's "Briton and Boer" picture—a war subject. Don't you think that while this picture is being shown a qualified lecturer should give a narrative of the incidents as they were being enacted on the screen? Don't you think that an American audience would understand this subject more easily and would be gratified by the explanations, the comments, the verbal illustrations and the identifications of the actors? I do. I know very well that when I am looking upon a Civil War subject I am glad to have somebody tell me, in a nice way, what is taking place, why it is taking place, and the chief actors in it. Similarly with the many sporting subjects that are being exhibited just now.

There was a yachting picture shown the other day—an English yachting picture in Urban's best style. Very few people amongst those who witnessed it realized that the German Emperor's yacht was present and that the yacht was in the picture, and that the Kaiser himself was present there and saw the racing. Take the aviation pictures that are being shown. Nobody has explained them. Take the rabbit-shooting and German artillery subjects referred to elsewhere. Nobody explains them. Take the ordinary simple comedy subject. I understand them. It is my business to do so; but I often wonder whether a large percentage of the audience does.

Of course, many, and perhaps most, pictures are self-explanatory. They do not call for the accompaniment of the lecturer; but a great many manifestly do. They open the way for the monologistic lecturer, who, as in the cases of your Brandram, Dickens, Harrison and Bellew, can go through the words, descriptions and the actions of what is taking place in the moving picture on the screen. The combination of humorist with the moving picture in the minds of the audience will produce an effect of satisfaction, which the picture alone only too often leaves unreached.

A large proportion of the films shown are topographical. That is to say, they illustrate places and incidents. Here, it would seem, the co-operation of a lecturer is almost indispensable. Take the Messina earthquake, or a Swedish subject that we saw last week, or several of the industrial subjects that Pathe is putting out. All these clearly call for explanation. I believe the audience would appreciate competent co-operation in this respect.

But the co-operation must be competent. The other day I listened to a lecturer on my beloved Paris. The lecturer did not know the place; he had never been there, and he could not talk French. The result was ghastly. Equally so I sat under a man who discoursed of London. I know my London as I know my New York and Paris. I could have cried, I could, at the matter of fact way in which my friend talked of some of the most interesting, picturesque and historical spots of the world. He was as cold as charity. Just imagine some of those old-time lecturers of whom I was speaking, handling this theme!

There is one little point of interest in this connection which deserves to be noted. It is a big straw which shows the direction of the wind. The Ganes and Circle theater people, the other day, engaged James J. Morton to talk for both houses. The papers say that James got $2,000 a week for the job. Good boy! But here is the point as it bears upon your Lux's little sermon this week. The people who are running these theaters realize that the pictures have got to be supplemented. They do not quite know how, so they put on vaudeville and vaudeville talkers. But they don't want either. They want the type of man that I have in mind.

And the type of man that I have in mind is Knowles—humorist, elocutionist, educated man and traveler. A man in sympathy with his subjects. He can talk with them and of them to his audience, and hold his audience by his personality. As I have said before, these men can be got, or if they cannot be got, they can be trained. An unlimited field is open, as I have pointed out, amongst the lecturers, so many of them are walking about Broadway, wearing out shoe-leather. Considering how much the mere external barker enters into arrangements of entertainments in America, it is curious that so little use is made of the human voice inside of the theater: the voice of the refined, sympathetic talker or lecturer. It is right to say that the views I have here printed are not merely my own, but are shared by other men quite alive to the possibilities of the moving picture as an entertainment.

LUBIN.

The great improvement noticed of late in the productions of the Lubin Manufacturing Company is due to the fact that Mr. S. Lubin has transferred most of his interests in moving picture theaters to other shoulders, to devote his entire time and attention to the production of motion pictures.

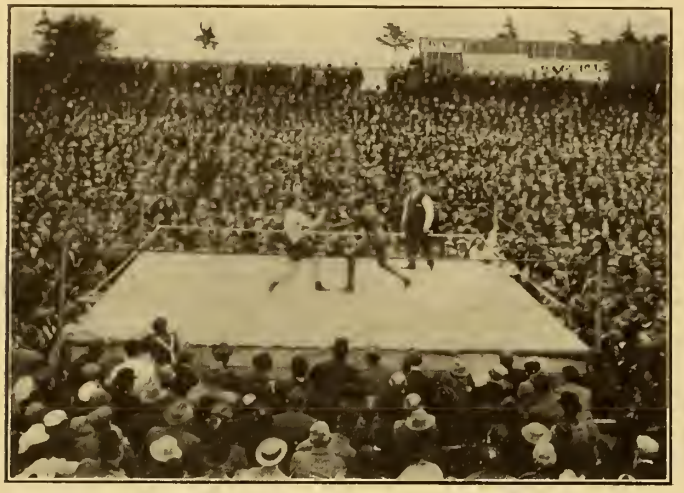
If Mr. S. Lubin made the moving picture theaters of Philadelphia the finest in the country, he soon realized, when he took personal charge of the production, that motion pictures could not be made properly without adequate facilities. Mr. Lubin is building a new studio and factory, to occupy a full city block of the Quaker City. With those increased facilities and the indefatigable energy of Mr. Lubin, we can predict that his productions will soon be in the lead.

EDUCATIONAL SUBJECTS.

An elaborate and complete catalogue is in preparation by Geo. Kleine which will list and describe the pick of the world's film productions that are suitable for school, church, college and lecture work. To prepare such a catalogue means such an amount of detail work that great credit is due to Mr. Kleine for its undertaking. There has been so much call, however, for a special list of such subjects that we believe he will be well repaid for his labors, and we look forward to receiving an advance copy so as to give it due notice.

THE JOHNSON-KETCHEL FIGHT PICTURES.

The most remarkable fight pictures ever produced are now being shown at some of the big theaters. Notice that we say remarkable fight pictures. There was nothing remarkable about the fight itself except that it was fought to a clean finish and there was no demur to the decision. It is the quality of the pictures that we are interested in, and in recording the fact that they were produced by the Kalem Company and photographed by Mr. E. C. Miles and Mr. Sarony, the Pacific Coast representatives of the Kalem Company. The negative was rushed to New York by special messenger, reaching the office of the Kalem Company on Saturday morning. Dried and finished positive prints were ready on Saturday afteroon in time to catch the Chicago



Limited and were shown in Chicago the following evening—one thousand miles away. The Kalem force kept right on, and before the week's work had ended there were sufficient prints for the New York bookings on Monday. We frequently read of record stunts being done by British photographers with topical subjects—but Great Britain is a country of short distances, and we doubt if the Kalem feat has been paralleled.

Notwithstanding the haste in its production, it is seldom that a clearer or better picture is seen on the screen. The clear California atmosphere and bright sunlight, diffused by fleecy clouds, made an ideal photographic day. Mr. Miles and his assistant, whom we see in the accompanying photograph, did justice to their part of the work and the Kalem laboratory staff did the rest. The New York daily papers, in referring to the picture, each single out the photography for praise. "Edgren," in the "World"; "Tad," in the "Journal-American"; Walter St. Denis, in the "Globe"—all those who saw it at Hammerstein's Theater, said it was the clearest fight picture they had ever seen. As will be seen from the reproduction, there is not a shadow on the platform, yet the features are distinct and recognizable. The film was manufactured by the Kalem Company for Mr. Coffroth and is not a Kalem release. The exhibiting rights are now so high that it can only be shown in the very largest theaters, but if the exchanges order freely Mr. Coffroth will make some arrangement with the Kalem Company whereby it can be issued to the moving picture theaters at an early date.

Comments on the Week's Films.

THE CROWN PRINCE OF GERMANY DRILLING ARMY BATTERY (Urban-Eclipse).

The German army is said to be the greatest military machine in the world, as Germany is said to be, and probably is, the greatest military nation. They have 4,000,000 soldiers ready to go into action at a moment's notice. The Emperor's family all take a practical hand in the work of the army. The present German Emperor never spares himself in the work, and he sees to it that his son, the Crown Prince, also takes a part in the drilling. This very fine series of pictures shows German work in the field with big guns, and one gets the impression that one is looking at the "fine flower" of the German artillery going through their evolutions. The Crown Prince is ever in the limelight, surrounded by his officers. He would appear to be taking a real, if somewhat kid-gloved and cigarette-smoking, interest in the work. He good-naturedly poses before the camera several times, so that excellent photographs are made of him, and finally, when he draws away in his automobile, he remains quite still with the wheel in his hand so that a good final picture may be made of him. The hundreds of thousands of Germans in the United States will appreciate this picture, for it gives them a glimpse of the predominant life of the fatherland, that predominant life being essentially military. Photographically it is a very good film indeed, for the operator was lucky enough to get quite close to his subjects, so you have striking portraits of the Prince and his officers. This picture attracted considerable notice on the occasion when we saw it, and we have no doubt it will be popular.

COSETTE (Vitagraph).

The third film de luxe in this company's series based upon events in Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables." While this film is complete in itself its connection with the two earlier pictures, "The Galley Slave" and "Fantine," is apparent and it becomes a satisfactory illustration of this portion of the story. Like the others it has numerous dramatic situations, the most impressive of which is the placing of Jean Valjean in the coffin, which is buried. The purchase of Cosette's freedom is interesting, the appearance from the sea, and the recognition by Javert, all form important climaxes in the development of the story. The reproduction seems to be up to the high standard set by the former pictures, and it seems as though the interest in the film has taken on a different tone, if one may so phrase it. Apparently the picture is better understood and there is a closer following of the plot, which in this film goes into considerable detail in the development. Acting and staging seem to be in harmony with the descriptions given in the story, a characteristic of Vitagraph productions. The films form a series of which the producers may well be proud, and the picture loving public will look for the next with increased interest.

SHOOTING JACK RABBITS (Pathe).

It says much for the interest which high-class sporting subjects attract in the moving picture thater that when this film was shown last week it was followed with very sustained interest. The American public is a sporting public, as the boxing, aeroplane, yachting and other sporting pictures that have been recently shown clearly demonstrate. They are always well appreciated. This is chiefly a Hungarian sporting subject. The sportsmen shot over snowy ground, and it is exciting to watch the rabbit as he appears in the distance and comes within range of the gun to meet his fate. Now and again he rolls over, and the excitement thus continues all the time. Finally the "bag" is shown, and a very fine display of slaughtered jack rabbits closes the film and gives evident satisfaction to the group of Hungarian sportsmen who drove out to the snowy fields to engage in this sport. The picture struck us as giving an exceedingly fine rendering of snowy landscape—not an easy thing to properly photograph, as those who have attempted to make snow photographs will understand.

THE WIDOW (Essanay).

Moving picture audiences do not trouble their heads much about the originality of the pictures that are presented to them. If they did, they would have very little enjoyment. The story of "The Widow," one of the recent Essanay successes is not, from our own knowledge, strictly original. We have read it before in other form. But it is always good, it is always fresh, and when presented to a strictly popular audience, it never fails to attract and amuse. A friend in the country sends a town friend an invitation and incidentally mentions that "the widow" is in good form. Away goes the town man and of course he leaves his guest's invitation behind for his suspicious wife to read. Then the fun begins. Wifey and her mother lead the husband a terrible racket. They haul him up before the magistrate, they jail him. Finally, at the trial for wife desertion, the situation is cleared up by the husband producing the friend's invitation and pointing out that "the widow" is the name of a horse. Of course this is all delightful fooling, it is wildly improbable, but on the other hand it is frankly farce, well and cleverly acted, and on the afternoon we saw the picture it came as a positive relief in an otherwise dull programme. It was the only thing that the audience heartily laughed at. The acting of the piece as well as the photography are good. The film shows the consistently progressive policy of the Essanay Company in the realms of comedy and drama. Of the latter kind of work we desire to speak in the next review.

A WOMAN'S WIT (Essanay).

In this film the Essanay people strike the drama note and strike it very effectively. The picture tells a very tense little story of how a woman outwits a burglar whom, upon her return home, she discovers by accident to have entered her room for the purpose of robbing her of her jewels. Here comes in an opportunity for the actress who impersonates the lady to show a very fine piece of acting. She has to feign absolute unconsciousness of any knowledge that the burglar is concealed to impress him with this assumed unconsciousness, and she has to disappear for several moments while he ransacks the room, and she has to come back holding her nerve throughout. And all this is splendidly acted. While she has gone out of the room she has got into communication with the police who arrive at the critical moment and arrest the burglar who, if he could make his escape, would have turned with ungovernable fury upon the witty woman who out-manoeuvred him. At the end of it all she sinks in a chair exhausted with the effort. This is one of the pictures that strikes our particular fancy and that lingers in the mind for days after we saw it, and that is why on this occasion, though it was released several days ago, we think it deserving of special encouragement here. There is not much in the story. It is simple, direct, tense and convincing and just for the moment it gives opportunities for the enactment of supreme drama. Such a moment comes to us all at times, and don't we all feel the reaction as the girl in this picture did? "A Woman's Wit" shows that the Essanay people are properly eclectic in their tastes and are making a bid for the position of comedy film house par excellence.

THE LIE (Edison).

A story which goes back to the time of the Franco-Prussian War. It is woven around that same old triangle of love, duty and treachery which is always new and never fails to interest. The comrade, who is also a rival in love, betrays his trust in delivering a message and leads a girl to believe her fiance is dead. Her mind gives way to the blow and she wanders out and leaps into a chasm, at the bottom of which is a deep pool. She is followed and rescued by her brother, who has also found and pieced together the undelivered message from her dear one. The film ends with a dramatic accusation as the two comrades meet in the presence of the convalescent girl, who recovers her lost senses in the embrace of her lover. There is a good deal of dramatic ability displayed, and the leap into the chasm and the rescue are well executed. On the whole, it is a strong film and holds the attention of the audience until they break into applause at the end. The outdoor scenes are well composed and well photographed, but the interiors are indistinct. The errors of under-exposure and over-development of the film detract considerably from the nice effect that was evidently planned by the scene setter and producer. So, while technically it is not up to the Edison standard, the film will attract favorable attention and comment on its dramatic merits alone.

THE COWBOY MILLIONAIRE (Selig).

If a good cowboy picture is wanted, Selig is the one to produce it. His company can make a cowboy play seem like the real thing, and this film is no exception. The cowboy who becomes a millionaire is a novelty which will prove attractive, because it is out of the ordinary. His life in his luxurious city surroundings palls on him, and for the fun of it he sends for the whole outfit from Circle D ranch, and when they arrive the fun begins. It is rough-house, but is picturesque, filled with vigorous action, and therefore pleasing to a majority of the audiences. The fortunate man sees the comparison and loses his longing for the old life of the plains and the bucking bronchos.

"A Brother's Wrong" (Kalem).—Always strong in melodrama, this company has produced a picture which combines many interesting elements and shows much real life in its changing scenes. It is an illustration of the jealousy of one brother of another's intimacy with a girl whom both loved, a false accusation of robbery which estranged the young man from his father and all the harrowing and troublesome details which usually follow such disagreeable actions. However, the villain dies and everything is settled up in the last scene to the satisfaction of everyone concerned. Like all the Kalem pictures, this one is filled with action. As for the acting in a melodrama of this character, it is vigorous enough to make plain the meaning of the story, and that, after all, is the main purpose of the film. If the story is told with sufficient fidelity to the facts to make it seem real there need be no question of the interest it will excite. The photographer has done his work quite as well in this film as he has in most of the later Kalem productions.

"The Old Lord of Ventnor" (Gaumont).—A story of the union of December, in the person of the old Lord of Ventnor, and May, in a handsome peasant girl. There is a charge of inconstancy, with an order for beheading the young woman. This leads up to a fine bit of magic, and the young woman is forgiven. The film is good photographically and there is a pretty dance scene.

"Ambulance Ventilators" (Gaumont).—A ventilator is attached to an ambulance, which develops such remarkable power that everything movable is shot violently through space when the wheels begin to go around.

"Country Life in a Flat" (Gaumont).—A humorous skit representing how an enthusiastic lover of the country succeeded in reproducing country conditions in his city flat. It is amusing chiefly because of the absurdity of the reproductions of country life. To see them in a city dwelling is funny merely from the absurdity of the connection.

"Tickled to Death" (Gaumont).—A combination of funny stunts which are developed through a gentleman's ticklish propensities. The laughter reproduced on the screen is infectious and keeps the audience in good humor throughout.

"The Two Mr. Whites" (Vitagraph).—One of those delightful bits of comedy which appeal to the multitude. The Vitagraph Company maintains a very high standard in these comedies, never allowing them to descend to clown farce. These two "Mr. Whites" get into a mix-up that is so amusing that everyone who sees the picture laughs, and there is nothing in it to which the most fastidious can take offense. The technical quality is good, the acting capital, and there is not a dull moment in the film.

"He Fell in Love with His Wife" (Vitagraph).—A post-honeymoon idyll enacted amidst the most beautiful surroundings. The story is not new, but it is given a new meaning by the spirited acting of the capable actors and skilled producer. There is a sense of satisfaction after seeing the film which is in itself proof that the scenes are well and naturally handled. The beautiful country estate helps to add realism to the not uncommon incident of a man actually falling in love with his own wife, and the effect on the audience was pleasing.

"Volcanoes of Java" (Urban).—A beautiful scenic reproduction of the famous volcanoes of Java. Like all the outdoor work from the Urban studio the work is well done, the technical quality of the films leaves nothing to be desired. The values of the landscapes are correctly rendered, and the photographer succeeded in conveying the impression of grandeur in his mountain pictures. Not all do that successfully, and this picture is made much more attractive for that reason.

"Awakened Memories" (Urban).—A strike picture which should convey an impression of the misery which these misguided labor controversies frequently cause the innocent. The picture is dainty, many of the scenes presenting bits of domestic life as tender and beautiful as one would care to see. The dramatic possibilities in the scene where the father discovers his little girl selling flowers, which arouse tender memories of earlier times, are carefully wrought out. The closing scene, showing the little family happy in their home, is a satisfactory ending which does not violate the rules of dramatic construction. It would be difficult to improve upon the photography of this picture, and the printer has made the most of the photographer's work.

"The Gambler" (Pathe).—A story of a gambler who drives his wife to attempt suicide, but who returns from the gambling den, where he has won, in time to prevent suffocation by gas. The story of gambling varies but little in the telling. Gamblers go on throwing their money away and driving their families to misery and despair. Not all end as happily as this, so perhaps this may be called a bit unnatural. Technically, criticism is unnecessary, and the actors perform their parts sufficiently well to make the story plain.

"Grotesque Mix-up" (Pathe).—It is difficult to describe this picture, but if one permits his imagination to run riot over the title one will obtain a reasonably comprehensive idea of the picture. Two clever knockabout artists perform amusing acts, and the amusing features are somewhat increased by a few camera tricks.

"Cinderella Up-to-Date" (Melies).—A rather novel and interesting travesty on the old fairy story. In this instance the girl loses a shoe and an advertisement brings scores of girls whose feet could never go in the shoe by even the most powerful scheme of compression. And when at last the right girl proves her ownership the inevitable wedding creates so much excitement that losing shoes becomes quite the fashion. Not all the girls are successful in obtaining lovers, however, though many of them do. The conception and working out of this story is satisfactory. While it is professedly a travesty upon the old story, it is well done. The technical quality is maintained at a high standard of perfection, which adds materially to the attractiveness of the picture.

"Maud Muller" (Essanay).—Adequate illustration and interpretation of favorite poems or songs is a legitimate piece of motion picture enterprise which might be utilized more liberally with excellent results. There are numerous poems, well known to substantially every person who can read, that might be beautifully illustrated. The Essanay people have added another success to the short list in their "Maud Muller," just released. The poem is more pastoral than active, perhaps, and its power lies more in its subtleties and its suggestiveness than in any degree of force either described or represented. The capable company charged with the somewhat delicate task of reproducing this poem have accomplished their purpose with consummate skill. The acting interprets correctly Whittier's thought, which was directed more toward indicating what might occur in certain instances were circumstances different than in making any direct assertion with respect to some of these subtleties which form such conspicuous influences upon the human mind. All these complicated impressions are reproduced with a fidelity to the poem which adds materially to the attractiveness of the picture and seems to make the poet's thought move in the living characters who appear upon the canvas. The work has been well done, both technically and dramatically, and the picture is commended to all lovers of good films.

"In the Watches of the Night" (Biograph).—A study in desperation. Nothing on earth so lascerates the heart or so disturbs one's mental equilibrium as this same desperation; and when the desperate one sees those dependent upon him suffering, he becomes worse, and no matter what course he pursues he is frequently led to do things which he would shrink from in horror under normal circumstances. In this instance the man out of work, a dangerously sick child and suffering wife all combine to make the desperation so pronounced that the man's better self is overruled and he resorts to robbery; but his wife induces him to return the articles he took. Substantial assistance comes and the unfortunate family is placed on its feet, figuratively and literally. This subject is not pleasant, yet its strength cannot be denied and the impression it makes cannot be questioned. One is fascinated when looking at it and turns away to wish he had not seen it, which is perhaps a sufficient commentary upon the picture and the acting which goes to make it complete.

"Briton and Boer" (Selig).—A picture so full of the spirit of the battlefield that it stirs the blood and excites horror for the disputes and disturbances which go to make up wars. A pretty and vigorous love story is interwoven with the picture and helps to maintain the interest. The girl has the genuine womanly spirit which causes her to renounce her people and their cause and remain with her lover. There are fights and all the horrors that go with them, but eventually England wins and the picturesque bloodshed is over. It is a picture crowded with action which is melodramatic, but no doubt fairly represents war and its unpleasant accompaniments. The staging seems to be as accurate as possible and the picture is certain to please.

"Romance in the Andes" (Pathe).—The beauty of the scenery and the delicacy of the coloring of this film will probably prove the most powerful attractions. It is a film portraying the rough life of the cowboy and Indian, and is, therefore, a bit melodramatic; but there is a certain element of charm about these pictures of the bluff, hearty life of cowboys and Indians that seems to please, and such films almost invariably attract large audiences.

"Bogus Heir" (Pathe).—A humorous picture, based upon the discovery of a lost letter which contained the information that a certain individual had fallen heir to a large fortune. The genus tramp who finds the letter has a glorious time spending money until the true heir appears and forces him to depart, rather more forcibly than elegantly. The picture is funny because of its incongruities, rather than because it is inherently humorous.

"For the Cause of Suffrage" (Melies).—While one is almost ready to deplore the production of more films of the rough-house order, it must still be admitted that this subject has been well chosen and that it is a travesty upon a topic which is unquestionably engrossing a good deal of attention at present. It need not be accepted as in any sense an even fair representation of those who represent the suffrage movement, and that they lay themselves open to just such exaggerated misrepresentations by their often unsupported and insupportable argument and actions. That Mr. Duff should be under the domination of a woman of his wife's Amazonian characteristics is not to be accepted as a travesty. It is quite likely to be true, and in this respect, at least, the picture is not overdrawn. But the scene in the meeting where the disguised Mr. Duff interrupts and is compelled to make an unceremonious exit to save himself from bodily harm, is funny, and the tumble from the pier, with the gathering about the unfortunate man's bedside, are hits which raise a laugh. If these things are to be done, they should be done by producers as capable as the Melies Company.

"A Home Without Children" (Pathe).—One of those pictures which touch the heart, but which, for that reason, perhaps, must go without criticism. The representation of a childless home, the longing of the woman for a child, which is satisfied in a peculiar way, cannot be put down in cold type. The picture must be seen, and when it is seen, any criticism of it, no matter what its dramatic faults may be, would go for nothing. Suffice it to say that it creates a profound impression.

"The Expiation" (Biograph).—An intensely dramatic subject, acted with all the power and ability displayed in the Biograph productions. The curse of drink is used as a basis for a heart story which develops a sad ending, because an honorable woman believes she must expiate the appearance of a wrong which was never committed. The last meeting between the lovers, after the husband's suicide, is realistic, and one feels like rushing forward and offering a solution of the problem which will satisfy them that they have committed no wrong and that both are entitled to whatever happiness may be in store for them in the future. The determination of the widow to lead a penitential life, as expiation, is an artistic ending for the story; but a melodramatic ending, with the lovers united, would please the average audience much better. The dramatic quality of this picture is unquestioned. That it is a little out of the ordinary adds to its attractiveness. The photography is excellent. The film should be a favorite, especially with those who enjoy good drama.

"Casting Bread Upon the Water" (Urban).—A melodramatic picture which has merits in both its scenic and histrionic qualities. It recounts the practical display of gratitude on the part of a young man whom a worthy couple befriended, and who remembers it and in a melodramatic way renders a good account of himself when he learns that the widow of his benefactor is in financial difficulty. There is a stirring heart quality to the picture which holds the interest throughout and fosters an impression that perhaps the world isn't such a bad place as some pessimists would try to make it appear.

"Mignon" (Lubin).—A subject in which jealousy nearly causes a death, but which is averted by the timely arrival of the girl's lover. It is a circus story, and perhaps its chief interest lies in that. The story of rivalry and jealousy is a variation of an exhibition of the same emotions which have been depicted over and over again. The Lubin Company is good at this, however, and the results are satisfactory in all the scenes.

"Aunt Lena's Visit" (Lubin).—A picture in which the Lubin boys play pranks until the older people tire of it. Then they get all that is coming to them, to the amusement of the audience. Generous castigation always amuses, perhaps because it calls to mind similar experiences in the life of practically everyone who sees the picture.

"Lines of White on a Sullen Sea" (Biograph).—While the acting and the sentiment expressed in this picture are the best and loftiest possible, there is a feeling of sadness, yes, more, a disagreeable impression which does not wear away. It is indeed a hard, cruel combination which forces a girl to wait long years for her lover, who, unfaithful to his vows, has married elsewhere. And even though deception is rarely to be condoned in this instance, the belief of the dying girl that her lover was true is sufficient justification for the deception practiced upon her. These stories of unrequited love, so faithfully portrayed by the Biograph Company, are unquestionably of great value in the development of the silent drama. Their effect upon an audience varies, yet there is, perhaps, a general feeling of resentment, coupled with a desire to see the unfaithful one punished sufficiently to compensate in some degree for the pain caused. The stories told are common enough, but this company's manner of telling makes them appear distinctive and altogether out of the ordinary.

"Hiawatha" (Imp).—If the Imp films are all as good as the first one released, a pictorial rendition of Longfellow's great poem, something worth while has been added to the beauty and attractiveness of the motion picture world, something which could not now be discontinued without leaving a sense of loss that would be difficult to replace. This picture was made at the Falls of Minnehaha, in the land of the Dakotahs, and represents some unusually attractive pictorial work. The actors who did the posing clearly reproduced the scenes so graphically described in the poem, and interpreted the spirit of the lines in a manner which leaves comparatively little to be desired. The achievement is all the more striking when it is remembered what a difficult piece of work it must be to reproduce a poem like this, so subtle in its meaning, and so full of psychological suggestions. Yet the "Imp" players have accomplished this, and probably every person who has seen the new film has left the theater with a new sense of appreciation of the marvels and beauties of the motion picture in interpreting even the masterpieces of poetry and fiction.

"The Bracelet" (Great Northern).—A decidedly interesting story of real life which is based upon a woman's caprice in playing with an artist who loved her devotedly. He makes himself a penniless beggar to gratify her vanity, and in return she refuses to receive his attentions longer, until, blind, he steps in front of a motor in which she is riding and is badly hurt. Then her better nature assert itself and the picture ends with them happily married. The acting is rather an improvement over some of the previous Great Northern films, while the photography could scarcely be better. This firm is improving steadily in its dramatic films, the later ones showing evidence of experience and painstaking care in the development of the plots and the details of the work.

Coming Headliners.

RIGOLETTO (Pathe).

The story of "A Fool's Revenge" has been told in many forms, but probably that which has attracted most attention is the opera Rigoletto in which guise it is to be presented without music in the Pathe release of November 14th. The French novelist, Hugo, wrote the story and the Italian composer, Verdi, turned it into an opera. It will probably be seen this season at one of the New York opera houses. Rigoletto has a beautiful daughter. The King falls in love with her and the story shows how the Jester determines to rescue his child from the clutches of the King. A plot is made to kill the latter, but the poor fool, Rigoletto, discovers in the end that it is his own child who is the victim. And so the story ends in dire tragedy. As an opera this subject gives scope for splendid acting and singing; as a play it is full of possibilities for dramatic representation. Following out their policy of presenting the best dramatic works in moving picture form, it was obvious for some time that Pathe would include the subject amongst their releases. They show wisdom in this policy, because the story is so well known. For the present release the services of two Comedie Francaise artists has been secured for the leading parts of Rigoletto, the Jester, and his daughter, Gilda, whilst the subordinate parts have been well filled. The photography and the dressing of the piece are quite in the expected Pathe manner, and we are persuaded in our own mind that this film d'art will be quite as successful as any of its predecessors. It is essentially a French story, and therefore it is fitting that it should be enacted by French actors and presented to the public by a French firm. We look upon this film as marking yet another forward step in the theatricalization of the moving picture field, a subject, by the way, to which we shall be referring at greater length in next week's Moving Picture World.

Rigoletto will be a Sunday release. As to the propriety of such a move we have our doubts. We have conferred with exhibitors who make daily change and run seven days a week, and they are in favor of a Sunday release. However, no matter when the film is issued, no exhibitor should fail to add it to his program.

THE PRODIGAL SON (Pathe).

Biblical subjects on the moving picture screen seldom attract our commendation, because, in our opinion, they usually deal with subjects of too delicate a nature for general representation before a miscellaneous audience. We include among these "The Passion Play" or any subject which treats of the character of the founder of Christianity. This, however, is a purely personal opinion. To our thinking, no possible objection attaches on any score to the story of "The Prodigal Son," the finely colored Pathe film which is shortly to be released. For that story is so tensely human, aside of its character as a religious parable. "The Prodigal Son," in fact, is quitting the Western farm of this country at this very moment for the dangerous delights of the Great White Way. When he has been cleaned out, he will return to his Western home, a sadder and a wiser boy, and let us hope he will meet the same agreeable reception as the foolish youth in the Pathe picture. To follow this latter story as it is shown on the screen, you do not want a synopsis. The very title is enough. It is worked out and acted so delightfully clearly, with oriental costumes and against oriental backgrounds that at any rate look authentic. After getting his portion, quarrelling with his father, away goes our youth to the haunts of the syren, and in a beautifully voluptuous scene we see him having the ancient equivalent of a "good time," and, certainly, judged by modern tastes, he had a very good time indeed amongst these exquisite ladies. Then he goes to the dogs, or, rather, to the pigs, which he has to feed and live with, and he has a very bad time indeed, poor chap. Finally, after terrible horrors, graphically portrayed, he goes home, is welcomed by his father, reconciled to his brother, and the picture ends with the killing of a fatted calf and the supply of new raiment. What strikes us about this picture is the finely dignified way in which it is acted throughout. There is nothing of the cheap actor about the cast. The coloring, too, is beautifully natural, and, altogether, wherever "The Prodigal Son" is shown it is bound, in our opinion, to make an outstanding appeal as a Pathe masterpiece.

NERO; OR, THE BURNING OF ROME (Film Import).

The fame of this Ambrosio film has already spread over the country. By common consent it is allowed to be one of the most remarkable films ever made. It appears at a psychological moment to refute the absurd misstatements referred to elsewhere as to the quality of imported film. Briefly, the story traces the downward career of the Roman tyrant from the moment when he casts his wife aside and takes up with an affinity, who becomes Empress and has her rival put to death. The populace revolt and then Nero orders Rome to be burnt. Subsequently after a terrible exhibition of remorse, he commits suicide before the aroused citizens have the opportunity of killing him.

The story has been selected with great judgment, as one is enabled to follow it on the screen quite clearly. The setting of the piece is indescribably magnificent, whilst the acting fully rises to the level of the opportunity. The staging, the grouping, the lighting, the processions, the whole production in fact, speaks the master hand. The photography is flawless and the scene showing the destruction of Rome a triumph of realism in color.

It is difficult indeed to criticise a picture which deserves nothing but praise. It is difficult to see how it can be excelled in the various qualities it possesses; it is difficult to understand how any other film maker can "go one better." The picture is simply superb, and it goes without saying that it will achieve enormous popularity this Fall and Winter and be referred to for a long time to come as a masterpiece.

The Henry B. Ingram Company, makers of lantern slides, evidently scooped most of the election work this year. A visit to their studio last week disclosed great piles of portrait lantern slides of Otto T. Bannard, Republican candidate for Mayor; William J. Gaynor, the Tammany candidate; William Randolph Hearst, the Civic Alliance candidate; Judge Charles S. Whitman, Republican candidate for District Attorney on the Fusion ticket; William A. Prendergast, the Fusion candidate for Comptroller, and a dozen other can- and moving picture theaters of New York. Among orders was one for $200 worth of portrait work from the American Vitagraph Company.

Sumner Clarke, of the Bijou Theater, Lakewood, N. J., desires to know where he can get service of three sets of slides per week with up-to-date music. Slides not to be faked or cracked junk.

NEW YORK OPERATORS RECEIVE THEIR CHARTER.

New York City, October 19, 1909.

On Monday, October 18, the Moving Picture Operators of Greater New York held their regular meeting at Gallagher's Hall, 402 Eighth avenue, at 12 o'clock midnight, to a very large attendance. There were about two hundred members present. All the officers were also present, as well as the Union delegate, Brother Finerty. Each member had a look of expectation on his face, for, as announced in the Moving Picture World of October 16, this was the date set for the receipt of the charter. After the regular business of the meeting had been attended to, President Cartwright rose and in a neat speech presented us, on behalf of General Secretary-Treasurer Lee M. Hart of the I. A. T. S. E. of the United States and Canada, with a charter from the I. A. T. S. E. of the United States and Canada, signed by General President John S. Barry, to be known as Moving Picture Machine Operators' Protective Union of Greater New York, Branch Local No. 35, I. A. T. S. E. The charter was read to the members, and when they were assured of its being a reality their enthusiasm was unbounded.

At the next regular meeting, to be held Monday, November 1, 1909, I. A. T. S. E. buttons will be supplied to all members desiring them. We would advise all moving picture operators who desire to join our organization to make application to the Recording Secretary at once, while the present initiation fee is in force. We wish it distinctly understood that it shall be our aim to supply film exchanges and exhibitors with first-class men, who will treat managers with every courtesy, and only ask that we be accorded the same.

Brother Finerty was appointed as our walking delegate, and when put to a vote was elected unanimously. In accepting the appointment Brother Finerty said that he did not accept the position for the sake of the money that was in it, but that he only desired to be recompensed for his expenditures; that he was with the boys, heart and soul; that he would serve our organization to his best ability, and that he realized that he had a large territory to cover, but that he would try to "make good." As Brother Costello said, "Brother Finerty is a live wire with a good contact." His "past performances" have shown us that he is the right man in the right place. The members expressed much regret at the thought of losing our worthy President, W. E. Cartwright, as well as our Secretary-Treasurer, Hugh J. Keenan. Brothers Cartwright and Keenan have served faithfully and well for over one year, and we wish to thank them publicly for the interest they have shown to our organization, until some later date, when we will show our appreciation in a more substantial manner.

The motion was made and carried that Brothers Cartwright and Keenan be requested to serve out their terms of office. In replying to the motion, Brother Cartwright spoke for himself and Brother Keenan also, and said "that while he was a very busy man he appreciated the honor bestowed upon him by the members, and that he would serve until the first of the year, when the new election of officers is to take place; then if you feel the same way as you do to-night, and want me, I will accept. No matter which way the wind blows, I wish it understood I am with you in spirit always. I came among you when you were a very small organization and I have watched you grow with much gratification, and to-night I am pleased to stand before such a large, intelligent body of men, as their chairman." The applause was loud and long as the President resumed his seat.

We hope to have a large number of applicants at our next meeting. Now that we have our charter, we can set at rest the doubting Thomases, and say, "We told you so." Any man holding our card for one year can operate a moving picture machine in any theater in the United States and Canada where organized labor is employed.

I. G. SHERMAN,
Recording Secretary.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Am enclosing you copy of an article which appeared in The Moving Picture News of October 16, also copies of letter which I sent to and received from the Bureau of Combustibles of Washington, D. C. Would esteem it a very great favor if you would publish the above articles for the benefit of other operators who may be so foolish as to think they can get something for nothing. Such statements work harm instead of good. I am,

Yours respectfully,
I. G. SHERMAN.

[The substance of the article to which Mr. Sherman refers is as follows: "We wish to state that operators desiring to go in any other State can apply to the Bureau of Combustibles and Fire Risks, Washington, D. C., and the Commissioner thereof will issue a request to the New York Bureau of Licenses that this Bureau examine the said operator, and give him an interstate license, which will permit him to work in any State in the Union. This license, or certificate, issued by the New York or any other bureau, is sent by the examining department to Washington, and there receives the O. K. of the Commissioner in charge; this grants them the permit they need to operate a machine anywhere."]

102 Third Avenue,
New York City, N. Y.

Dear Sir—In reply to your letter of the 20th instant, I beg to state that I am unable to advise you as to how you could obtain an interstate license for the operation of moving picture machines. So far as I am advised no such licenses are issued, each State and municipality having its own regulations governing such matters.

Respectfully,
F. G. WAGNER,
Chief Engineer.

The Novelty Slide Company, New York City, have just illustrated the latest popular patriotic hit, "The Stars and Stripes Are Nailed to the Old North Pole," published by the Pemberton Publishing House. The slides are exceptionally original and novel, and in addition to the many Arctic scenes, include feature slides particularly designed for the song.

The song and slides have met with great success wherever used, and the general report seems to be that the set is one of the best ever put on the market illustrating a patriotic song.

J.J. MURDOCK, COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE INDEPENDENT FILM FORCES RETURNS TO AMERICA AFTER A TRIUMPHANT RECEPTION IN EUROPE.
F. R. MORGAN

"THE CONQUEROR'S RETURN."

It is not for the purpose of poking fun at the Independents that we reproduce the above cartoon from the Chicago publication, the Show World. Morgan, the illustrator, drew upon his imagination in showing Mr. Murdock's return from Europe in the guise of a conqueror and receiving a conqueror's welcome. The real truth of the matter was so contrary to the glorious pageant depicted by Morgan in his drawing, that out of sympathy for Mr. Murdock we prefer to say nothing about the matter.

With the disappearance, temporary or otherwise, of J. J. Murdock from the moving picture field, it becomes necessary for us to put down a few plain facts to explain his eclipse. He was badly served from the start. He was surrounded by individuals who knew nothing of the business and who, to put it mildly, were not of the type of help calculated to advance any new enterprise. Then again the artistic and literary productions in the Show World, of which the annexed drawing is a specimen, put a complexion on Mr. Murdock and his doings which they never possessed. As flights of imagination they were excellent, as cold clear statements of business facts they were worthless, and they have met their inevitable Nemesis. The entire episode should be consigned to oblivion as quickly as possible in the interests of all parties.

Meanwhile the Independent import situation is in process of straightening itself out, as we foresaw would be the case several months ago. To begin with, it is doubtful, in our minds, whether it is feasible for any one American house to control the entire European situation. Several of the European manufacturers, as we know from personal interviews with them, are disposed to have a cut in at the game themselves. In other words they are going to establish their own agencies here just as the American manufacturers are establishing their own agencies in London, England, and other large cities. This it seems to us is a logical development of the situation. At the time of writing, negotiations are in progress in several quarters, although we have hardly anything definite to state. Be that as it may, we wish to say that the policy of the open door is entirely one which commends itself to The Moving Picture World. Monopolies of any kind are distasteful to us, especially monopolies which are conducted in a loose, unbusiness-like way. Standard Oil, we know, has its enemies as well as its apologists, but the fact stands clear that the ultimate consumer is looked after by Standard Oil. If the same parallel had been preserved in the Independent moving picture field during the past eight or nine months the present impasse would never have been reached. This is a free country and American manufacturers who ship their goods abroad in large quantities have surely no right to complain if the doctrine of reciprocity is put into practice.

A correspondent draws our attention to the appended statement of circulation which was printed in a moving picture publication of May 1 last: "Every exhibitor reads the Moving Picture News. There are 8,750 on our mailing list. Advertisements bring results." Exactly the same statement is printed in the publication under date of October 16th last, so that according to its own confession the publication in question has not received a single new subscriber in six months. "Unless it be," adds our correspondent, "myself, and I read the sheet for the purpose of enjoying the curiosities of grammar, spelling, fact and fiction which this most erratic publication issued in the Union invariably contains."

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

NURSING A VIPER.—A story of the French Revolution. That frightful era in French history beginning with the outbreak of insurrectionary movements in Paris, July 12, 1789, and the taking of the Bastile, July 14, has often been the subject of song, story and drama, and it is small wonder that it should prove thrilling material for motion pictures, as this Biograph production will evince. Prior to that period, termed the Reign of Terror, from the above date until July 28, 1794, when the leader, Maximillan Rohespierre, sufferel death on the guillotiue. French nobility was sunk in profligacy and, while they were exempt from land tax, the lower class shouldered the hurden of labor and of paying taxes. They rehelled against absolutism and demanded political independence, equal rights and universal freedom. The outcome was the perpetuation of atrocities never equaled in the world's history. Many of the absolutists fled the country for safety, while others feigned assumption of republican sentiments. Our story shows a party of the nohility endeavoring to evade the insurrectionists, but only one succeeds in outdistancing them. He rushes into the house of an aristocrat who is immune from trouble on account of his professed republicanism. Here he begs succor, which is granted, and he manages to elude his pursuers in the role of the aristocrat's servant. However, the riotous moh ransack the house and grounds in a depredatory manner, taking up quarters on the outside from which point to work deeds of lawlessness. It is not assumed that the hunted man adhered to his principles through loyalty or honor. No, he was rather the cowardly cur, as we shall see. Hardly ensconced in the house, he at once shows his despicahle nature by questionable advances toward the wife of his savior. She, at first, does not realize the meaning of his attentions, assuming them to he an exaggerated show of gratitude, hut it is not long before she awakens to the truth, and the timely arrival of her husband saves her from the viper's clutches. The husband would at first shoot him down like a dog—hut no; on second thought a hetter plan occurs to him. Making him, at the point of a pistol, resume his original attire, he forces him out among the moh where he meets his just fate. In conclusion, we must add that the above hut vaguely describes one of the most thrilling moving picture subjects ever attempted.

THE GIBSON GODDESS.—"Oh! Why do they call me the Gihson Girl?" These lines of a popular song were uttered with a sigh hy the heroine of this Biograph comedy, for beauty is sometimes an annoying possession. Nanette Renfrae, after an arduous season of society's whirl, decides to spend a quiet Summer at a secluded seaside resort. The place selected is one frequented hy the middle class, where she feels she will he free from the tormenting attentions of the male sex that her heauty has induced in the past. She arrives without ostentation accompanied only hy her maid, but her extreme pulchritude and graceful hearing soon enraptured the male contingent of the place to the jealous rage of the other women folks who find themselves deserted. She cannot stir hut what there is a score of admirers present. A walk on the heach, a stroll through the park is invariably attended by a regiment of gallants, until to her they hecome positive pests. One would have been acceptable, hut twenty—well, it seems as if she is destined to pass time in the seclusion of her room. The maid, however, is ingenious and suggests a new way to get rid of the troublesome pests. She attires her mistress in a bathing suit and puts on her a hideous pair of stockings lined with raw cotton, which gives her a Gargantuan appearance, at least as to her nethers. Of course, the persistent tormenters flee in a pauic when they hehold; hut, you know "none hut the brave deserve the fair," and Commodore Fitzmorris sticks, thereby making a decided impression upon Nanette. You may imagine the chagrin of the others when they learn of the hoax. Fitzie is now the favored one. As for the others, they are a disgruntled hunch, for the other girls, slighted hefore, turn cold shoulders on them. Length, 576 feet.

WHAT'S YOUR HURRY?—"What's your hurry? Here's your hat?" Well they didn't have to hand Harry his hat on this particular occasion. He left in such a hurry that if he had not had his hat in his hand at the time he would have left without it. It occurred on papa's hirthday. When papa appears at breakfast there is a wealth of presents awaiting him, the most prized among which is a double harreled shot gun, for papa is somewhat of a sportsman. He can hardly finish his meal in his anxiety to fondle the fowling piece, and show it to his friends. Mary's sweetheart, Harry, calls and hecoming hold kisses her——not only once, hut twice in the same place—mercy! Mary threatens to tell papa if he dares to do it again. He dares, and she rushes off ostensibly to tell; hut does she? Of course not. Papa is still enraptured with his gun and goes in to show it to Harry. He, of course, guilty conscienced, thinks his time has come, so he heats it, and every time he comes within range of papa he hurriedly lengthens the distance between them, until at last papa apprehends him and learns to his extreme amusement what the trouble is. Length, 403 feet.

EDISON MFG. CO.

COMEDY AND TRAGEDY.—The silent drama has no greater exponent of its art than the famous French actress, Mlle. Pilar-Morin, whose reputation in this country and in Europe is too well known to comment upon. That she is considered the greatest living female pantomimist in the world no one will question. She has made the voiceless drama her life study. To have brought Mlle. Morin's talent into the field of moving pictures is an achievement for the Edison Company, and one that every patron of the moving picture theater should appreciate. Every month the Edison Company reaches higher and higher for the hest that can be had in the way of advancing the standard of the motion picture.

In "Comely and Tragedy" Mlle. Morin has full scope for her wonderful talent and expression. A strong dramatic story is woven around the love of a famous actress who has become deeply infatuated with the handsome hodyguard of a Prince. The Prince, himself enamored of the actress, hears of her attachment for his hodyguard, Captain Duval, and informs the lady in a letter that if, at her reception, she shows hut one sign or word of affection toward Captain Duval, the latter shall die hy the sword of the Prince, who is the most expert duellist in France. The letter is carried to the actress by no less a person than Captain Duval himself. The actress keeps her lover in ignorance of the contents of the letter, and on the night of the reception she is put to the extreme test of her art in hiding her feelings towards the man she loves—tearing her very heart chords while she laughs and mocks at his words of love in order to save him from the Prince's wrath. Convinced from her attitude that the Prince has supplanted him in her affections, and wild with jealousy and rage, Captain Duval confronts the Prince and, seeking revenge or death, forces His Highness to fight him a duel.

Meanwhile, the guests having laid a wager as to whether the actress' talent shines hest in comedy or tragedy, she is sought out and forced to prove the wager. While in the midst of a very humorous scene portraying comedy, the actress hears the clash of swords in the garden and, realizing that her lover's life is in danger, she rushes to the door leading to the garden, hut finds to her dismay that it is locked. Frantically she struggles to force the lock, and implores her guests to assist her; hut they, taking it for granted that her change of emotion is but a sample of her versatility, only applaud her apparent display of talent. Her grief and anger at heing unable to make them realize that her emotions are real and not mere acting are wonderfully portrayed, and this scene alone stands out as a pronounced dramatic triumph in the field of the silent drama.

Reaching the garden at last, the actress finds the dead hody of the Prince and receives the taunts of her soldier lover. She finally convinces him, however, hy means of the Prince's letter, that her apparent change of heart was only assumed and the reunion of the lovers forms a pretty finale to another strongly dramatic scene.

Mlle. Morin's portrayal of the famous actress in all her varying moods from coquetry to tragedy, from light comedy to pathos, is a wonderful piece of work and one that will be greatly appreciated hy those who admire the highest and best in the silent drama.

A DUEL IN MID-AIR.—Tom Dowling, a young structural steel worker, and Jim Reagan, one of his fellow workmen, both love pretty Kitty O'Hara. Jim proposes to Kitty hut is refused just as Tom calls on her. The manner in which he is received by Kitty leads Jim to suspect that he is the favored one. Jim leaves the house in a jealous rage, vowing vengeance on Tom.

At the Steel Workers' Ball Reagan, who has been drinking, claims a dance from Kitty. She pleads a previous engagement with Dowling. Reagan roughly and in a drunken way insists, taking hold of Kitty. Dowling interferes and Reagan attacks him, hut is prevented from continuing the quarrel hy mutual friends. The next day the two men meet at the top of a skyscraper in course of construction.

Reagan attacks Dowling as he is suspended high in the air on a steel girder that is being lifted to the roof, and a thrilling fight ensues. Back and forth their figures sway at that dizzy height, the frenzied Reagan with fingers sunk deep in Dowling's throat striving to hreak his hold on the chain. Weight and strength begin to tell and Dowling is being gradually forced hackward, when his assailant, in attempting to shift his position so as to reach a heavy hammer, loses his halance, clutches wildly at the air and falls from the girder to the ground. Dowling, losing consciousness, sinks in a faint, hut is prevented from falling hy his peculiar position on the girder, and is soon rescued hy fellow workmen. Reagan is taken to the hospital, where, in a signed statement, he charges Dowling with deliberately attempting to kill him. Dowling, arrested at Kitty's home, is hrought before Reagan for identification, hut in the meantime Reagan, realizing that he has hut a short time to live, retracts his former statement and tells the truth. The story ends hy Reagan taking the hands of the two lovers and holding them together, as he expires.

The story in the picture, a combination of love and melodrama, is concisely told. The character types are interesting and the narrative thrilling and absorbing throughout.

BILL THE BILL POSTER.—"Bill the Bill Poster"—that sounds good, doesn't it? Well, under that title the Edison Company has placed on the market a picture that is hetter than the title sounds.

Our friend Bill, tired from his day's labor, returns home and stretches himself out on the hed for a good sleep, after first getting on the outside of several copious draughts of whiskey that, judged from the effect it produced, must have heen of the kaleidoscopic hrand. At any rate, while Bill may have been pretty tired, the picture shows that it was only in spots, and one of these was not his hrain, which immediately hegan to work overtime.

In his dream he starts out on his daily decorating tour, with hrush, pail and posters. He puts up a hill advertising a dancer and steps hack to survey the effect, when, to his amazement, the pictnre comes to life and executes a dance for his henefit! and altogether shows that he is master of the for he immediately puts up a three-sheet, advertising a well-known ham, and is repaid with a tempting sandwich for his trouble.

It looks easy to Bill after that and he doesn't require much inspiration for his next move, which is to get a "chaser" for the sandwich. Selecting another three-sheet, advertising a popular hrand of firewater, he puts it up, and is overjoyed to find, immediately, signs of animation. Discovering that the original of the "ad" is a member of his lodge, Bill puts a "wig-wag" system into effect and, the answering sign heing given, approaches the hillhoard with confidence and pleasaut anticipation.

He reaches out to take the glass that is proffered him—and wakes up to find that not only has he lost a drink in his dream hut in reality as well, for the hottle he takes from under the hed is empty. Of course Bill was disappointed, hut those who witness his disappointment will not share it hy any means, for it is one of the hest short comedy films produced for some time past.

A BACHELOR'S LOVE AFFAIR.—When a man is past forty-five and not married, especially when he has three cozy rooms and a man servant, he will tell you he is living an ideal existence. He will explain, if you should ask him why he never married, that there was a girl once—the only girl—er, on the other hand there are too many girls in the world for him and he never could he so selfish as to give himself up to only one.

Jack Raymond, our hero, (if a hachelor may he called a hero), is past forty-five and not married. He has three rooms, hath and a man servant. Just now he is seated at his table in the library in his comfortable smoking jacket and well-worn slippers, smoking his pipe, while old Bartlett, a model man servant, busies himself about the room. He is exceedingly satisfied with life.

As he dreams over his hooks and pipe the door hell rings and a messenger boy is ushered in. The telegram, addressed to Raymoud, is signed hy an old college chum, and reads:

New York, November 3, 1909.

Mr. Jack Raymond,
Boston, Mass.

Am called to Europe on husiness and am sending my little hahy girl, Bessie, for you to take care of during my absence.

FRED.

Raymond groans, rises and storms about the room, begging his faithful and quick-witted Bartlett to find some way out of the predicament. Sending a hahy to him! How in the world will he take care of a hahy; he doesn't know the first thing about them! But the ever genial Bartlett's face lightens.

"A hahy—coming here?" he says. "Why, what a novelty. Really, sir, I think that will be most agreeable."

Raymond is finally won over and instructs Bartlett to get the cradle from the garret and gives him $5 to huy the little one some playthings. Everything is made ready for the haby and Bartlett and Raymond wait in expectant suspense.

The "haby" arrives, carrying a suitcase, a winsome little lass of seventeen. Bartlett is happily embarrassed, while Raymond laughingly carries out the toys and cradle.

The "baby," as Bartlett prophecied, turned out to he most agreeable. Her ever husy hands soon revolutionize things about the house. Under girlish fingers the plainness of the rooms vanishes. The rooms become a lady's houdoir with bow-ribbons, dainty doilies and various nick-nacks. Numerous missing huttons on Uncle Jack's coats and shirts mysteriously find their places again, while the socks with holes in them, which he had laid aside, go back to his wardrobe neatly mended.

The touch effeminate even invades the crusty old bachelor's heart. He finds himself spending more time in making himself attractive. He lays aside the old smoking jacket for a smart new one, and eschews the more odoriferous pipe for the sweeter smelling Havana cigars.

One morning Bachelor Jack stands at his window, breathing in the fresh, perfume laden air, when Bessie, blithe and sweet as the morning, steps in from the garden with a rose, which she pins in his coat. He looks into her eyes and tears dim his own. Then he takes the precious rose off and puts it tenderly away in his pocket next his heart. He is half persuaded to tell her of his love for her, hut the touch of gray on his forehead reminds him that the winter of his life is too near.

One fine morning Harry Raymond, Jack's nephew, returns from college to spend his Summer vacation with his uncle. The two young people soon become fast friends, all unconscious of the love that is springing up between them.

The Summer days go by and as the time for school again approaches Harry confesses his love. The girl happily goes to his arms and tells him her love for him. Uncle Jack wanders out into the garden and finding them together in each other's arms, slips quietly back to the house, unselfishly content to let his own little dream fade away.

In due time Harry brings his sweetheart to Uncle Jack, who gives them his blessing, besides a substantial check to "feather the nest."

A short time later they leave and Jack returns to his pipe, his slippers, his books and his good man, Bartlett. Yet, on many a Winter night, left alone in his library, he brings from a drawer in the table a faded rose, then he drops back in his chair dreaming.

GAUMONT.

DON QUIXOTE.—Faithfully portrays the greatest of the adventures (so ably described in the famous story) of that gaunt country gentleman of La Mancha. Don Quixote was fired with genuine Castilian honor and enthusiasm, gentle and dignified in his character, trusted by his friends and loved by his dependents, but was so completely crazed by long reading of the most famous books of chivalry that he believed them to be true and felt himself called upon to become the impossible knight errant they described, actually went forth into the world to defend the oppressed and avenge the injured like the heroes of his romances.

Each scene following the preceding one in rapid succession, shows us a perfectly finished incident of the story, told absolutely without padding and in perfect costuming, and staged to truthfully and realistically represent the period (the early sixteenth century). The scenes are arranged in the following order:

Don Quixote, the Knight of the Sorrowful Figure, is seen in his well-stocked library, deeply engrossed in reading Tales of Chivalry. So enthralled is he that his meals are forgotten and visitors unnoticed.

He decides to renew the exploits of feudal days and persuades a fat, thick set countryman, Sancho Panza by name, to follow him as a squire. They prepare armor for the knight, using a brass shaving basin for a helmet.

They secure their steeds, namely; for Don Quixote an old rawboned animal, to which the knight gives the name of "Rozinante," and for Sancho, a little long-eared donkey, which staggers under his ponderous burden.

The departure of the immortal knight and his squire is most grotesque, showing two types of human nature contrasted strongly even on the silent stage.

The film depicts their travels among the most picturesque of scenes.

While imagining that every object he sees is worthy of knightly service, the old man performs many ludicrous exploits. The main action is presumably allegorical, but introduces numerous episodes of bucolic or pastoral kind, as well as many pictures of Spanish life and much promiscuous adventure.

Attempting to free slaves, the Don is beaten by them. Aspiring to be knighted, he is made sport of by an old inn-keeper, whom he mistakes for a king. Attempting to overcome a windmill, which he supposes to be a giant, he gets entangled in the sails and is badly hurt in the encounter.

His faithful squire carefully brings Don Quixote back to his old home, where, broken in spirit, and grieved at his experiences and surrounded by his relatives the poor old fellow dies.

MYSTIC MELODIES.—An artistically planned story of the power of music to produce beautiful waking dreams.

In this case a young artist at the piano charms the Muse of Melody into appearance at his own poor quarters. Here she magically changes the costume of his wife to a luxurious gown and her shoes, hat, etc., likewise undergo marvellous transformation. The muse then converts these rich habits into articles of decoration for the rooms.

As the music gradually ceases the gifts of the fairy also fade until when the artist ceases to play on the piano all the old ugliness of the room has returned.

THE WARRIOR'S SACRIFICE.—The Betrothal.—Introducing our soldier hero and his sweetheart, the ferryman's daughter, in perfect scenes of great beauty along the placid stream, which divides a medieval city. All out-of-door scenes insure actual true-to-life staging.

War Declared—The Departure.—There is hurrying about the streets of the romantic old city, for the troops are ordered to the field. During the turmoil in the streets, sadly our knight bids adieu to his sweetheart and her father at the ferry landing. The army departs.

The Rich Youth in Love.—Chance brings a handsome and wealthy young landlord to the ferry landing, where he meets and is charmed by the sweet daughter of the old boatman. True to her absent lover, she refuses his attentions.

Sad News.—Peace is declared for a time and the soldiers return to their homes, but without the youth of our especial interest. Instead, they bring word that he has perished.

Mother and Son.—The powerful young lord and his stately mother shown in the grounds of their magnificent estate. The youth is despondent because of his unrequited love. Word comes that his rival has been killed.

Married.—Supposing her lover to be dead, the ferryman's daughter now accepts the attentions of her grand suitor and is married with great pomp.

The Return.—A year has elapsed, when the soldier, who in reality was only wounded and taken a prisoner in the battle of the previous year, returns to claim his bride. He learns that his love now belongs to another.

Beneath the Lady's Window.—Heartbroken, he secures a boatman to take him to a spot beneath his sweetheart's chamber window. Here he sings to her the old songs of their courting days. Touched by the sweet memories, she agrees to meet him at the castle boat landing.

The Renunciation.—The husband finds his wife and the soldier together. Hot words ensue, which are stopped from developing into a duel by the intervention of the lady, who though deeply pained, persuades the depressed soldier that her duty is to her husband..

The Battle.—In which the heartsick soldier, with a mere handful of companions, defends the drawbridge at the city gate against the onslaught of the enemies' armies. Here, in a thrilling scene, full of excitement and intense action, he loses his life.

THE CATTLE THIEVES.—A story of the Canadian Northwest Mounted Police.

Scene I.—The picture opens with a view of the yard of one of those barracks for the police that we find scattered over Canada. It is here the hero of our story, Sergt. Charlton, is stationed. Here come the police mounted on their horses. They are having their usual morning drill. At the word of command they wheel and turn with all the accuracy of well-trained regular cavalry. Now the order to dismount is given and as one man they slide to the ground. Here comes Sergt. Charlton. He approaches his superior officer with a leave of absence he wishes signed. The officer signs it and Charlton mounts and as he rides away his comrades guy him good naturedly about his intended visit to his sweetheart.

Scene II.—Along one of the country lanes comes Pierre, the French half-breed, mounded on his Indian cow-pony. While in reality the leader of a gang of outlaws and thieves that have their headquarters back in the hills, Pierre poses as a dealer in cattle. Many a farmer has bought or sold cattle to Pierre only to be visited a short time later by a mysterious gang of cattle thieves. Evidently he is now carrying out some prearranged plan, for he climbs over the fence deliberately and walks slowly through the pasture.

Scene III.—This is the hamlet of the home of Mary Windon, Charlton's sweetheart. Her father and her younger brother are busy greasing the wheels of one of the farm carriages. Mary who has just returned from a ride to the distant village approaches quietly and with a sudden jump frightens her brother so that he drops in the dirt the huggy wheel bolt he is holding. Her father scolds her gently for hindering their work. Over her brother's head, Mary tells her father she wants to speak to him alone. As soon as Windon has sent the boy away on a trumped-up errand Mary, clinging closely to her father, blushingly tells him of Charlton's love, shows him the ring she received that morning by mail and tells of Charlton's intended visit. Her father takes her in his arms and kisses her forehead. Just then Pierre, the half-breed, approaches. He tells Windon he wishes to purchase some cattle. Windon starts toward the herd. Pierre has long coveted Mary in his greedy way and finding himself near her his passion gets beyond control. He seizes her roughly in his arms. At her cry of alarm Windon rushes to her aid but is knocked down by a blow from Pierre's fist. Mary's brother has heard her cry and comes rushing from the house with a rifle, but before he can raise it to his shoulder Pierre drops him to the ground with a shot from his revolver. Pierre is carrying Mary off, when at the moment he is most needed Charlton arrives on his intended visit. Pierre is soon put to flight and Mary and Charlton assist the wounded brother to the house. The father looks after Pierre and vows vengeance against him.

Scene IV.—Back in an inaccessible corner in the granite foothills Pierre's little band of thieves have taken up temporary quarters. They have only lately arrived in this section of the country, the suspicions of the Mounted Police havin gdriven them from their old quarters. Hark, someone is coming. It is Pierre, their leader. He tells them of the drove of fat cattle he has seen at the Windon farm and how it is guarded only by an old man and a girl. An easy job for this gang to make away with such poorly guarded cattle. Hurriedly horses are mounted and the gang ride away.

Scene V.—Soon the gang reach the Windon farm. Pierre rides boldly up to the barn, ties his pony and after seeing no one is about beckons on the remainder of his gang. The barn door is opened, the cattle are driven out and started down the lane that leads to the main road. All the gang have started away except Pierre and he is starting for his pony when he turns and sees Charlton. In a moment they are struggling desperately. Pierre is no match for the well-trained athletic young mounted policeman and Charlton soon has him at his mercy. But Pierre's gang have heard the noise of the struggle. They return to his aid. The brave Charlton is stretched out by a savage blow on the head. But what shall they do with him? Pierre has not forgotten how Charlton foiled him before and with a snarl of rage he directs his gang to bring his pony. The senseless Charlton is thrown over the pony's back, Pierre mounts and they all hasten away. Now Mary and her father who have heard the sound of the struggle at the house come rushing to the barn. The father discovers the loss of his cattle, Mary finds her lover's coat. But what is this? The father picks up Pierre, the half-breed's, whip. Then it is he who has stolen the cattle. And Charlton is a prisoner in his power. Aid must be secured. Meanwhile Pierre has reached the last gate leading out to the main road. Only a short distance down the road is the path through the woods that leads to their headquarters. Now the cattle are driven through the gate and soon they will all be back in the security of the wild foothills.

Scene VI.—Across the hamlet dashes Mary mounted on her pony. There is no one else to ride for aid. Her father is feeble, besides someone must stay to care for her wounded brother. He watches her out of sight, then turns back towards the house. And now over the top of the hill comes Mary in a headlong gallop towards that far-distant goal, the barracks of Charlton's comrades. On she comes still urging forward her little pony, who responds gamely to her repeated coaxing.

Scene VII.—Back at the barracks the men have finished their daily drill and are lounging about when Mary dashes up and begins to tell of Charlton's peril. Scarcely has she begun before a party rush off to saddle and ride to his aid. Mary has barely finished giving the full story of Pierre's theft when the rescue party return and led by Mary dash out of the gate of the barracks. And now they have reached the foothills and have begun the search for their missing comrade, a search they will not end either by night or day until he is released and his assailants captured.

Scene VIII.—Pierre's gang having reached the safety of the wild foothills with their captive now stop for a rest. Charlton has recovered his senses and is lying on the ground. Pierre taunts him and slaps his face. Charlton tells him he is a cowardly cur to strike a man bound hand and foot. Pierre laughs cruelly. So! well he will show this member of that hated mounted police what Pierre is capable of doing. He calls to his gang, Charlton is lifted to his feet, one of the gang is sent up the tree, under which they are standing, with a rope. It is thrown over a limb, the end is wound around Charlton's thumbs and he is carried over beneath the limb. Now the other end is pulled taut and he is slowly lifted by his thumbs. Charlton's face shows the terrible pain he is suffering but he bravely stifles all outcry. The gang tie the end of the rope around the tree and seat themselves to enjoy the sight of the anguish one of their hated enemies, the mounted police, is suffering.

Scene IX.—Meanwhile the rescue party in their search for traces of Pierre and his gang come across one of the stolen cattle. Mary quickly identifies it. The party dismount, Mary and the leader creep forward while the remainder of the party hide their horses. As Mary and the leader peer over the top of a small hill they see Charlton being tortured by the gang. At the sight of her lover's suffering Mary reels. But only for a second. Quickly recovering herself she seizes the leader's rifle. It comes to her shoulder. A shot rings out and Charlton drops to the ground. Mary's shot has severed the rope. At the sound of the shot the gang draw their guns. A desperate fight is soon waging. Charlton frees his hands and feet and grapples with Pierre. Now the remainder of the rescue party rush up. The gang is captured and Charlton takes in his arms his brave little sweetheart whose marvelous shot put an end to his terrible ordeal.

THE LONELY BACHELOR.—This is another work from the gifted pen of the noted dramatist, Michel Carre, already familiar to our patrons through "The Reckoning."

"The Lonely Bachelor" is a pathetic little tale of a worthless chap that was made to give up his wayward life through the influence of a little child.

Straggling home from the club one night where he had passed the evening drinking and playing cards, as was his usual mode of passing his evenings, the hero of this tale stumbles upon an object on his homeward way, and on stooping down to see what has impeded his progress, he finds to his astonishment that the soft dark bundle is a little girl. The tiny maiden on being so rudely awakened looks up into the stranger's face, and as he raises her in his arms, she places her little head on his broad shoulder and continues her nap. Well, was ever man in such a position? Protect the little one whom chance has thrown in his way, he surely must. But what is alonely bachelor to do with a poor little girl? After some minutes of serious thought the man decides to take the little waif to his home, where he places her in his own warm bed and makes himself comfortable on the couch. The days that follow are happy ones for the lonely man finds untold delight in

Business Before Pleasure

In the motion picture business you've got to start on a business basis before you can give your patrons the pleasure they expect when they come to your show.

You're not starting on a business basis when you install an inferior machine which projects shaky pictures, stops, keeps your audience waiting and uses up a big proportion of your income on repairs.

THE EDISON KINETOSCOPE

Is the machine which puts your show on a business basis from the start. The pictures are steady and clear—easy on the eyes. None of the stops and jerks so common in the ordinary machine. And further, the Edison needs fewest repairs and will outlast any other motion picture machine made.

The Edison Kinetoscope is the machine that keeps the same crowd coming to your show night after night, and that's the crowd that establishes your business basis. Write to-day for booklet, giving full details, and a copy of the Edison Kinetogram.

the company of the pretty child whom he soon comes to look upon as his own.

In the meantime, however, the child's mother who was forced by circumstances to abandon her offspring, finds work, and immediately begins to make inquiries for her little girl. Fortune favors her and she soon hears that the child has been adopted by a well-to-do man, but when she claims the little one, the foster father is heartbroken.

Realizing, however, that the woman has a right to her own child, he gives her up and goes back to his old bohemian life; but somehow or other he has lost his taste for the club and the merry fellows he meets there, and longs for his quiet evenings with the little girl. Well, the end of it all is that he marries the child's mother, a prepossessing woman, and thereby makes three people happy, because the little one has not forgotten her friend by any means, but shows in every way that she bears a real daughter's affection for the once lonely bachelor.

ACROSS THE ISLAND OF CEYLON.—A trip to the beautiful Isle of Ceylon! Could one have a more delightful treat? Such beauties on every side as the train wends its way through this land of rich vegetation. The mountains in the distance hold a million tints upon which the traveler can feast his eyes, and palms and plants of every description seem to abound in this land of plenty. Well, one must see this instructive film to appreciate all the interesting scenes it contains, and we hope our many patrons will each and every one have an opportunity to enjoy its beauties.

EAT YOUR SOUP.—This is all about a fat baby that would not eat his soup and the terrible trouble he gives everybody in consequence.

The entire family, consisting of the father, mother and baby, with his nurse, are about to spend the day in the country, and the nurse, anxious that baby will be well fortified before starting out on the journey, endeavors in vain to make the stubborn little fellow swallow his bowl of soup. The baby, however, does not feel a bit like soup that morning, and no amount of coaxing will move him from his determination not to touch a drop of the beverage. He punches the poor impatient nurse as she tries to get the spoon to his mouth, and altogether shows that he is master of the household. The father then tries what he can do, because it is time to start and if they don't hurry they will lose the train, but the baby treats papa with the utmost scorn, showing in his whole bearing how stupid he thinks him not to be able to appreciate that when a person does not feel like eating it is not only very impolite, but also a great loss of valuable time to try to force him to do so.

The party is already on the train and Mr. Baby still refuses to take any nourishment, but the poor unoffending passengers get their share of the soup, however, because in the frantic efforts of father, mother and nurse to get the baby to take a drink of the soup a goodly portion of it is spilled on the people sitting in the seats nearby.

Arriving at their distination some acrobats are seen performing by the way and the baby claps his chubby hands in delight, the father believing that the clown perhaps can influence the baby to take the soup, hands him the child, but the latter still refuses to touch it, but spying an attendant bringing one of the performing dogs his biscuit, he makes a grab for it, and before his horrified mother can stop him he swallows the dog food with relish.

THE GENERAL'S BIRTHDAY PRESENT.—The officers of the garrison anxious to honor the General on his approaching birthday, decide to have one of their number, who has quite a reputation as an artist, make a bust of the fine old man. The sculptor, pleased that they have chosen him to do the work, makes every effort to have it a success, and when it is finally finished his brother officers have nothing but words of praise for their friend's masterpiece.

The evening of the birthday an orderly is given the precious bust with instructions to carry it to the General's house and to be very, very careful that nothing happens to it.

Unfortunately, the orderly on his way to the General's meets an old pal whom he has not seen for years, and greeting him warmly invites him into a neighboring tavern so they can drink to their meeting and also to the General's health. It happens that the orderly's friend is carrying a bundle of much the same shape and size as that his friend bears in his arms, and in order to better enjoy the beverages they have ordered the two friends deposit their bundles on a nearby bench and promptly turn their attention to the sparkling glasses before them. When they have talked and celebrated to their hearts' content they get up, pick up their bundles and start for the door. But as luck would have it the orderly gets his friend's bundle and his friend unconsciously starts off with the valued bust, both bundles being so much alike they never notice the mistake. On reaching the General's house, where a grand reception is being held in his home, the orderly hastens to deliver his precious burden. The guests all stand around the happy old man as he unwraps the gift with trembling fingers (so much is he touched by this expression of devotion on the part of his men). But fancy his disappointment and mortification when on removing the last wrapper he beholds, not the handsome bust of himself he has heard so much about, but a huge ugly pumpkin! We draw the curtain here, the rest of this tale is too sad to relate—one must see the picture to appreciate the outraged feelings of everyone present.

THE PRODIGAL SON.—There is surely a treat in store for those who are fortunate enough to see this richly colored picture, the subject of which as the title denotes, is that touching parable of the Bible, the Prodigal Son. We are indebted to Mr. Lavedan, already known to our patrons through his masterly work, "The Assassination of the Duke of Guise," for this version of the biblical story.

In the first picture we behold the two brothers, the younger the hero of this tale, offering their goods for sale, when a poor beggar woman approaches them and asks for alms. The elder of the two gives the unfortunate mendicant the smallest possible portion of grain from his well-filled sack, and the younger brother, the prodigal son, disgusted at his brother's parsimony, reaches over and strews the contents of the sack all over the ground. The other becoming enraged, strikes his brother in a fury, but just at this juncture the aged father of the lads makes his appearance, and grieved beyond measure to see his sons disputing between themselves, raises his hand to separate them, but the prodigal feeling injured and resenting the overbearing and selfish ways of his elder brother, in an excited voice tells his poor old father that he is tired of home and would leave it and go forth to enjoy the freedom and pleasures of the world. The poor old parent stands aghast at such statements from his best-loved son, and can hardly believe his ears when the boy insists upon having his inheritance so he will be free to leave immediately. Seeing that he is in earnest, the old man with tears in his eyes and his magnificent old head bowed down in grief, goes over to the chest and hands to his ungrateful offspring the inheritance he demands. The foolish boy then without further delay starts out thinking only of the pleasure and excitement awaiting him in the great world beyond.

Free now and his own master the Prodigal indulges in all sorts of wild extravagance; he satisfies his every whim and spends his money like water. But often in the midst of his indulgence, a vision thrusts itself upon him (and how wonderfully this vision is produced in this picture, such a transformation from the scene of splendor and happiness that goes before it!) of the suffering and poverty that must be his when he has come to the end of his fortune. But he puts all such unpleasant thoughts aside; he will have none of them, but goes on his reckless way, spending right and left. The scene in the mart, showing the picturesque merchants, with their gaudy wares spread out in artistic disorder around them, is one of the most interesting in the film. When the prodigal enters this mart his presence is greeted with bows and smiles from the expectant merchants, with whom he has the name of being a liberal spender and who have already greatly benefited by the manner in which he squanders his money. Here and there he stops and picks up some worthless trinket for which he pays a fabulous sum, and then goes merrily on his foolish way.

But the time of retribution is bound to come for the wrongdoer, and so it is with the hero of this tale, the prodigal who, now that a famine has visited the country, and that the poor, suffering farmers go to him for relief, is obliged to flee and seek work himself from a distant landowner in order to ward off starvation. This wealthy man to whom he applies for work tells him that he can mind the swine; and as nothing is too menial for the miserable youth in his starving condition, he gladly accepts the position of swineherd. As he sits on a rock watching the swine feed, the thought of the happy home and loving father whom he treated so badly comes to him, and he longs to have a right to return to that home; but, after his conduct, he despairs of ever being welcomed there again. However, on going over his life and of the many, many ways his dear old father showed his affection for his younger son, the prodigal believes that, notwithstanding the past, his father will not refuse him shelter should he return.

Jumping up, with hope in his heart, the swineherd leaves the swine to their own devices and starts in the direction of his own country. Many and many a weary mile he travels until, almost exhausted, he finally comes within sight of his father's lands.

During the absence of his son the father has suffered a stroke of paralysis which has left him helpless, but we note that the grand old man still retains his dignified bearing as we see him seated on the couch in his luxuriously furnished home being waited upon by those around him. As he sits he gazes sadly out on the surrounding country, when, all at once, he seems to see a familiar figure in the distance, and on looking closer, finds that that same figure is making its way slowly towards his house. As the figure draws closer the old man starts as if receiving a sudden shock, and before the servants can stop him, with one supreme effort of his will, he rises from his couch, steadies himself for an instant, and then rushes to the door, where he is just in time to catch his beloved boy to his heart. The latter tries to tear himself from his father's arms and kneel at his feet to beg forgiveness, but the old man will not allow it, but calls to one of the servants to kill the fatted calf as the prodigal has at last returned. Such generosity moves the youth to tears. When the elder son hears of his younger brother's return and of the royal welcome extended to him he becomes jealous and angry and refuses to see the wanderer. Their aged parent, however, prevails upon his first-born to put aside such unbrotherly feelings, and we see him drawing them together and making them clasp hands while he, with the light of happiness illuminating his countenance, raises his hands in a blessing over their bowed heads.

COPS ON A STRIKE.—The policemen of the town have been severely reprimanded for negligence in the matter of their personal appearance. Their dissatisfaction gives vent to the resolution to go on strike, and they retire to a public hall to draw up a statement of their grievances.

In the meantime, the authorities are informed of the situation, and immediate steps are taken for the crushing of the revolt of the policemen. It is decided to enlist the services of the inmates of the prison, who, nothing loth, march in good order to the scene of action. The policemen, still engaged in listening to each other's oratorical efforts, are pounced upon by the prisoners, and a hand-to-hand fight ensues, in which the policemen are speedily vanquished. They are then carried off to prison, there to reflect upon the inexpediency of strikes, and their own ignominous condition.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO.

THE SENORITA.—The story deals with the old aristocratic chivalry of the Mexican gentleman, whose well bred family traits and traditions eliminate thought of nationality in a wholesome desire of offering hospitality to the stranger. In this instance the stranger is an American, a "Gringo," that type not loved too well by our friends across the border. Nor indeed is Jack Thornton a very lovable character, as our tale will bear out.

We first find him bent under the weight of the saddle and bridle of his horse that has just perished from over-riding, fatigue and thirst. Spent with his long, weary foot journey, the last drop of water gone from his canteen, overcome, he sinks upon the heated rocks, exhausted, unconscious.

Soon after, an Apache Indian on horseback, his squaw trudging on foot by his side, discovers our insensible "Americano." Believing him dead they proceed to rifle his pockets. At this juncture, Juarez, a young Mexican, and his fiancee, Conchita, daughter of old Don Jose Vallejo, a well-to-do rancher, find the Indians in the act of robbing the supposedly dead body.

After reviving Thornton with the aid of the squaw's water bottle, they hail two passing Mexicans, and placing the limp body on the horse of one, proceed to carry him to Conchita's home, first having despatched the Apache to announce their coming to Don Jose.

Within a few weeks Jack is gradually nursed back to strength and health. The pretty Conchita has been attentive to his wants, and the cavalier disposition of her affianced husband and her father prevent their noticing the close intimacy that has grown up between her and Thornton. But a peon, Criko, servant to Don Jose, and a devoted slave to his young mistress, alone sees the change that is slowly dulling the senses of Conchita to all else, save the promptings of her American wooer.

One day, while strumming his mandolin, Criko passes the window of the sitting room in the Don's adobe. The sound of voices arrests his attention, and his suspicions are confirmed, for he sees Thornton urging his love for Conchita. Hate grips hard his heart, he thinks of only a few years back when he used to lift the child Conchita to the back of a little pony. He is about to conceal himself, when he is suddenly summoned by the girl into the room. Upon entering, Thornton asks him to post a letter he has just written, tossing him a coin as recompense. He refuses to take the money, his compliance with the request being done for the Senorita alone.

Upon departing, he again watches from the window, sees the renewal of Thorton's advances. Much perturbed of mind and sore of heart, he goes slowly towards the gates of the old adobe, where he sees Juarez approaching and relates to him what he has just seen.

Incredulous and moreover angered at information thus received from a lackey, Juarez throttles the peon, and then relenting his act, passes quietly on to the house. It is then that Criko, dismayed and yet shrewd in his fright, conceals Thornton's letter near the gates.

As we follow Juarez, we find him, after greetings to the Don and his Senora, entering the sitting room, where he finds his fiancee clasped in his rival's arms. With all the fiercely angered passion of his nature he draws his stiletto; then realizing the futility of any satisfaction to himself or to Conchita in the blow he is about to strike, if her love for him has ceased, he finally joins their hands, at the same time taking oath, that if ever Thornton proves unjust to her, his life shall answer therefor.

Despondent, grief stricken to the core, he staggers from the room, from the house, and beset by the Don and the Senora, he confesses the truth to them. Immediately the daughter is summoned. She shamefacedly admits her love for the "Gringo," and is ordered from the adobe.

We will pass over the chagrin and suffering of father and mother to note the tearful departure of Conchita from her childhood's home. Thornton tries to comfort her, but is brutal to Criko, who begs to be permitted to accompany the pair.

THE GIBSON GODDESS

A seaside comedy of the trials of a Gibson girl who, tired after an arduous season of society's whirl, goes to rest up at a secluded seaside resort. She is at once besieged by a score of admirers, who pester her wherever she goes. Her maid, however, devises a plan to get rid of these troublesome pests by attiring her in a bathing suit and filling her stockings with layers of raw cotton, giving her a Gargantuan appearance. The scheme works like a charm.

Length, 576 feet.

WHAT'S YOUR HURRY?

A very funny comedy of a terrified lover who had the audacity to kiss the girl. She threatens to tell papa. Papa is cleaning a shotgun—a birthday present, and enters proudly to show it to Harry. He, with guilty conscience, beats it, and in fact every time he sees papa, he hurriedly lengthens the distance between them.

Length, 403 feet.

RELEASED NOVEMBER 4, 1909

NURSING A VIPER

A Story of the French Revolution.

That frightful era in French history beginning with the outbreak of insurrectionary movements in Paris, July 12, 1789, and the taking of the Bastile, July 14, has been the subject of song, story and drama, and it is small wonder that it should prove thrilling material for motion pictures, as this Biograph production will evince. Prior to that period, termed the Reign of Terror, from the above date until July 28, 1794, when the leader, Maximilian Robespierre, suffered death on the guillotine, French nobility was sunk in profligacy, and while they were exempt from land tax, the lower class shouldered the burden of labor and of paying taxes. They rebelled against absolutism and demanded political independence, equal rights and universal freedom. This subject shows a party of the insurrectionists pursuing some of the nobility, one of them seeking refuge in the house of a man of republican sentiments. Here in the guise of a servant he succeeds in eluding his pursuers. Later the character of the man asserts itself, for he offers insult to the wife of his benefactor. The husband would at first shoot him down, but on second thought, he makes him assume his original attire and go out among the insurrectionists, where he meets his merited fate.

Length, 920 feet.

Just as the couple gallop away, Juarez, downcast and brokenhearted, meets Criko. With the shrewd cunning of his cast, although only guessing at the contents, he urges his master to read the letter he had concealed by the gate. He tells him that he feels sure that the evidences of the true character of the American are set forth therein. The Mexican's ever dominant sense of chivalry at first withholds him, then jealousy conquers. He tears open the letter, and his amazed eyes are met with the following lines:

"Dear Old Pard—Since writing you last letter, have concluded to continue my stay awhile longer. The fiance (Ha! Ha!) of my little Mexican girl is losing ground. I believe she is beginning to love me. Now, if I was only a single man——"

Juarez has read enough; his eyes are open to the awful truth of the situation. He hesitates no longer now. His one desire is to save the girl from the impending fate. So, hurriedly mounting his horse, he rushes on after the pair closely followed by the peon. He overtakes them and the three dismount. He produces the convicting letter, demonstrating to the surprised Conchita what little faith could be placed in this "Gringo" stranger, who had a wife already. Whereupon a fight ensues between the two men. Knife to knife they struggle, until Thornton's superior strength places the Mexican at his mercy. Just as the fatal blow is about to fall, Criko, who has crept stealthily upon the furious combatants, covers Thornton with his own gun.

The odds against him and the little Senorita knowing his duplicity, Thornton departs. The peon, delighted in the reunion of the two whom his faithful heart adores, bends his knee to the blessings they both whisper in the renewal of their love.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

THE TALE OF THE FIDDLE.—This clearly told legend opens at the home of a woodsman, a little vine clad cottage in the midst of a dense forest, with a wonderfully pictured view of happy home-life as the father and his three stalwart sons and beautiful daughter shout cheery farewells to the mother before making their way by grass covered paths to the portion of the forest in which their day's work lies. When the morning is partly spent the old man sends his daughter for drinking water to a stream some distance in the forest.

Here she is captured by a mad man of the woods, who, despite her struggles and cries, carries her far up into the hills before her screams are heard by a young nobleman from a nearby castle. After a short, but fierce struggle he rescues the maid, and with her thanks gains also her love.

On the following day she takes flowers to him, only to find he is paying ardent court to a fair dame of the castle, while the flowers he carries forthwith to his lady.

Loneliness, sorrow and great jealousy take possession of her heart. In order to be alone to think out the reason for these great troubles she wanders to an old cemetery. Her deep melancholy and agony of longing make her an easy victim of Satan, who now appears, and offers to give her the love of the young nobleman, which she so deeply desires, for one year, if she will sacifice her mother and father and brothers and at the end of the year's pleasure give him all rights over her soul.

So great is her love that she agrees to this compact. Satan builds her a magic fiddle from the bodies of her family. Through its magic power she gains the great love she has sought so ardently, but at the expiration of the year, when Satan comes to claim his fee, she is haunted by the spirits of her family and suffers inteuse pain at the loss of her sweetheart.

URSULA, WORLD'S FASTEST MOTOR BOAT.—A unique series of this marvelous little working craft steadily shooting over the water at thirty-five knots an hour, leaving a white line of foam in her wake.

A breezy and exhilarating subject which is a revelation in high speed through water, for we are shown excellent views of the boat when making a fraction over forty miles an hour.

A close view is also permitted of the immense Wolseley engines of eight hundred horse-power, developed by the use of twenty-four cylinders.

We have an opportunity to watch the boat maneuver at high speed, illustrating the perfect control held by the operator, even when making torpedo-like progress.

A novel climax is given to the film by closing with a short series taken looking across the stern of the boat while rocking and plunging under her highest speed.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

MISS ANNETTE KELLERMAN.—In her physical culture, diabolo, fancy diving and swimming. In the music halls Miss Annette Kellerman commands one of the highest salaries ever paid a single entertainer and is regarded by her managers as one of the most potent box office attractions ever presented, to which fact they gave legal testimony when rival managers sought for her services last Spring. In addition to being one of the most perfectly formed women who ever trod a stage, Miss Kellerman is singularly versatile, for she is a champion swimmer, a diver of exceptional ability, one of the best diabolo players in the world and a physical culture expert of note. In this series of views all of her gifts are exploited to greater advantage than they possibly can be shown in the narrow confines of the stage or in the constricted quarters of her stage tank. Those most familiar with her public appearances declare this subject to be a vast improvement upon her regular performance, for the physical disadvantages of the stage are overcome and the act is seen at its best. She opens with the physical culture exercises by means of which she preserves the perfection of her form. Next she is seen upon the lawn of a country residence playing at diabolo, that fascinating Parisian fad, with her Diabolo Club of young women. The third section of the film is devoted to her short dives and fancy swimming in the huge tank which forms a part of the Vitagraph studio equipment. Here she is seen to the utmost advantage in the famous black tights upon which the sun glints lovingly as she emerges from the water for a new dive. The dripping silk of the fleshings appears almost iridescent as the angle of reflection is changed with each sinuous move, and in the water the flashes of light as the body is raised above the surface suggests some silver-sealed mermaid disporting herself in her element. A scenic and spectacular investment adds to the picturesqueness of the pictures which is lacking in her stage performance. The last section of the film is devoted to her famous high dives, few of which may be shown to advantage in the theater. These were taken at the seashore and she dives into the ocean instead of into a tank, permitting far greater freedom of movement. Perfection of photography, artistic coloring in monochrome and extreme care in arrangement make this a truly notable film, which will be even more appreciated than the work of the fair natatorialist as seen in theaters.

ADELE'S WASHDAY.—It is the Monday washday, but although it is after 1 o'clock Nora has not put the wash out on the line and yawns dismally over her task as she recalls the events of the Sunday christening party which is responsible for her sleepiness. She is chided by her mistress, who passes through the kitchen on her way to a shopping trip. Nora is reminded of her lateness and told that she must have the wash out in time to prepare dinner. Nora promises and for a few moments she works with frantic haste. Little Adele, the daughter of the house, is in the kitchen, being "looked after" while her mother is down town, and to keep the busy fingers out of mischief Nora gives her a basin and toy washboard with which to launder dolly's dress. The grocer's boy comes with a parcel and Nora runs to the door to relieve him of his burden. He was her escort at the party and, of course, they must talk it all over. The talk passes to more personal topics, but while Sam holds Nora's hands there is no one to perform a similar service for the clock and the minutes fly. Adele decides to help Nora out and, with soap powder and bluing, she makes a most awful mess, into which she souses everything from clothes to kittens. She winds up by overturning the tub just as her mother enters, driving the unfortunate Nora before her. Adele proudly announces the completion of the wash and leads the way to where the oddly assorted laundry swings from the line. She is sent supperless to bed and in her dreams she is arrested by a dog policeman and brought before her grandmother, whose picture was included in the wash. The old lady sternly decrees Adele's death and she is saved from a dreadful end only by waking from her nightmare. Her cries bring her mother to her relief and forgiveness follows in a charming tableau of maternal love. This is a snappy little picture with real comedy, passessing particular appeal to women and children, though even the men are not insensible to the genuine humor of the skillful treatment of the theme. A clever little child plays Adele instead of an older actress made up for the part, and her naturalness is one of the great charms of the subject. It is impossible to convey in words the dainty gracefulness of this successful appeal to the risibilities.

YOUNG DEER'S BRAVERY.—This is another drama of Indian life. It shows Young Deer and Red Moon playing cards, and because of cheating, a quarrel follows, which leaves Young Deer the victor, but a sentence is passed by the Chief, who is Red Moon's father, that Young Deer be tied to a wild horse and the animal let loose. The horse and his burden are seen by some cowboys and girls, and one of the latter rescues Young Deer. The Indians then manage to capture the girl. When her horse returns to the ranch minus its rider, much distress is shown, but Young Deer promises to bring her back. He comes to the spot where the Indians took their prisoner and sees there a knife, which he leaves and conceals himself. One of the Indians has returned for the weapon, but Young Deer overcomes him, and after attiring himself in the Indian's garments goes to their camp. Here he finds the girl, stuns the guard and starts away with her. They are followed, however, by the Indians and a most exciting struggle takes place on a cliff. Just at the right minute when things look pretty dark for Young Deer, the cowboys come to his aid, the Indians are repulsed and everyone made happy through Young Deer's bravery. This picture is most entertaining, exciting and splendidly acted.

DOPE HEAD CLANCY starts the scream, when he, as the film portrays, gives up the fruit business after wrecking his banana cart and becomes a baseball fan. Gleefully he starts out to see the White Sox's battle for the pennant. A long line of ticket buyers are ahead of him but important Clancy doesn't want to wait his turn, keeps trying to get ahead of someone until he is thrown out of line entirely. He must get into the grounds somehow and over the fence he goes, falling among a lot of fans in the bleachers. He is handled roughly and after protesting in his comical way is ejected from the grounds. Bent upon getting into something he decides to become an actor for motion pictures and goes to the studio of a film company. Here is where he gets it proper. The outraged actors and directors show him no mercy after he demonstrates what he can do in a moving picture.

THE LOVE HUNTER proves that love will mount all obstacles and discloses the love cure. Although Cupid, one of the important characters, is deprived of his love weapons, he succeeds in binding together a beautiful girl and her sturdy lover, a game hunter, even though the mother-in-law to be, tried so hard to break up the match. After the couple are joined in wedlock the love cure is administered and it is this part of the story that holds the interest and makes the film a winner.

HONEST JOHN, THE COACHMAN (Eclair).—John, the coachman, one day finds a pocketbook left behind by one of his fares, and having formed an idea as to the owner is soon on his way to restore the valuable piece of property. In the meantime, from John's home his little daughter is kidnapped by gypsies, and amongst these caravan dwellers the poor little girl suffers much rough treatment. An opportunity arises, however, which enables her to escape, and she eventually finds herself in a part where her tears and distress attract the sympathy of the people around. Out of pity, one kind-hearted lady takes the little mite home, where ultimately a further act in the pretty little drama takes places when John, the coachman, appears to deliver up the pocketbook, his fare proving to be the husband of the good lady who had taken the wandering child under her care. Both husband and wife act as true Samaritans toward John, for not only is he well rewarded for his honesty, but his cup of happiness, with that of his broken-hearted wife, is filled to the brim by the recovery of his lost child, and blesses the day when he was able to give yet another proof of his claim to the title by which he is known in his calling of "Honest John."

A RACE FOR A MONKEY (Itala).—The incidents arising from the escape of a very lively specimen of the monkey tribe from its cage provide a series of scenes calculated to arouse many bursts of hearty laughter, for the animal makes very good use of his freedom, to the terror of every one. Up lamp posts, through windows into bedrooms, now nearly captured, only to slip through the net surrounding him, startling the whole neighborhood. He leads his owner a lively and exciting chase which is comical in the extreme. Finally in a most unusual manner the monkey is captured and taken back to his cage.

THE LOST YEARS (Centaur).—The first scene shows the house of Mr. Leonard, a well-to-do lawyer. The father is seated, posed by his little son, a boy of ten years, whose talent and love for drawing leads him to sketch members of the household. The portrait of the father is finished, father and mother are delighted with this latest evidence of their son's artistic talent.

A servant brings in a letter for the father. It is from the wife's brother, telling Mr. Leonard that he is sick and in trouble in New York. He begs his brother-in-law to come at once to his assistance, and to say nothing to his sister, Mr. Leonard's wife.

Leonard bids good-bye to his wife without telling her where he is going. We next see the father on a ferryboat approaching New York City. A splendid view of vessels on the river and the wonderful skyscrapers in New York is shown in this picture. Reaching the city, Leonard goes to the address given by his brother-in-law, which is in the worst part of the great city. A thug volunteers to show Mr. Leonard to the street he is looking for; followed by two other thugs, Leonard is taken into a vacant room, in a tenement house, the thugs attack him, and after a terrific fight, Leonard is knocked senseless by a blow from a blackjack.

The thugs steal his pocketbook, watch and even his clothes, and cover him up for dead in the deserted room. Two days pass.

The wife is in anguish at having heard no word from her husband. She has appealed to the police to find Leonard and their report is that they can find no trace of him. Meanwhile, two boys looking for rags, in the tenement, uncover the body of Leonard. They run out and inform the police, who enter expecting to find the body of a murdered man. Leonard is alive, but his manner when the police question him, satisfies them that the blow he received has destroyed the unfortunate man's memory, since he cannot tell them who he is or how he came there.

Twenty years pass. The son has become a well-known portrait painter. He is at work painting from life, an old man—a professional model. The model succumbs to the effect of the whiskey he has taken during the sitting, and is dismissed. The artist goes out on the street to find another old man for a model, and here we show one of the most pathetic scenes that has ever been thrown on the screen.

Leonard, now a gray haired, worn out old ragpicker, comes along the street, followed and annoyed by a group of children, who almost pull the poor old beggar's clothes from his body.

The artist drives the children away, and engages the old man as a model. We next see the father seated in the son's studio, posing for the painting, at which the son works industriously. The picture is complete. The son gives the old man more than his wages and bids him good-bye. After the old man has gone his mother enters. Proud of her son, and interested in everything he does, she is happy when he offers to show her his latest masterpiece. The mother looks at the picture of the old man; she staggers back and exclaims, "This is your father."

The son dashes from the house, overtakes his father on the street and brings him back. The mother recognizes her husband, but she and all other happy recollections of the years past are lost to him.

Our last scene shows the father in his son's home being questioned by a brain specialist. The doctor gets an idea. He has the mother bring him a portrait that the son drew the day the father disappeared. The old man gazes at the portrait and the mist lifts from his brain. He turns to his wife with a cry of joy and embraces her. He has come back into his own.

NAPOLEON AND PRINCESS HATFELD (Itala).—At daybreak on the 16th of October, 1806, news reaches Berlin of the defeat of Zena. The invincible Corsican is at the gates of the city and the citizens prepare to receive their new ruler.

King Frederick William precipitously retreats to Konigsberg and appoints the conqueror temporary governor. Thus on the 27th of October, Napoleon accepts the keys from the hands of Marshal Halzfeld. Visiting the tomb of Frederick the Great, he pays homage to his memories before all the State and gives orders that he is to be informed precisely of the enemy's movements.

Two days later, among some confiscated letters, Napoleon discovers one from Marshal Haizfeld containing information regarding the Frenchman's movements and other details of no advantage to himself—quite a violation of compacts entered into and which constitutes a crime of a serious nature.

General Rapp receives orders to arrest and shoot the Marshal immediately. The General tries to remonstrate because of the sorrow it would cause the Princess, and when Napoleon continues obdurate to his pleading, he deposits the execution warrant on the table of the Emperor beneath a mass of other papers.

The beautiful Princess Halzfeld, learning of the sentence, decides to go herself and plead with Napoleon. So, enveloped in a black veil, she is introduced into the presence of Napoleon and throwing herself at his feet begs for her husband's life. Brusquely, Napoleon tells her of her husband's grave offense, shows her the damning evidence and the Princess understand that there can be no hope of mercy.

Napoleon calls for General Rapp and asks him if he has executed his commands, to which he hesitatingly replies in the negative. Napoleon fails to understand the full meaning of it and demands to know what has become of the warrant.

"There on your table," replies Rapp.

Although severely reprimanding his trusty servant, he is deeply touched by the distress of Princess Halzfeld and graciously hands her the warrant that she herself may destroy it. Timidly, almost unbelievingly, she receives the document from the imperial hands and burns it, illuminating the grave face of Napoleon with a look of deep gratitude.

A few days later, Josephine, Empress of France, receives at the hands of a travel-stained soldier, these few brief lines:

Berlin, November 6, 1806.

My Dear Josephine:

I have been very good to a lady who is really affectionate to her husband—good and sensible.

Note that I love the ingenious and docile women! Do you know why?

Because only they resemble you.

Good-bye, NAPOLEON.

THE WITCH (Le Lion).—In the olden time witches were supposed to have supernatural powers, and it is with an incident in the life of one of these ancient sorceresses who was believed to have extraordinary powers that this picture has to do. Being the mother of a boy so monstrously ugly that the girls all ran at his approach, the mother conceived a plan for the benefit of her son, as not one of the village maidens would listen to his repeated offers of marriage.

So the witch builds a dummy in female form from all sorts of contraptions, and then transfers to it by her magic the soul of a beautiful young girl. The sweetheart of this maiden, discovering what the witch has done, seeks to repair the crime, and wreak vengeance upon the witch. He goes through many trials and perils, having to contend with the sorcery of the witch who summons all sorts of imps and phantoms to her aid, but finally success is won by the sweetheart and he brings the inert girl to his home.

A series of unusual incidents end in the girl regaining her soul, with the result that the dummy again becomes simply a resemblance in form of what the witch had endeavored to create as a mate for her miserable son.

A VERY ATTRACTIVE GENTLEMAN (Ambrosio).—Fitznoodle is a "gay dog," and having had a late night seeks to make up for lost repose by taking a nap at the table of his favorite restaurant. Oblivious to his surroundings he becomes the victim of a practical joke, one of his friends pinning to his back a piece of card bearing the following notice:

"Chase me, girls; I'm worth £10,000 and want a wife to help me spend it."

Awaking with a startled look, he discovers that he has overslept himself, and to the huge delight of his companions he speedily takes his departure. Attracted by the unusual announcement a smartly dressed girl loses no time in making the acquaintance of this wifeless Croesus, and not to be denied, she takes his arm in a most affectionate and persistent manner. Fitznoodle is puzzled and irritated when several more of the feminine gender seek to explain their ability to assist in the distribution of his wealth. Blondes and brunettes, females, ancient and modern, suffragette samples, widows fat and fair, fifteen and forty, gradually increase by appalling numbers, and the besieged man, after some extraordinary adventures, seeks a haven of safety at the home of his lady love. On discovering the reason for the great assembly of the excited women at her door she promptly ejects him, and falling into the midst of the crowd he is the recipient of a great deal of rough treatment at the hands of the disappointed women.

ELEPHANT HUNTING IN THE CAMBODGE (Le Lion).—From the time the hunters start, mounted on domestic elephants, until after the death of the largest elephant ever shot, the onlooker is held enthralled with as wild and exciting a chase as ever occurred. Mounted domestic elephants are absolutely necessary to traverse the wild forests and the dense jungles, some of which are often over fifteen feet high, where men on horseback would perish from the terrible heat and danger from wild animals. After a chase of several days, during which numerous herds are sighted but not caught, an extremely large elephant is seen to take refuge in a pond so as to secure a rest. This is the chance the hunters seek, and so after some most remarkable rifle shooting, the picture ends with the death of the beast.

THE SACK RACE (Le Lion).—One of the entries in the sack race seeks to beat all comers by the use of mattress springs concealed in his sack. When the race commences, people hold their breath as they watch him cover the ground after the manner of a bouncing ball. So remarkable is his flight over the course that he is almost regarded as another budding Curtis or Bleriot, with some new found power for propelling humanity through space.

But his would-be glory is short-lived, for the trick is discovered and the momentary champion is strongly denounced. Then, to the astonishment of everybody the sack from which the man has emerged becomes animated and commences a hopping excursion on its own account around the course. A shot from a gun, however, lets the cat out of the bag, as it were, for the springs fly up into the air and expose the whole subterfuge.

Important Announcement

THE Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, wishes to announce that commencing the week of November 15, they will release two full reels of film each week, doubling their present output

The days of release will be WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS

Because of the ever-increasing and unsatisfied demand for clean, amusing comedies and stirring Western productions, the Essanay Company, in its new policy, proposes to supply this demand in making a distinct specialty of both varieties.

The WEDNESDAY release will therefore be confined almost exclusively to high-class COMEDY subjects.

The SATURDAY release will be devoted almost entirely to WESTERN drama.

The unlimited popularity accorded Essanay films has been won by the spurs of merit and quality alone. The public is discriminating and the exhibitor wants the best. The Essanay Company, in increasing its output, will not only maintain the high standard and superior quality of its subjects, but will earnestly endeavor to advance and increase these qualities.

The cry of the exhibitor is for more and better American pictures. The licensed exchanges are unanimous in their opinion that the Essanay's new release and the policy it has adopted in specializing COMEDY and Western drama, will appeal to renter and exhibitor alike as eminently satisfactory.

The first release under this new policy will be on Wednesday, November 17; the second, Saturday, November 20.

Wednesday, COMEDY Saturday, WESTERN

ANOTHER TREMENDOUS DRAMA

"THE GAME"

A Story of the Chicago Board of Trade.

A story of love and modern business methods caught from that seething commercial maelstrom, the Chicago Board of Trade. Robert Randolph, the son of the senior partner in the brokerage firm of Randolph & Mowbray, is in love with Ellen Mowbray, daughter of the junior member. While the elder Randolph is spending a few weeks at a Southern health resort, Mowbray sees an opportunity to make a round million dollars and wires Randolph to immediately return. A dispute occurs between the two partners, and in an effort to save their fortunes, as he thinks, the elder partner removes certain securities from the company's safe, thus crippling them for the deal. Young Randolph discovers the robbery and finds evidence pointing strongly to his father. When news of the robbery is made public, the young man, to shield his father, takes the blame and returns the securities. He pleads with Mowbray to be allowed to play "the game" just once more, which Mowbray reluctantly grants, and sends him out to the wheat pit to head the battling forces. After a terrific struggle, the firm wins, and young Randolph declares himself satisfied. Matters are cleared up, however, when the elder Randolph enters and confesses his having removed the securities, and asks Mowbray's forgiveness. The partners become friends again, and both resolve, having made their fortune, to quit "the game" for once and all. Ellen enters and suggests that young Randolph take over the business. He hesitates at first, until his sweetheart's avowal to always be at his side to aid him in the struggle wins him over and he takes his father's chair. Length, approx., 985 feet.

WHY—The Motiograph is the Best Motion Picture Machine

Because the Pictures are More Brilliant. The special patented Shutter is so arranged that it saves a lot of illumination otherwise lost.
Because Flicker is eliminated by the new patented Shutter.
Because the Pictures are Rock Steady when using a good film, and are restful to the eyes of your patrons. The result is because of accurate workmanship and excellence of design.
Because it has patented quick Rewind (one and one-half minutes) connected to main crank handle. No other similar.
Because it has the only perfect Fire-proof Shutter, automatic and absolutely reliable.
Because it has Enclosed Spiral Gears. They work smooth and wear longer.
Because it has a Perfect Take Up. Easy on the film and always reliable.
Because it has inclosed Framing Device. Wears longer, is quickly removed and patented.
Because it has "Wide Open" Lamp House, convenient for changing carbons, adjustment, etc.
Because it is absolutely Fireproof.
Because it has Double the Wearing Qualities possessed by other Machines.
Because it is almost Noiseless; runs more quiet than any other.
Because it has Heavy Pedestal Base, adjustable and patented.
Because it has more than 40 other points of special merit. Boston, New York, Chicago and San Francisco approved.

A Melo-Drama—Redounding with Action

The Story is novel and interesting and teaches a moral "She Who Plays With Fire, May Be Burned"

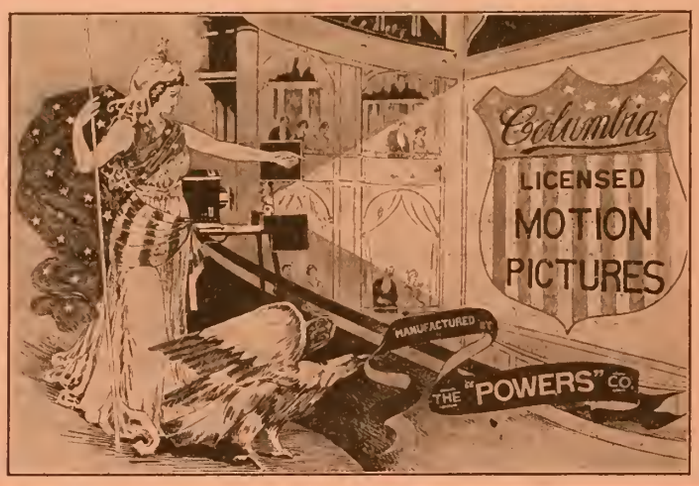
The principal scenes were taken in a genuine Gypsy encampment and the characters and surroundings are true to life and nature.



Every foot is a picture disclosing the story and not filled with mere chases unimportant to the action of the drama.

We point with pride to the pleasing Black and White photography which is not excelled by any manufacturer.

The Stereoscopic effects make the figures stand out and look life-like.

Editorial.

"Experientia Docet."

"Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." In the long, long ago photography was authoritatively defined as a science and an art. This means to say that in the making of photographs a great deal of concrete scientific knowledge is required, and, that in the proper treatment of those photographs as pictures, the recognized principles of art also required to be employed. In other words photography is just like any other trade or profession. The practitioner must serve his apprenticeship to it before he can hope to turn out good results. It is just as difficult to make good pictures as it is good furniture, good machinery, good everything else. You have to learn your trade before you can pose as an adept or expert in it. This applies both to moving picture work as well as to stationary work. It is curious to reflect that photography in all its branches seems to stand alone for the facilities which it offers to the ambitious, but ignorant, to engage in the practical work with immediate hopes of success that are rarely justified. Anybody, it is said, thinks he can command a battle ship, edit a newspaper or run a theater. In other words the apparent ease and simplicity with which these different branches of work appear to be carried out delude the thoughtless into the belief that they can dispense with years and years of hard work, application and training in order to emulate the achievements of others who have laboriously fought their way up to the position they hold with such apparent ease and success.

So it is with the photograph. It all looks to the shallow observer so simple and easy. This will explain why so many people enter the moving picture field with such confidence in being able to produce good results in a short space of time. Look at what has happened in the United States during the past year. Numerous persons have taken up the production of moving picture films who but a short time ago were engaged in other occupations. They entered upon their new fields totally unacquainted with the conditions governing success in the production of moving pictures. It is no exaggeration to say that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been wasted on these experiments. In the long run, of course, good will issue from these experiences. But just consider how costly these experiences have been to those who have courted them! People who have taken up the commercial production of moving pictures are not only themselves ignorant of the first principles of the science and art of the work, but they have relied upon help equally as ignorant. The result of course has been financial disaster and bad work.

There are many men prominent in the moving picture field to-day whose names count for much, who are deplorably ignorant of the technique of the subject. These men are looked upon as leaders and authorities. It would be cruel for us to single them out by name, but there they are, and it is significant that many of them are to be found under the banner of independence.

Now, we do not want to discount or discourage legitimate enterprise in the moving picture field. The more we have of it the better, especially if it be reinforced by the necessary knowledge, capital, etc. But we think it our duty to point out that the making of good moving pictures is a trade that is not to be learned in a few short weeks or months. Time was within our recollection when any old thing in the shape of a film was considered good enough for the public, and tolerated by the latter in its ignorance. But to-day, thanks to the diffusion of knowledge the public knows a good picture when it sees it, it knows that the pictures which meet its favor are not the haphazard productions of enterprising opportunists suddenly breaking into a game, the rudiments of which they are not acquainted with. The public, in short, insists upon good quality and that good quality can only be obtained in a moving picture film by close, arduous work, study and strict observance of the scientific and artistic principles which underlie the making of photographs.

There is room for a great supply of high class moving picture films, there is no room for second rate stuff produced by amateur hands and brains or by those who have not properly studied the necessities of this branch of manufacture. The older manufacturers have to exercise the greatest care and diligence in their work, and this has come to them after years and years of experience. How much more incumbent then, is it upon those who have broken into the game these last few months, if they have any hope of competing for the support of the public, to realize that the only grounds on which the public will consider their products is that of quality, QUALITY, QUALITY.

"Hands Off."

Changes in the moving picture situation are kaleidoscopic in their nature. Seldom a day passes without a reshuffling of the cards. This sort of thing is inevitable in all new businesses and it will probably be some considerable time before the moving picture industry as a whole setles down to the conservative condition of other industries where changes are less frequent.

Of course this kind of thing is to be looked for, we admit. But there is one feature of the situation that cannot be passed as to be expected in the usual course of things. We allude to the changes in the working staffs of film manufacturers, especially those on the Independent side. Amongst these we have regretted to observe the growth of a custom which we think should be more honored in the breach than in the observance. It is that of enticing away each other's employees who have been trained to make good in some branch of picture production. Not only are the Independent manufacturers doing these things amongst themselves, but they are trying to lure away licensed manufacturers' employees. It is within our knowledge that an Independent manufacturer offered a licensed manufacturer's camera man a heavy fee if he would spirit away a camera and give his services for one day to take a certain picture on the plea to his employers that he was at home sick.

This sort of thing is not fair and it is not business-like, except on the assumption that everything is fair in business. We do not think it is. It is a point of honor amongst reputable firms not to entice away each other's help. It is looked upon as rather mean, unless of course it is done in such a manner as not to prejudice the employer. In the cases that have come under notice the design has been to weaken the position of competitors, a line of conduct which we deprecate. We think that in the long run a policy of playing the game fairly and squarely would be found by the Independent manufacturers to pay best. There is plenty of good talent to be had in the open market if proper care be exercised in selecting it rather than resorting to mean tricks in obtaining it from one's competitors.

The Alliance.

If the proceedings of the Alliance meeting at Chicago on Sunday, October 31, be any criterion, the Alliance is at last about to do something. For which we are unfeignedly glad. Readers of our criticisms on this body are aware of our attitude towards it. It started off with a flourish of trumpets and gave little or no sign of getting down to real business. We pointed out that until some indications of the latter were apparent to us our support was hardly to be had on mere promises and verbiage. Briefly we asked the Alliance to show that they meant business. To the credit of the committee something real appears to be in course of being done. We express our unqualified gratification at this and we hope that the beginning the Alliance has made is but the preliminary of much more good work.

Now it is, in our opinion, desirable that the Independent situation should be cleared. Much confusion seems to exist in the minds of other newspaper writers as to the connection of the International Company with the Alliance. Let it be plainly understood once and for all that there is no official connection. Mr. Murdock is the president of the Alliance and that is all. To our thinking the Alliance hampers itself by having it popularly supposed that it has anything at all to do with the International Company. That the president of an importing concern is the president of the Alliance has no more significance than the presence of the presidents of film exchanges on its board of officers. Somebody had to be president and the honor was fittingly bestowed on Mr. Murdock.

Now to the business end of last Saturday's meeting. It seems that the financial end of matters was taken in hand and that some members bearing well-known names who had not paid their initiation fees were turned out. Then a number of new exchanges were added to the roll call of members. Others who infringe the rules were barred from membership. Some manufacturers were added to the list of members—in all nine film manufacturers became new members of the Alliance at the last meeting. Now, here it seems to us is valuable evidence that the Alliance is getting busy on the work of organization. First of all, they are lining up their film exchanges. Next they are lining up their manufacturers. Amongst the latter at the present time you have such houses as Laemmle, Lumiere, Actophone, Powers, New York Motion Picture Company and new houses, such as the Pantograph, Travergraph, Brinkmeier and others—on the face of it a very solid state of things. When to these firms are added the names of Great Northern Film Company and the Phoenix, we at last begin to perceive some elements of strength in the Alliance.

The remainder of the business transacted at the meeting was somewhat formal, nevertheless it was progressive. We perceive that the financial affairs of the Alliance are to be systematically handled, that universal contracts between film exchanges and exhibitors are adopted, and that papers for the incorporation of the Alliance have been prepared. All these are good and useful steps in the work of organization.

The Alliance gives distinct signs that it is desirous of excluding the undesirable from its ranks. We are glad to perceive this. The committee who do the work have only to proceed on the business-like lines they followed at the last meeting to get a working organization in shape. But we have to say that the utmost care must be taken not to hamper the progress of the Alliance by hanging a millstone around its neck in the shape of any one importer or manufacturer. If we mistake not, the main object of the Alliance is to give a fair show to every legitimate manufacturer, manufacturer's agent or film exchange that will do business on straight lines.

Meanwhile the Alliance in its progress has our sympathetic consideration. With the support that it has so far attracted it can do a great deal of good, but it may do more. For example, the committee seems to be in earnest in upholding the standard of quality of the pictures turned out by its manufacturers. This is a good and useful plank in the platform.

Going "below the salt," that is, amongst the poor, all degrees and tastes of suffering humanity are found amongst moving picture audiences. And that is only to be expected. The moving picture house is primarily the poor man's theater. This is as it should be, of course. But what we want to emphasize is that it is also a rich man's, and above all a rich woman's, theater. There should be a moral in this for those who choose the moving picture entertainment for exploitation purposes, namely, that not only is the patronage of the poorer sections of society assured for the moving picture, but also that of the more refined and richer people, if trouble only be taken to attract them to it.

It often occurs that when a man has achieved some measure of success in a certain sphere that he becomes puffed up with the idea of his own importance and imagines that he is indispensable. That "No man is indispensable," is as true as that oft repeated aphorism, "To err is human." Were we to die to-morrow, others would step into the breach and edit these pages no doubt better than ourselves.

There is a story told of an employee who thought himself of such importance in a certain business that he urged his claims to promotion with great pertinacity. Those claims, however, were not favorably looked upon by his employers. "But," said the young man, "supposing I were dead; how would the business go on without me?" "Well," was the reply, "just imagine you are dead, then we will see."

THE TRAVEL TALK.

A New Departure in Moving Picture Enterprise.

An enterprise which takes the road this week marks, in our opinion, a new departure in the history of the moving picture film as a factor in public entertainments. Before us lies the book in which some account is given of this enterprise, known as the R. G. Craerin Travel Talks. These Travel Talks are three in number—namely, Washington, New York, Montreal and Quebec. In the book are brief popular synopses of the talks, together with reproductions of many of the moving picture photographs which will form the principal part of the entertainment. For example, there are pictures of Brooklyn Bridge at the rush hours, the Speedway, the Lambs' Gambol in Washington, views of Quebec, a baseball game between the Giants and the Cubs, and other illustrations. Anybody handling this book and running his eye over it cannot but be impressed by the evident determination of R. G. Craerin (Incorporated) to put out their Travel Talks in a highly ambitious manner so as to cater for the patronage and support of the best classes in the community. The design of the management during this present Winter and coming Spring is to cover the whole of the United States with the entertainment.

The illustrations, of course, convey mere hints, or rather mere samples, of the fare to be served up for the delectation of what no doubt will be large and appreciative audiences. Take Washington, for example. Every interesting attraction of the Capital City of the United States has been photographed either in stationary or moving picture form. All the principal architectural features of the city are shown, and of course the Capitol, the White House, the intimate life of the President, the historical incidents for which Washington is famous, notably at the time of Lincoln; all these, and much more, are shown in the entertainment, breaking it up into convenient divisions so as to give the audience an effect of change and variety. What was done in regard to Washington was also done in regard to New York and Quebec. The best, the most historical, the most interesting, the most instructive, the most attractive features of these great cities have been photographed in the moving picture camera, so that whoever may see the results on the screen will have before him a living, moving, palpitating panorama of modern American and Canadian life.

Some details of the way in which this enterprise has been organized will doubtless interest our readers. To begin with, the photographs were specially taken by Mr. Craerin himself during last Summer. All the points illustrated were personally visited and attempts were made, and successfully made, to illustrate the characteristic features of the cities. A large excess of material was obtained, so that there was plenty to choose from. The negatives were developed under his personal supervision; the positives were made in a similar way. So, too, with regard to the lantern slides. These were specially colored by highly trained artists.

Then came the working up of the material for the lectures and here a minute process of selection and rejection was adopted. The aim is to give the audience variety and change in the course of the two hours' entertainment. So far, so good. Then special lectlures were prepared by Mr. Craerin from actual personal observation. Next these lectures were carefully studied, rehearsed and got to heart by the company's lecturer, Mr. John Alden, well known and highly esteemed as a cultured actor and elocutionist. So much for the organization of the entertainment itself, which, it will be seen, has involved a very great amount of labor and the expenditure of considerable capital.

Now comes in, to our mind, what constitutes the prncipal part of the new departure in this enterprise. Mr. Craerin is a successful theatrical manager. He has been concerned in large ventures all over the United States out of which he has successfully emerged. In fact, his power of organization has been demonstrated in that most difficult branch of business work—theatrical road touring. The invaluable experience thus gained by him in theatrical organizations has been diverted into the moving picture field and the same system of organization followed out almost to the letter. For example, a chain of high-class theaters has been booked for the R. G. Craerin Travel Talks. The booklet above referred to has been extensively circulated in all the cities and towns to be visited. The large and artistic posters, as large as 24 sheet, have been prepared for distribution. Small bills have also been prepared for placing in shop windows. Then the company has been preceeded by an advance agent whose duty it is to pave the way by press and other work. Then the heads of scholastic and other institutions, prominent local residents, and others have been personally interested in the scheme. In short, every possible effort has been made to place these Travel Talks before the public in as complete, thorough and artistic a manner as an ordinary stage play.

It goes without saying that an enterprise of this nature is well supported at the technical end of matters. Especially in the way of operating skill; projection apparatus, and every possible thing for presenting the pictures to an audience in the best possible manner, R. G. Craerin (Incorporated) have spared no trouble and expense.

There are, of course, other peripatetic moving picture entertainments in the field, and there is plenty of room for them. But we doubt if one has been, or is being sent out, so thoroughly well organized as that of Mr. Craerin. He has taken hold of the matter in the way that we foresaw was inevitable—namely, in the high-class theatrical organizing way. In other words, he puts the moving picture on the same plane as a first-class theatrical entertainment. It is impossible to do anything else but applaud the enterprise which has brought the R. G. Craerin Travel Talk to the point of public presentation; it is impossible but to wish it the very highest success; it is impossible but to feel that as soon as the public gets thoroughly to know the intrinsic value, variety and beauty of the entertainment that is to be offered to it in these Travel Talks, it will grip on to it so determinedly that the Travel Talk will always in future be as permanent a feature on the theatrical stage as an ordinary play.

The Vitagraph Company of America announces the building of a studio in Paris to supplement the extensive studio plant in the Flatbush section of Brooklyn. When their European agent, Ronald A. Reader, was over here this Summer, plans were perfected for the establishment of such a plant, and last week bids were received for the erection of the studio and work will be begun at once. It is universally admitted that the French stock companies give a better average production than any American organization, and it is the Vitagraph idea to enlist the services of the French artists and authors in the production of films for exhibition on both sides of the water. As soon as the building shall have been erected J. Stuart Blackton will leave for Paris with a staff of stars from the local studios, who will remain abroad long enough to communicate the Vitagraph ideas to the French producers and players. Gradually the Americans will be withdrawn and be replaced by others that the establishment may become truly international.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

CHAPTER XXIV.
SELECTING A THEATER LOCATION.

To one embarking in the moving picture theater business the first and most important consideration is location. This, as applied to the city and to the small town, presents two entirely separate and distinct propositions, involving quite different problems. The moving picture field has been so well covered that it is now well-nigh impossible to find a desirable location where there is no immediate competition. So true is this that the prospective owner may make up his mind at the outset that it is risky to "butt into" a field already more or less covered, unless he buys out some established house, and even then he cannot be assured of no competition, since another house may be put in at any time. But the man who fears competition, provided there be business available for two or more houses, or for one and partly enough for another, is not the right man to enter the nickel theater field.

The first thing to do in selecting a location is to thoroughly inform yourself concerning local laws governing theaters, particularly the class of house you propose installing. You will then be in position to look at store rooms, or plans for the house you will erect, intelligently, and determine whether or not any given room can be made to comply with the law as applying to the class of theater you propose to install, or whether any given plan is available. The main points to look after in this connection are exits, stage requirements, aisles, and fireproofing, the latter being of importance in some of the larger cities. To cite cost of failure to consider the last named item here in Chicago: Suppose you decided a room suited you and leased it, but later discovered it to have non-fireproof walls (only stone or brick is accepted as fireproof), and there were one or more stories above the theater room. You would, under the Chicago law, have to cover the entire surface of both walls and the ceiling with sheet asbestos, covered with sheet metal, before you would be allowed to open. Look after such things closely or you may be the loser. Having thoroughly posted yourself as to the law, the next step is to seek an available location. In considering the matter of location, the first thing is, of course, a suitable room or a site for building. If a store room, the first consideration is height of ceiling. If under thirteen feet, the room should be rejected. Even thirteen feet is too low, but it may be made to do after a fashion, particularly if the front end of the floor can be dropped down into a basement, making a slope. Next comes the matter of seating capacity, which may easily be figured as before set forth. If the room is available in these two respects (the writer would consider no room with a capacity of less than two hundred) and it is found that it can be made to comply in all respects with local laws, the next thing is the investigation of available business. If the neighborhood be a very wealthy one, a nickel house will likely draw no considerable patronage except children, servants and transient. The ideal location is a densely populated workingmen's residence section, with frontage on a much-traveled business street. There are many problems to consider when seeking a city location. The matter of race (nationality) must be looked after carefully, since some sections may be peopled almost exclusively by any one of half a dozen foreign-speaking nationalities. This, under some conditions, might prove disastrous. Take the lower class Italians. If any considerable number of them patronized your house you would have to look to them entirely for your revenue, since a house patronized by any number of them will have to depend on them alone for support. Any considerable number of negroes will queer a house with all other races; and there are other races to which you must cater exclusively or not at all, so that the matter deserves close investigation when seeking a city nickel theater site.

Straight-laced church neighborhoods have, as a rule, been found to give scant patronage, no matter how clean and high-class the program be kept. It does not necessarily follow that success may not be had in such communities, but the chances are that the patronage will at least be smaller than it would be in another equally populous neighborhood. Here, too, is another thing to remember: In a city where there are many forms of amusement, people will not go far to visit a nickel theater. Your house must therefore be located close to its "base of supplies." Where transient trade is expected to form any considerable portion of the receipts, a careful computation should be made of the number passing per hour and the number of hours they will be passing while your house is open; also, whether or not the location is such that the passers-by will be inclined to stop to view a show. To illustrate the last point: Some time since a man opened a five-cent theater in the first block north of the Clark Street Bridge, Chicago. I told him at the time the house would be a failure, basing my prophecy on the following: When Clark street leaves the bridge (viaduct) on the north, it slopes down for one block to Kinzie street, the street being lined with a few cheap stores and dealers in steam-heating supplies. There are practically no nearby residences (flats), and the hotels, of which several are close by, and rooming houses are practically entirely occupied by the cheaper class theatrical people. The trade must therefore be all transient. People who start up that incline do so with intent to cross the river to the loop district, and, having a definite object in view, they will not stop by the way to see a nickel show. Coming north, the same, reversed, is true. The house was a flat failure. I cite this instance to show you that such things must be considered in seeking city locations, unless one wishes to deliberately invite failure. As to the matter of competition in a city, it is hard to say just when a given location, if it be densely populated, is fully covered. In one place on North Clark street, Chicago, there are six houses, all doing a land office business, within three blocks. People often start in at one end and go to all of them. It forms quite a nickel theater center and, as a matter of fact, the congestion of theaters at this point actually draws people, to some extent, from quite a distance. They will come and spend an entire evening in these houses. I do not feel that any advice of value can be given in this respect. If there are people enough and you put in as good or a better house than the other fellow and give as good or a better show, there is no reason why you will not get your share of the business, and if your show is the best you will get the most of it, too.

SELECTING A SMALL TOWN LOCATION.

The selection of a small town location is quite a different proposition from the foregoing and presents a different set of problems. Of course, what has been said concerning the selection of a store room for remodeling into a theater applies equally in a city or small town. It is the matter of possible patronage which presents the difference. No rule can possibly be laid down as to the size of town capable of supplying the necessary patronage to make the venture a paying one. Theaters have been installed in villages of less than one thousand and have been successful in a small way. In such cases, however, it is usually a strictly family affair, no help at all being hired. The only expense of amount is film service, rent and light. These articles are not designed to deal with conditions of this sort, however. In figuring the matter of expense for a small town theater the items may be estimated about as follows: Operator, $15.00 per week; ticket seller and ticket taker, $5.00 to $6.00 each; piano-player—singer, $15.00; service, with express charges, $30.00 to $40.00; light, $6.00; rent, $10.00; or a total of about $100.00 per week. This will be about minimum if you propose to give a really acceptable show. Of course, I well know that many small town theaters get an operator for as little as $10.00, a piano-player—singer for $12.00, and service for $15.00 (even less, in some cases), but, take it from me, they don't and can't put on a show worth seeing. Ninety dollars per week may be taken as a minimum for putting on a creditable show in a small town where rents are comparatively low. This means 1,800 paid admissions to meet the expense account alone. It is therefore up to you, Mr. Prospective Investor, to carefully and intelligently "size up" conditions and decide that you can see the ninety coming back to you each week, bringing with it something over and above for your own pocket.

To accomplish this "sizing up," several things must be carefully considered. First and foremost, what are the present amusements of the people? Have they been accustomed to purchasing their amusement, or will you have to educate them to do it? Is the community a straight-laced one, where there will be a howl from the pulpit and from the little 2 by 4 weekly paper every time the exchange sends you an even mildly sensational film? You must remember that in small communities the preachers and editors are men of small caliber, usually, but possessed with an exaggerated idea of their importance as guardians of the public morals. They may even welcome the chance, even though a slim one, of getting into the local limelight by jumping on you. This will not ruin you, but "every little bit helps," and it is well to look closely at even such matters. Consider carefully what the source of public income is. If a large percentage of the workmen are factory employees with semi-weekly or monthly paydays, you are likely to do a rushing business around payday and nothing between times. Investigate as to whether or no the people, as a rule, retire early. If so, it will operate to congest the business into a short space of time, thus requiring a larger seating capacity than if it spread out an hour or two longer. Is the town compact or widely scattered? In bad weather people will not go far to a nickel show, therefore this is a point of considerable importance under some circumstances. Of course, in sizing up a location you must use your own good sense and judgment. Neither I nor anyone else can give directions which will take the place of your own intelligence. All I can do is point out a few of the more important items bearing on the subject, or which may under some conditions bear on it. But each individual case will be different from every other one, and a man must use his brains in such matters. Study all conditions closely. Decide what is the very least clear profit you would be satisfied with and then estimate as closely as possible whether or not your prospective patronage will be sufficient to produce it after meeting the expense bill. Don't let your wishes warp your intelligence.

Standardization.

By Arthur S. Newman, in "The Bioscope."

IV.—THE WIDTH OF THE FILM.

To the present nothing has been said as to the width of the film. Ordinary practice has almost automatically settled this measurement. In England 1⅜ in. is the generally acknowledged standard. At first sight it may seem to be a very simple thing, this measurement of the width of film; it is not, however, quite so simple a matter as it appears. Limit gauges, such as are used in up-to-date engineering practice, ought to be employed in settling the problem.

In the manufacture of interchangeable parts for use in machines, the fact that there is no such thing in existence as absolute measurement must be faced; and it is necessary to make gauges by which the inevitable variation of size can be kept within certain definite limits. A film 1⅜ in. wide will not pass freely through a channel or gate of exactly the same width. A certain amount of play must be allowed, so either the film must be made narrower, or the gate must be made wider than the exact theoretical measurement. On the Continent two distinct widths of film were in use two or three years ago, the respective measurements of which differed by a few 1-100ths of a millimeter; and some firms, when ordering, specified the width required to the 1-100th of a millimeter (about 1-250th of an inch). I have never heard of an English manufacturer being so precise as this, though I have seen many parcels of film returned to the makers as being "too wide" or "too narrow." That is about as far as we English mostly get. In matters of extreme accuracy it is generally reserved for the foreigner to show the way.

Occasionally I have made gauges for manufacturers of film subjects, by which the films could be measured and checked as to width when they arrived from the makers. I have asked more than once, "What width shall these gauges be made?" A stare of astonishment has usually been the first effect of the question, followed by the reply, "Why, 1⅜ in., of course!" On inquiring for the gauge by which the width of the gates of the machines were made, so that I might make the proper allowance for the free running of the tested film, I usually found that no such gauge existed, and that the general idea was that a 1⅜ in. film would run in a 1⅜ in. gate.

This is not the case, because if both measurements were quite exact, the film would bind slightly, and if either the film were wide by so small an amount as 1-400th of an inch, or the gate narrow by the same amount, very considerable resistance to the passage of the one through the other would result. Most gates are made with rigid sides (I have only seen one in which a spring side was used) and practically all pictures depend for their freedom from side rock on the fit of the film gate, so this subject of the accurate fit of the film to the width of the gate is of the greatest importance. Now that perforation and printing have become almost exact sciences, it is quite common to see a picture on the screen, quite satisfactorily free from up and down motion, and at the same time anything but perfect in right and left registration; and yet the former condition is much more difficult of attainment than is the latter. If only a definite width of film could be insured, and a definite measurement for the width of all the gates on all machines, cameras, printers and projectors alike decided upon, the trouble of side rock would be reduced to a minimum. In the present state of things, the film stock maker must be careful not to cut too wide, so to make certain of not having his goods rejected he cuts a little on the narrow side, while the machine producer is careful that all gates shall be wide enough. The best way to deal with the problem would be to keep, say, a width of 1⅜ in. as the theoretical size, and for the film subject producer to have two gauges with which to test his film before use, one of these gauges to be 1⅜ in. exactly and the other to be, say, 1-250th less in width, he should then reject all film which would not pass the large gauge freely, and fit tightly in the smaller gauge. The machine manufacturer should also have two gauges, the one being 1-250th of an inch larger than the theoretical size, and the other exactly 1⅜ in. wide. The gates should be of such a width as to admit one gauge easily, but too narrow to admit the other. The widest of the films would then run free in the narrowest of the gates and the narrowest film could not have more than 1-125th of an inch of play in the widest of the gates, and would very rarely be found to have even so much as this amount.

In the beater, or dog, movement, a very nice and equal adjustment of the spring pressure conduces very much to the long life of the film, but such an adjustment may be detrimental to the image on the screen by allowing side rock. If the springs on one side of the gate are somewhat more heavily set than those on the other side, the uneven tension on the sides of the film will cause it to press against one side of the gate at the top, and the other side at the bottom, and side rock will consequently be reduced. This is, however, a poor way of going to work, and a little attention to the standardization of a few small points in the manner I have indicated, would do much to improve the industry for the film maker, the film producer and the mechanic. The financier and the public would also share in the advantage.

Having put forward the several main points to be considered in arriving at a definite standard for the width of the film and the size and shape of the perforations, it now only remains to try to determine the best position for the placing of the perforations in relation to the edges of the film.

The spacing of the perforations along the film lengthwise was settled for us by Edison before the living picture on the screen, as we now have it, had become an accomplished fact, and that same spacing—the gauge or pitch—has scarcely been altered. In the case of the first films made by Lumiere, and by some few of the first makers of machines, odd sizes were introduced. These, however, soon gave way to the width of 1⅜ in., combined with the present gauge, 64 complete holes and spaces to a foot, or, in other words: from the center of one hole to the center of the 65th hole measures just 12 ins. This gauge is now universally acknowledged, so there is nothing further to be said on this point. Owing to the adoption of a standard gauge, badly fitting sprockets are now almost unknown because mechanicians have something definite to work to. The position of the holes in relation to the edges of the film has not, unfortunately, yet become in any way definite; and until some agreement is arrived at the accuracy of much of the work turned out will not be of a high standard. The perforations, if placed near the edge, leave space for a large picture, but render the film very liable to crack between the holes and the edge, while if placed far from the edge encroach uncomfortably upon the picture space, but leave the edge strong and make the film more durable. A happy medium should be struck in which both the size of the picture and the strength of the edge of the film receive due consideration.

I have before me a catalogue issued recently by a machine maker, Mr. J. Debrie, of Paris, and he, realizing the difficulties caused by want of standardization, devotes more than half of his introductory chapter to an examination of this special measurement. He finds that films from different sources vary to the extent of half a millimeter when carefully measured between the centers of holes, across the film. The sizes he gives are 28 m.m. and 28.5 m.m. respectively, so in order to meet the needs of the market as well as possible under the circumstances, he designs and makes all his machinery, perforators, printers, cameras, etc., to a medium measurement—28.25 m.m.

This measurement would make a very good basis for a standard as converted into English decimal inches, the comparatively round figures 1.11 in. are only just beyond 1-1,000th of an inch inaccurate. It so happens that 35 m.m. are almost exactly 1⅜ in., or in the decimal form, 1.375 in.

The accompanying diagram shows the perforation and width of film suggested, and the table attached gives the measurements both in millimeters and decimal inches, which appear to me suitable for a standard for all film and perforation measurements, excepting only the thickness.

	Inches.	m.m.
Width of film	1.375	35
Width between hole centers	1.11	28.25
Longest dimension of holes	.107	2.723
Shortest dimension of holes	.073	1.858
Center of hole to edge of film	.1325	3.375
Nearest side of hole to edge of film	.084	2.0135

These figures are not absolutely exact, but in no case does the discrepancy exceed 1-200th ot an inch.

The above sizes have been computed having regard, first to the amount of film in use, and to the average gauge of the machinery working it; secondly, with special reference to the strength and durability of the film, and, thirdly, with the idea of getting the metrical measurement and the English inch to work together. In dealing with the metrical measurement no great attention need be paid to the third decimal point unless it be over 5, when the second decimal point may have 1 added to it.

The most important dimension is the width between the centers of the holes, and this is quite easy to determine both in English and Continental measurement.

In taking leave of the subject for the present, I hope that these articles will help to cause some of our larger firms to realize that a standard of some kind is necessary, and that in the near future steps may be taken toward a definite settlement of the same.

(The End.)

MOVING PICTURES AID MISSION WORK.

That moving pictures are a great aid to home missionary work is the assertion of the Rev. Dr. Jacob Sallade, of Philadelphia, who is conducting an educational missionary campaign throughout Pennsylvania.

Speaking of his project, Dr. Sallade said: "The objects sought are implied in the campaign motto, 'Face the Facts.' The facts underlying home and foreign missions and the work of the church in facing these facts have been presented by mission board secretaries and missionaries. Stereopticon slides, moving pictures and other illustrative material have been used to show things as they really are. The incentive and opportunity to know these facts, offered by the educational departments of the various mission boards and the young people's missionary movement, have been presented partly through an exhibit of missionary study text books, pictures, stereographs, charts and other material, while institutes and conferences have demonstrated the best method of introducing mission study into church, Sunday-school and other young people's societies. At the opening union mass meeting facts were presented showing a world full of people —people physically, mentally and spiritually in dire need. First, facts underlying the great home problems, such as immigration, race, city, the frontier; then the hall was darkened, and by the aid of slides and moving pictures the facts of the non-Christian world were portrayed. The children's meeting also was illustrated with slides and moving pictures. An institute for young people's society leaders and officers followed. The concluding mass meeting aimed to show by address and illustration how the Christian church has faced the facts and what definite thing each delegate could undertake personally."

AN EXHIBITOR WHO UPLIFTS.

A most noteworthy demonstration of the moving picture as an educational feature took place at the Mount Morris Auditorium, Fifth avenue and 114th street, New York, one afternoon a few days ago. Like most men the proprietors, Messrs. Warshauer & Taffelstein, are in business for money, but this is what they did:

Conferred with Principal McGuire, of Public School 81, and arranged for a free educational show; obtained a new copy of "Hiawatha" from the Laemmle Film Service, and held his theater clear of his usual patrons for 3 P. M. At that hour music was heard in the distance, and down the street came the boys, headed by the school band, colors flying, Principal McGuire and a score of teachers in attendance. The boys filed into the theater in martial order, and all was ready. The principal addressed the boys, dwelling on the subject of "Hiawatha," and then this great film, made by the Independent Moving Pictures Company of America, was run on the sheet. Of course they applauded when it was over, but this was not all. Mr. Leon J. Rubenstein, representing the manufacturer of this production, was next introduced, and it was announced that he would lecture on the subject. Before the film was run again, he remarked to the boys on the wonderful advantage of being able to see the poet's imagination personified, and without the great preparations necessary for an actual theatrical performance where no natural water, trees and scenery could be enjoyed. Exclamations of surprise were heard when he told them that the film was posed at the real Minnehaha Falls that Longfellow wrote of.

Then the film was put on. Mr. Rubenstein dwelt on the incidental scenery and Indian mannerisms while telling the story of Hiawatha's effort to win the demure little damsel, to which the boys listened with rapt attention. From one situation to another he took them, until the climax, where the young brave battles with Nokomis and comes out victorious. Here the boys cheered, whistled and stamped their feet in their enthusiasm. But there was absolute quiet for the balance of the story, and when the lecturer finally ventured that such a lad as Hiawatha would some day be the chief of his tribe, deafening applause marked the appreciation of the audience. Before marching out cheers were given for the proprietors, the principal, the lecturer and the makers of the Hiawatha film.

There is no doubt but that Messrs. Warshauer & Taffelstein deserve the greatest praise and commendation for going to the expense of the entertainment above described. There is not the slightest question but that if the example he sets were followed by exhibitors in other localities, it would not only make the public think more favorably of the amusement in general, but it would establish individuality as a class for the men engaged in conducting the shows.

TRADE NOTES.

The foreign manufacturers who are here are still undecided as to the future disposition of their agencies, and several of them are in favor of opening their own branches in this country.

Last week, in referring to a change in the advertised Melies releases, we inadvertently mistitled the concern as the G. Melies Company. As everyone known, the title of the concern is Geo. Melies and the American interests are in the capable hands of Mr. Gaston Melies, a brother of Geo. Melies, of Paris, a pioneer in and general benefactor of the moving picture industry.

The Kalem Company have leased another floor in the Kodak building and converted it into a studio for special work. A separate company has been engaged who are already busy o na series of trick, comedy and educational subjects for children. The first of these reels, which will be no doubt in great demand for matinee purposes, will be issued in about two months. So the Kalem Company will be releasing two reels per week by January 1, and as one of these will be exclusively for the young folks, we presume that their happy idea will be welcomed by both exhibitor and renter.

Mr. Garragien is from Missouri. He is young in the moving picture game but old in wisdom and, like all Missourians, his motto is "show me." He blew into town last week with a wad of money that broke the record, and bought up everything in sight in new American and imported Independent film. Said he: "Garragien's Independent Film Exchange is after the business. To get it we must have the goods." Certainly he is right, and his offices in St. Louis, Dallas and Kansas City should prosper under such a wise and progressive leader.

The Johnson-Ketchel Fight Pictures, the best film ever made of a prize fight, seems about to be lost to the licensed exchanges. Mr. Coffroth, the owner of the film, has several good offers from outside people, but consented to give the licensed exchanges the exclusive use, if a certain number were ordered. Although one New York exchange alone ordered one-eighth of the number, the majority have got cold feet or ask unreasonable privileges. So if they lose the business they have only themselves to blame.

The Vitagraph producers are hard at work upon a Venetian tale that will be unusually elaborate even for the Vitagraph. The scenes along the canals, in which the Vitagraph lakes are utilized, are particularly successful, and the subject—to be seen early in December—will be a winner.

The "Scenes from the Life of Moses," staged for the Vitagraph Company by the Rev. Madison C. Peters, D.D., are so far advanced that it is possible to announce the first of the five reels for early in December; probably the first week in that month. All five reels are now in hand.

The last of the "Les Miserables" releases will be made November 27th under the title of "Jean Valjean." The incidents of the barricade and the escape through the sewers are particularly effective.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

Political Outlook Encouraging to Exhibitors.

Being a trade publication, it is outside its province for the Moving Picture World to reflect political sentiments more than is absolutely necessary to lay before its readers and patrons such sentiments of that character as bear upon and involve the interests of people engaged, or interested, in the moving picture business. It is, therefore, proper for us to refer to the results of the elections held in Greater New York last Tuesday.

Reference was made in these columns before the election to the candidacy for Mayor of the metropolis of a champion of the moving picture people at a time when they most needed a sponsor. It is gratifying to note that this particular candidate has been elected, not because of his political faith, or the political platform he advocated, but for the reason that his success brings out conclusive proof that when the moving picture people act as a unit they can accomplish a great deal and become the chief advocate and protector of their own interests.

It would be foolish to say that the moving picture people elected Hon. William J. Gaynor as Mayor of Greater New York last Tuesday, but it is perfectly reasonable to say that they materially aided in the attainment of the result. It was known some time before the elections that the picture men favored the election of Mr. Gaynor on account of his liberal views and the manner in which he applied them last Winter, when the then Mayor of the big city closed up over six hundred moving picture places with a stroke of the pen and without giving the owners a chance to plead their case or guard against the unjust action. Mr. Gaynor was at that time on the Supreme Court bench and he issued injunctions restraining the enforcement of the Mayor's orders and staying all movements on the part of the police in connection with them until the nickelodeon people could be heard in court. But for these injunctions many of the picture people would have been practically ruined financially, for the unjust crushing blow came upon them at the beginning of the Christmas holiday season, a period when the purveyors of amusement look for good business—the holiday profits. The wholesale closings were not repeated. In some cases where the authorities in due and proper form showed that the municipal regulations were not being complied with, or had been violated, the Mayor's orders prevailed, but the number of such cases were insignificant, thereby clearly demonstrating the great wrong done the picture people by unreasonable and arbitrary exercise of power.

Some people have said that the part the moving picture men took in the elections was of a rather exaggerated spirit of gratitude. Such is not the case. The slogan of the successful campaign was "Down with graft!" and all the candidates on the anti-graft platform were elected. Having materially assisted in bringing this about, the moving picture men are now able to combat any municipal graft collectors that may come to the front with the power of the ballot. It is not likely that collectors of this calibre will be either as audacious, or plentiful, as they have been—at least, not for a while. Ever since the moving pictures attained prominence and popularity the exhibitors have been persecuted in innumerable ways until they secured relief by buying off the oppressors. Of course, the heads of all the municipal departments promptly and vigorously denied all charges of graft, but that many subordinates of the various departments insisted upon such payments was only too well known. An investigation of one department resulted in the dismissal of its chief. That others were not removed was due more than anything to the fear of exhibitors to go too deep into the matter and bring upon their heads the wrath of some other departments having a peculiar sympathy with the offenders. With the newly elected Mayor in office the picture men need not be afraid to come to the front and denounce any who may approach them with itching palms. The sweeping victory of various other candidates affords additional assurance that when picture places are closed it will be done legally and not before the owners have had opportunity to meet charges made. Sweeping changes in all the municipal departments must naturally follow the results of the elections just held. This sounds a warning that must deter those who may be inclined to look for graft. The picture men can now go on their way rejoicing that a large part of their receipts need not be turned over to grafters holding over their heads a threat to close up their places on some imaginary violation of municipal regulations if the money is not paid. It is not at all unlikely that gradually grafters will crop to the surface again, perhaps more guardedly, and may be not so unmerciful; but the picture men should prepare now to protect themselves against a recurrence of the evil by forming a strong, permanent organization, which will be prepared to go into house-cleaning business again whenever necessary.

Scenarios for Picture Plays.

I have before me a batch of letters from people asking if there is a market for ideas for moving picture themes. There certainly is, and has been for a long time. The makers of the pictures are always anxious to get hold of good scenarios, and I understand that good prices are paid for the right kind of material. No one should be misled by this statement and hastily jump to the conclusion that scenarios are greedily snatched up and paid for without investigation. It has frequently happened that two or more manufacturers produced under different names pictures of almost identical character. Such cases resulted in unpleasant criticism on the part of film exchanges, exhibitors and audiences, and it became a serious matter. It was found to be due to unscrupulous writers imposing upon the makers of the pictures and the failure of the latter to censor the ideas submitted. Now no guilty writer can escape. Each company making the pictures has a staff of inspectors, or readers, whose duties require a knowledge of pictures already made, or in course of preparation. I have been told that in some instances extraordinary coincidence has brought about almost simultaneous production of identical subjects by two concerns having absolutely no connection with each other and no knowledge that the other contemplated the production. I am also told that such coincidences are so extremely rare that it will not pay a writer of scenarios to take a chance of profiting by them.

Scenario writers, to be successful financially, must be original and capable of evolving novel ideas. They, like the readers through whose hands their scenarios pass, should be as well acquainted as possible with the character of subjects that have already been produced, and this knowledge can only be gleaned by reading the publications devoted to the moving picture business, which publish descriptions or reviews of the pictures as they are produced, and also by frequently visiting different places producing the pictures. It is not essential that scenarios shall be created by original conceptions on the part of the writers. They may be adaptations from other works. In either event the task is not as easily handled as many imagine. There have been a great many pictures produced and the field of thought has been pretty well covered, but the opportunity for clever writers is good. Prices paid for scenarios vary. There is apparently no standard or schedule upon which writers may be satisfactorily enlightened. Each company has its own scale and the prices are fixed in accordance with the judgment of the readers employed by the respective companies. These people are not infallible. Like many others, they are not always able to tell a good thing when they see it, therefore if a writer has his scenario returned to him by one company as not being up to the mark it does not follow that it will be rejected by all the other companies. No writer should waste time reconstructing a picture already produced. It is difficult to do this successfully; stories in moving pictures tenaciously cling to their identity, which cannot be destroyed by changes in costumes and scenic alterations any more than the story in a book can be changed by substituting a new style of binding. Many playwrights and other professionals in the pen line have recently taken up the preparation of scenarios for moving pictures and are steadily raising the standard, so that those contemplating entering the field must do so with the determination to do their very best, otherwise they must meet with repeated failures. It frequently happens, however, that crudely prepared ideas, briefly setting forth the action, when properly handled by the producers, have become winners; but in such case some striking novelty or originality is involved.

OLIVER.

J. A. Leggett, chairman of the Dinner Committee of the Thirteen Club, is arranging with the officials of the Vitagraph Company to exploit the "Superstitions of the Camera" at the forthcoming dinner of that well-known New York organization—the parent of scores of similar societies. The details are not forthcoming, but several novel surprises are being planned. The last dinner dealt with the superstitions of the insurance world.

Because of the marked success of the recent comedy releases such as "The Two Mr. Whites," "He Fell in Love with His Wife," "A Romance of an Umbrella," etc., the Vitagraph producers are planning a series of these charming comedies, in the production of which the Vitagraph has been singularly successful.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

"The Assyrian came down like a wolf on the fold and his cohorts were gleaming with silver and gold"; or words to that effect. By which I mean to say that the American film industry is perceptibly feeling the effects of a momentous foreign invasion. The invaders are not Assyrians, but they are Frenchmen, Italians, not to mention a charming lady from Hungary. They have come, they have seen, and they have conquered the moving picture field by their vivacity; their politely deprecating shrugs; and their wonderment at the marvels of this great country.

The presence of these representatives of the European film industry has attracted the attention of the outside newspaper press. Even the great New York "Herald" is moved to prepare a story. In outside circles there seems something like a mixture of wonderment and alarm at the determined attempt made by the European makers to secure a footing on this market. Italy and France are especially prominent in the attempt. But what have they to wonder at in this? At Thirty-fourth street and Broadway just now, where the opera houses are about commencing business for the season, Italy and France are operatically prominent; as they have always been, and always must be, while Italy and France remain the two leading artistic nations on the face of the globe.

That sizes up the matter as it affects the moving picture situation in America and the probable outcome of the invasion of which I speak. The European makers have come here to see for themselves how the moving picture is made and exhibited. They have contemplated the technical and histrionic talent employed by native workers and they have got right down to the game. What wonder, then, that with a consciousness of artistic pre-eminence they should survey the American moving picture field with feelings of equanimity?

It is no use blinking facts. Pilar Morin has come here to teach us pantomime. Albertieri is here to take up stage direction. These excellent people are employees. There is bound to be a continuance of this kind of immigration; there is bound to be a steady recognition of the fact that, inasmuch as the best artistic and histrionic ability as applied to moving pictures is found in the old world and does not exist in the new world in sufficient quantity, it must be imported if, generally speaking, the American made film is to hold its own in the world's markets for excellence of artistic, histrionic and technical effect.

Not all the special pleading of interested people at No. 1 Madison avenue and elsewhere can whittle away this fact. America is a young country and it is, comparatively speaking, an uncultured country. Though it has a literature of its own, its art is lamentably exiguous. The Metropolitan Art Museum, in New York City, is pathetic in its barrenness Outside Sargeant, Shannon, Chase, Alexander and, of course, Whistler, there are no painters to speak of. You could put American first rate pictorial art in an apartment not much bigger than a hall bedroom, while as for histrionic ability, there are probably not ten first rate performers in the whole of the country.

This may be severe criticism not entirely to the taste of the gentleman at No. 1 Madison avenue, but then if he is so deplorably ignorant of European conditions as not to know the facts of the case I cannot help him and he has no right to arrogate to himself the position of an authority. I have sat under the moving picture in many European countries and I beg to say for the edification of James L., that I know what I am talking about whilst his knowledge has to be taken entirely on trust. With due regard to the exigencies of advertising, of course.

So now we come down to appreciate the real importance of the foreign invasion. The artists are here, the manufacturers are here. The latter are going home with mixed impressions. They see a vast country in the making; they see an enormous field for European moving pictures adapted for the peculiar needs of this public. We are not likely to see fewer French and Italian films; we are likely to see more, just as year by year we are seeing more and more operatic artists. They grow on trees in Italy and France; here you have to force them in a hot house. The Italians and the French are born artists, whatever sphere of life they may be drafted into. Neither your Teuton nor your Anglo Saxon is an artist in this sense of the term. He has to be licked into shape. You could make a very creditable job out of him by this process, but the innate artistry of the Latin will always excel.

This gives in a discursive form a few reasons as to why the European-made moving picture is bound to excel. You have in the cases of Pathe, Gaumont, Eclair, Ambrosio, Aquila, Eclipse, generally speaking, the highest possible manifestations of artistical and technical excellence. And that is what the American public is demanding to-day in the moving picture end of matters.

Why is the theatrical situation so rotten? Everybody in the know is perfectly well aware that two-thirds of the theatrical enterprises in this country at the present time are not making money if even they are not actually losing it. Why are these conditions thus? Simply because the entertainments for years past have been indescribably stupid. They have been directed and controlled by sharp men of business, it is true, but those sharp men of business have not called into aid the highest class literary, artistic and histrionic ability. The result is as we see, disaster upon disaster upon Broadway and elsewhere.

Something like the same danger threatens the moving picture situation. There are not enough first class feature films sent out to satisfy the demands of the public. The foreign manufacturers are here at a critical moment. They see the opportunity; they are prepared to help to supply the needs. If the situation were continued for long, as it existed in the past few months, there would be a very serious menace, in my opinion, to the stability of the entire business. The public has got to that point where it realizes that there are degrees and grades of quality in the moving picture. It does not matter who makes the pictures, whether they are native or foreign. They do not understand why all the pictures do not level up to the quality of the Pathe and Biograph masterpieces. And not understanding, they are disappointed. That is the situation in the moving picture field at the present moment whilst the European manufacturers are turning their faces homeward. They can produce an unlimited number of masterpieces and that is what I append they are prepared to do on their return.

A WOMAN INVADES THE AMERICAN MOVING PICTURE FIELD.

A vivacious Hungarian brunette is the outstanding sensation of this week's moving picture situation. She is Miss Frida Klug, the only lady so far to our knowledge to grapple with the intricacies of the film importing and renting business. She was present at the Chicago Alliance and they "received her not," on a technicality, namely, that the business house she represents has no office in this country. So, with characteristic promptitude and enterprise, the girl, who came all the way from Turin, Italy, to see commercial justice done to the pictures her firm handles, came on to New York before shedding her vivacious smiles on Philadelphia, Pittsburg and other cities of the Union.

Frida Klug represents in this country A. Schultze, of Turin, who holds the agency for the Helios, Roato, Roma and Pasquali films—all, it will be seen, of Italian make. Judging by the specimen on which we comment elsewhere, these pictures are of high-class merit, and Miss Klug will probably open an agency in America for their sale. Careful readers of last week's Moving Picture World will recollect that we foreshadowed the opening up of many European agencies in this country. Besides the Schultze agency, other agencies are, we know, contemplating establishing themselves here.

Our lady visitor has been in the United States about a month, and her general impressions of the way in which the moving picture is presented to the public, and of its qualitative character, are not flattering to American vanity. She shrugs it all away as being far behind what is being done in Italy, Hungaria and other European centers, where the Ambrosio quality is the standard, and where the moving picture is housed in theaters which in sumptuousness could quite compete with the fine theatrical houses in this city. In other words, continental Europe dignifies the moving picture to the height of its possibilities. America, except, perhaps, in the Middle and Far West, and some parts of the South, is only just beginning to realize what can be done to make the moving picture properly presentible to a critical audience.

Miss Klug's youth and enterprise are valuable assets. She has had experience in the moving picture situation in London, Paris, Budapest and other large cities, and if, as we understand is likely, she is to remain in the United States in the business, we desire to extend to her a most hearty welcome into the moving picture field.

THE NATIONAL INDEPENDENT MOVING PICTURE ALLIANCE.

A very important session of film men occurred on Saturday, October 30, when the Executive Committee of the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance convened in Chicago. The eyes of the entire film world were upon it, for on their actions depended the future of the independent business. The members were not unmindful of the burden resting upon their shoulders, for they realized that notwithstanding the strength of numbers, and that every independent interest of importance was enrolled under its banner, the N. I. M. P. A. was a force whose power must be regulated and used by its leaders for the best interests of all concerned.

The entire board was present, consisting of J. J. Murdock, Wm. H. Swanson, J. W. Morgan, I. C. Oes and A. Kessel. Arrangements had been made to have those persons who might be called upon hold themselves ready for instant call, including attorneys and sub-committees, and this foresight in arranging details rendered it possible to transact a surprising amount of business.

President Murdock and Secretary Swanson were not in a physical condition to attend, but they disregarded their physicians' orders and stuck to their tasks.

The Financial Committee reported that arrangements had been made with all manufacturers, providing for a steady income to the Alliance from that direction. Temporary Treasurer M. Fleckles reported that with but three exceptions all members had fully paid their initiation fees.

The matter of a comprehensive system of keeping records and reports was discussed, and F. W. Tracy, of the Exclusive Film Company, was called in. Mr. Tracy is an experienced accountant and has had considerable experience in devising working systems. He submitted an outline and volunteered his services to the Alliance, and the committee tendered him a vote of thanks and requested that he proceed to work out a system for the Alliance. Luke H. Mithen, one of the attorneys for the Alliance, was present and passed upon the legality of the various forms.

The subject of a universal contract was brought up, owing to the fact that film exchanges have had considerable trouble with sub-renters and dishonest persons, and it was shown that the Alliance was in better position to assist the film exchange if it had a contract in existence. It was thereupon decided to adopt a universal contract.

The Exclusive Film Company and the Chicago Film Exchange were shown to hold memberships as importers and film exchanges, and the secretary was instructed to advise them to change one of their names, in conformity with the by-laws.

A. Kessel presented his bond as treasurer, but owing to the surety company not having filled out same properly it was necessary to have a new one made out. In the meantime M. Fleckles will continue to act as temporary treasurer, as Mr. Kessel did not care to take over the large fund until his bond had been accepted.

Sub-renting and kindred evils were discussed, and the secretary instructed to notify all members that all rules of the Alliance would be strictly enforced.

The handling of the output of the Alliance manufacturers was the subject of much attention, and a manufacturers' meeting is to be called by the secretary to take up this question and the matter of release days.

New applications were then acted upon, as follows:

G. W. Bradenburgh, Philadelphia, importer. Rejected.

Theo. Brinkmier, Wheeling, W. Va., manufacturer. Accepted. Mr. Brinkmier submitted a reel of his film.

Carson Company, New York City, manufacturer. Accepted.

Pantograph Corporation, New York City; Travergraph Company, Brooklyn; U. S. Film Company, Cincinnati, Ohio; Thanhonser Company, New York City; Horsley Manufacturing Company, Bayonne, N. J., were all accepted as manufacturers, subject to the approval of their film by the Executive Committee. Also Actophone Company, New York City.

August Schultze, Turin, Italy. Rejected.

The Philadelphia Film Exchange, Philadelphia; Pacific Film Exchange, Seattle, Wash.; Wichita Film and Supply Company, Wichita, Kan.; Gus Sun, Springfield, Ohio; Great Eastern Film Company, New York City, were accepted as film renters. The Eagle Film Service, of Portland, Ore., was accepted on condition that it change its name so as not to conflict with the Eagle, of Philadelphia.

The secretary was thereupon instructed to notify all members who had not complied with the by-laws, and who had not paid their initiation fees, that they were dropped from membership.

Harstn & Co., of New York; the Golden Gate Film Exchange, of San Francisco; Acme Film Exchange, of Pittsburg, and Central Film and Supply Company, of Saginaw, Mich., were dropped from membership.

A resolution was passed requesting the manufacturers to furnish the secretary with a list of exchanges buying film, in order to guide him in issuing certificates to them, and for the purpose of incorporating this information in advertisements in the trade papers.

While the Executive Committee was in session it was visited by a delegation of foreign manufacturers, among whom were Ambrosio, Eclair, Lux, Itala, and Ciamengo. They expressed themselves as much pleased with the efforts being made to further independent interests in America, and promised their full co-operation and support in every way.

The Theatorium, recently opened on North avenue, near Charles street, Baltimore, Md., is showing Independent films exclusively. Harry Jackins, manager, has operated the North Avenue Casino, the largest amusement place on the North Side, for some time past, the two houses now being handled in conjunction.

With the release of a plentiful supply of American subjects, the Independents anticipate a revival of their business. On and after October 25 seven reels of American made subjects will be released weekly, including the New York Motion Picture Company, one; Columbia Film Company, one; Laemmle (Imp), one; Powers Company, one; Phoenix, one; World Film Manufacturing Company, one; Carson, one.

In addition to the above there will be released within the next few weeks one reel from the following: The Columbia Cinematograph Company, The Photomotograph Company (Aleck Moore), Theo. Brinkmier and the Pantograph Company. This will reinforce the magnificent line of foreign goods being released by Independent headquarters. At the present time there are available for Independent exchanges seven reels of American subjects and at least seventeen European, making a total of twenty-four. Within the next few weeks four additional American reels will be added, making twenty-eight regularly released each week. Independent exchanges are jubilant over the outlook, and are making preparations to handle the influx of business which is sure to result.

OHIO NOTES.

By W. C. Kunzmann.

The Orpheum Theater opened last week under the successful management of Mr. Chas. Peckham. This theater played to capacity houses at each performance during the opening week. Mr. Peckham has contracted with a Chicago vaudeville exchange to furnish him weekly eight high class vaudeville acts. During the past week extensive improvements have been made in front of this theater. An electric sign, with the letters "Orpheum," containing 600 eight candle power lights, has been placed on the roof of this theater. This costly sign can be seen a mile away. Mr. Peckham is a hustling theater promoter; he also has an interest in several theaters in Ohio, as well as being general manager of the Cleveland Film Supply Company, Cleveland, Ohio.

Grand Theater, located on East Ninth street, Cleveland, Ohio, held its first anniversary week, October 25. An extra strong bill, consisting of eight high class vaudeville acts and moving pictures, was presented at the regular admission prices, five, ten and twenty cents. This theater has a seating capacity of thirteen hundred. Mr. C. H. Michel, the widely known theatrical promoter, has been in charge of this theater since its opening, a year ago.

Mr. Fred Howe, a member of the I. A. T. S. E. Operators' Local 169, of Cleveland, Ohio, has been engaged as chief electrician at the new Orpheum Theater, on East Ninth street. Mr. Howe is a practical operator as well as an electrician. He has been connected, in the past three years, with various road attractions as chief electrician.

The new Plaza Theater, located on East Fifty-fifth street, with Mr. Forbes Robertson as manager, has contracted for five high class vaudeville acts weekly, in connection with the best of moving pictures. This policy will be followed weekly throughout the rest of the Winter. Mr. Robertson has also inaugurated other new features and improvements to beautify this cozy theater. Two operators are employed, also uniformed attendants and the place is provided with all the modern theater facilities.

THE VALUE OF SILENT DRAMA; OR, PANTOMIME IN ACTING.

By Mlle. Pilar Morin.

(From The Edison Kinetogram.)

The art of pantomime, so necessary to acting, has been very much misunderstood, and often classified with acrobatic, or rough-and-tumble action. Not that good acrobatic work is not to be admired when performed by an artist in that line; everything in art, if artistically done, is worth seeing or hearing. It is the word pantomime which brings to this art the misunderstanding, as most people believe it to be what I mention above. It has nothing to do with such work, except in the use of graceful poses, which their silent work has taugh acrobats is necessary to charm their audience's eyes. Pantomime does not mean silence, then to move about and gesticulate without thought. No, indeed not! Pantomime is really The Soul to Drama of the Stage, of Life, and to the Drama of Suffering. Fundamentally they are synonymous, each being the "Silent Drama" within us, created by thought.

Words are echoes of thought. Thought is the work on which to build the foundation for action. "Actions speak louder than words;" and that is why Action in Drama can only be successful when it is completely vindicated by feeling. Action must not be invented, but made intelligible through emotional necessity. Every artist must learn how to control emotion and feeling in order to bring forth tears, laughter, or to fascinate with grace and charm. This needs careful study, not by speaking in loud voice the words in a play, but by carefully searching the pictures for meaning pertaining to the thought which inspired the echoed words written in the play. The "Silent Drama" within us does this work silently while the pictures of meaning pass before our eyes, awakening the emotions of the heart with powerful feeling, words becoming echoes of these emotions and feelings, while the actions of the body accompany naturally and truthfully, helping therefore to create words and invest them with proper intonations, giving light and shade to the voice as well as depth and sincerity; while the emotions of the heart (which is the "Silent Drama" within us) live the pictures we see, illuminating them with echoes of words.

This is the art of pantomime, or let us call it "Silent Drama." When this art is supplied in a Silent Play, the work is more difficult, because the illumination which spoken words give to drama, is absent. The only mental words used are prompted by the thought and meaning (of the words written by authors) which our heart's emotion portrays in action, expression, and feeling, inspired with the revelation of music, —music painting with sound, the meaning of each thought becoming the loud spoken words of the "Silent Drama" plays. Such delightful music is in "L'Enfant Prodigue," which can be listened to, as part of action—music which is meant to illuminate words and help the action, not to hide it.

If composers only knew the wonderful value and light of understanding, which the study of writing a score for a Silent play, a Pantomime, would bring to them! To learn how to paint in tone colors the emotions of the soul, give life to action, with grace and charm to the ear, as well as to the eyes; for if the music has grace, the "Silent Drama" artist portrays it in action, bringing it to our eyes with the expression of his or her feeling; and when it is dramatic, its inspiration awakens the Silent Drama within the artist, opening the gates of strength and power, both artist and music working together in feeling and emotion.

Authors of plays would be inspired with truer action, therefore stronger; plots would not depend on words, but on strength of action. Picture the play. If it is strong enough to be nearly all portrayed in action, then you can be certain that when you will illuminate it with echoes of beautiful words, you have created first a strong foundation and have more chances for success. To me that is where the moving pictures are bound to help out, and become in this glorious country what they are in France—a study, an art, a lesson. And why? Because with that study one has a chance to learn the value of action and dramatic pose. Because in France, great artists are engaged to portray great plays by great authors who are willing to condense powerful ideas and to see them put into actions and emotions; or because that great books are allowed to be condensed for the use of a one act play produced by the moving pictures, and that the artists who portray the characters are proud and happy to give their best, so that it may remain as a standard of their efforts in art when they are gone.

Acting died with a great artist, but now, thanks to the wonderful creative invention of the moving pictures, great acting can live forever, making art and artists immortal to all eyes, as well as to the memory. A lesson, because many good morals can be shown in good pictures, and because we also can realize then that "actions speak louder than words"; that expression must be made part of acting (just as pantomime is); and that grace and charm are necessary to acting, for in order to please the eye, you must know how to use your hands and arms. That is why the French pictures are so wonderfully artistic, because all these details which form "Silent Drama" or Pantomime, are the very base of their acting.

American moving pictures have progressed much. Special credit must be given to the Edison Company, whose founder and creative spirit is no less than that genius Thomas A. Edison, one of the greatest wonders of this country. The Edison Company have been pioneers in elevating the art of moving pictures by securing well-known artists and authors—both realizing the value of action, emotion, and feeling as a great study. This firm also first announced on the screen the cast of their best pictures, thus making the artist more eager to do his or her best in action. It is a pleasure to hear of all the artistic things this firm has in store to elevate this art, in bringing forth to light the merits and value of pantomime or Silent Drama in the art of acting, and I am glad to have associated myself with them.

A WEEK IN CINCINNATI, OHIO.

By E. K. Kopf.

Moving picture shows have so much electricity in them that they have a drawing power like a magnet. After I had traveled 750 miles from New York to this city without a stop, I left the train and had only walked a few blocks when my attention was attracted by an electric piano in a nickelet, so I went in, and was pleased to find it a very cozy place, very clean, and the attendants were very polite. The two reels which they showed were good, being the third and fourth run of the Independent. This was on a very rainy day about 2 P. M., but the theater, which I should judge seated about two hundred, was well filled. I find 150 moving picture shows here, of which I visited about seventy-five. The Independents have slightly the lead in numbers.

Cincinnati is one of the busiest cities of the Middle West. On Fifth street alone there are 10 moving picture theaters, among the most prominent being the "Bijou," J. Libson, manager; "Colonial," Ed. Bernard, manager; "American," Harry Hart, manager; "Star," Carl Schreiber, manager; "Hippodrome," Mr. Warfield, manager; "Orpheum," McMahan & Jackson, managers; "Pastime," T. M. Nolan, manager. I had a personal talk with the manager of the Lubin Theater, also on Fifth street, Mr. J. T. Hennigan, of the Hennigan Show Printers, of this city, who is well liked by his employees and manages the house in such a way that it is utterly impossible to find any chance for improvement.

On Sunday it is almost impossible to secure a seat in any one of these handsome places, and not one of them is complaining of hard times. I had a very pleasant conversation with Brother A. Dressner, manager of the Lubin Film Service, which is the principal licensed exchange in Cincinnati and seems to be doing a very good business. I was extended the courtesy of the firm to make their office my headquarters during my stay at Cincinnati. Brother Dressner belongs to Local No. 37, I. A. T. S. E., and is also a T. M. A., and is a genuine good fellow. He extends a cordial invitation to the firm office to all moving picture operators who may be passing through this city.

The Lubin Film Service Company has enlarged its quarters considerably and is now buying a large amount of licensed films, and the manager advised me that they are contemplating buying the entire output. The Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company is also a licensed exchange and is doing good business.

The Cincinnati Film Exchange, of 214 West Fifth street, McMahan & Jackson, proprietors and managers, is the Independent house of the city. These managers certainly have done their share of hustling, as the office is well filled with the latest issue, even the "Imp" showing itself on the list. The only complaint that I could hear was that they had more customers than they could supply. McMahan & Jackson are it, in the Independent circle, being the leading factors in the Middle West. They are both well known throughout the film trade, and the Independent manufacturers ought to take their hats off to these two hustlers, as they have certainly earned all the praise that they get.

I find that the moving picture shows in Cincinnati are run very nicely and are up to date in every respect. Going further in the picture field. I find that the Cincinnati operators have formed a "local," which is affiliated with the Federation of Labor, and received their charter, with 17 members, on March 14, 1909, being called the Moving Picture and Projecting Machine Operators' Local No. 165, I. A. T. S. E. They have at present 33 members and their initiation fee is $25.00. The officers are as follows: President, Ed. Kirsch; Vice-President, Mitchell Meyers; Secretary and Treasurer. Harry Schwartz; Sergeant-at-Arms, Fred Biere; Business Agent, Arthur Fix. This organization is a direct local of the I. A. T. S. E., working in conjunction with Local No. 5 of Cincinnati. The members appear to be a fine class of fellows, who know their business and are well liked by all the exhibitors employing them, each house thinking so well of them that they have a special slide which is shown on the screen before each performance, in the shape of the following: They are contemplating giving an entertainment and dance in order to assist themselves financially, and apparently the affair will be a grand success, as the exhibitors offer to assist them all they can, and that shows a good spirit among all, which should exist at all times. I wish I could say the same of all the "Locals."

The boys have arranged their shift very nicely, being a long and a short day and each having every other afternoon and every other night off. The local meets every second and fourth Tuesday of the month in their elegantly furnished lodge room.

The Johnson-Ketchel fight pictures at the People's Theater this week did S. R. O. business and were a fine set of fight pictures, clear as crystal, being about 4,000 feet in all, and the finish being one of the most exciting rounds ever produced by a moving picture machine. When Ketchel floors Johnson and Johnson knocks out Ketchel and he himself falls to the floor, it makes the audience think they are at a ringside, and the cheers from the theater are heard for blocks. Mr. Edward Davidson, manager for the pictures, certainly made a flying trip. The fight took place at San Francisco, Cal., on October 16; then the negative was shipped to the Kalem Company, New York, where they were printed, and Mr. Davidson arrived here in Cincinnati Sunday, October 24, and the pictures went on at 2. P. M., making just seven days from the time of the fight. They were also presented to the public in four other cities at the same time. Now, that's going some, but they expect to do better with the Jeffries and Johnson pictures. Let us hope so.

A MESSAGE TO NAPOLEON (Great Northern).

Many incidents in the life of the great Napoleon have been depicted on the screen. We have seen Napoleon on the battlefield, on the throne, in his home life and on lonely St. Helena. But the Great Northern Film Company have seized upon an incident new to the theatergoer, viz., his imprisonment and escape from the island of Elba. The plot to free him, the successful mission of the young officer, who, at peril of his life, evades the guards and places the papers in the hands of his emperor, are all well handled and with a fine appreciation of the dramatic effects of the story. It is needless to say that the excellent photography adds to the effectiveness of a film that should be shown in every Independent theater.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Horace B. Deal Company is working on plans for a new moving picture theater to be erected at Aspen street and Haverford avenue.

Comments on the Week's Films.

ENTOMBED ALIVE (Vitagraph).

A company of Italian players have been added to the Vitagraph's actors and to them was assigned the presentation of this subject. In some ways it is a marvel of merit. In others it is less to our taste, because it exhibits the worst side of human nature so graphically that it can be seen in all its repulsiveness, and largely, too, because of the sympathy the audience have with the girl who is forced into a repulsive alliance. The acting is finished, and, so far as the elements of dramatic art go, it would be difficult to conceive anything better. But to see a young man walled up alive merely because he dared to love a girl is not quite to one's liking, even though it is only a drama. And when he breaks out and the miser drops dead at the lovers' feet universal satisfaction is expressed by the spectators. The picture is beautifully staged and the acting is of a high order. The new actors have proved their ability in this highly dramatic piece of work. They and the Vitagraph Company are to be congratulated upon its success. The public will look for more of this sort of thing from them, even though they may not have liked the subject. The acting and the presentation are unquestionably above the average.

MEXICAN' CRIME (New York Motion Picture Co.).

A sanguinary melodrama of the West which has plenty of action, accompanied by much shooting, resulting in numerous wounds and a closing scene which shows the instigator of it all led away to execution by the sheriff, while the pretty Spanish dancer is seen holding the hands of her two admirers. The picture has all the dash and go of the usual Western drama, with cowboys, Mexicans, careering horses and a rush of many feet and hands in a long run. There is a battle which has many elements of dramatic possibilities in it and the final summing up is interesting. The guilty are punished and the good are rewarded. What more could the lover of pictures of a melodramatic character want? The technical quality is good, though there are places where improvement would be possible without much effort, but the picture is interesting and never fails to excite the interest of the audience. Gun play seems to be a necessary feature in all these Western dramas. Let us suggest to the "Bison" people as well as the older manufacturing concerns that less powder and smoke would be more convincing. The reckless shooting gives a wrong impression of the marksmanship of the Westerners, and gives rise to much adverse criticism of these Wild West scenes.

THE THREE KISSES (Edison).

The success of previous comedies written by Carolyn Wells especially for this company was so pronounced that another has been brought out, quite as piquant and quite as entertaining as the others. The new release is a Hallowe'en story, based upon the time-honored customs of that season, aided and abetted by an exceedingly pretty girl and an audacious young man, who steals two kisses, and takes a third, though perhaps he didn't steal the last one. There is a quality to Miss Wells' work which adds to the attractiveness of the picture, proving conclusively that successes in comedy can be as marked when the play is delicate and the humor artistic as when it is of the broader and nearer horseplay type. The success of the Edison Company with Miss Wells' comedies should encourage further development along the same line and lead other producers to offer something delicately amusing, rather than the broad and coarse comedies which have done duty so long. The acting in this film is quite in harmony with the subject and correctly interprets the idea of the author. The photography is clear and the printer did his work well. Altogether it is a satisfactory film and everyone connected with its production is to be congratulated upon its success.

"The Girl Scout" (Kalem).—In this picture the producing company has woven an interesting and active melodramatic tale about the Canadian contingent in the Boer War. There are stirring battle scenes, with some exhibitions of daring and bravery which make one's blood tingle, and there are tender scenes which bring the tears. And through it all runs this tender love story, which finally ends in a wedding. Like all melodramas, there is much boisterous work in this, yet it does not cause the uneasiness that it sometimes does and one sees the close with a good degree of satisfaction. It is, all things considered, as interesting a film, and as full of aetion, as anything the Kalem people have yet produced. The steady improvement in the Kalem pictures indicates a progressive spirit for whieh the firm is to be commended. But to keep pace with their competitors a Kalem studio will have to eome and with it more convincing settings for some of their seenes.

"Buffalo Racing in Madeira" (Pathe).—A beautifully colored pieture, the fine art in whieh seems almost wasted on this subjeet. While there is some exeitement in it, the fact remains that to go to all the expense and trouble required to produce such a meehanically perfect film merely to show how the natives of Asia Minor raee wild buffaloes, is incomprehensible. Sueh a pieture is not without interest, still we think a mistake was made in making it so elaborate. But, Pathe does things elaborately.

"Life Behind the Scenes" (Pathe).—A picture of some interest, inasmueh as it shows, in a general way, some of the contrasts between an aetor's stage life and his real life. To wateh the heroes on the stage and then see what they are and how they live in their daily life is interesting, and it may have a tendeney to dispel the fascinating influenee which the glamor of the stage exerts over some persons ineapable of really appreeiating the eonditions. Aeting and staging are beyond eriticism and the film ought to be well reeeived.

"The Song of the Cradle" (Gaumont).—A story of a stolen ehild who was taken from his cradle by a band of gypsies and kept until he was fifteen years old. He was taught to sing and play some musieal instrument and brought up a strolling musician. Wandering one day near a castle he sings the lullaby he learned from his mother when a small child and she, reeognizing the song, finds through it her long lost boy. The interest of the pieture is almost wholly in its pietorial effect. The seenery is interesting and the story is well enough told, although not suffieiently convincing. It is hardly possible that a child stolen from a cradle or carriage could remember the lullaby his mother taught him with suffieient clearness to reproduee it so she would recognize it fifteen years afterward; but in sueh stories perhaps such lapses, or prodigies, are permissible. Anyhow the film takes well and the audienee doesn't seem to worry particularly about the possibility of the story.

"A Barrow Race" (Gaumont).—A comic which represents men seated in barrows which are wheeled by blindfolded individuals. The men in the barrows direet the movements of those who are doing the wheeling. The interest centers ehiefly in the numerous falls which the unfortunate men reeeive in their uncertain progress wheeled by blinded operators.

"Burglar in the Trunk" (Pathe).—A story of a burglar who jumps into a trunk to hide from the approaching people and is bundled off to the eountry as clothing. The banging and knoeking about that the trunk gets on its journey constitute the ehief points of interest. The story itself possesses no particular merit, but there is some humor in the trying situations which the burglar eonfronts before he is released from his eramped position. It is acted by a clever comedian who gets more out of it than would seem possible.

"Mountebank's Watchcase" (Pathe).—A story whieh has the merit of novelty, although possessing no partieular element of strength. To see men swallow watehes and then disgorge them is not as attractive as it might be, even though the situation presents a few elements of interest otherwise. The elever work in securing the watehes is not without its interest, but aside from that the picture has no great attractions.

"Lines of White on a Sullen Sea" (Biograph).—A sombre story given with strong dramatic effect. A film that creates a profound impression. It is equally good in photographie effeet and maintains the Biograph standard.

"The Senorita" (Selig).—This pieture story brings the Selig Company back into their own realm. Scenery and aetion alike eonvineing, it is a film that will appeal to any audience.

"For Sale, a Baby" (Melies).—This comedy is mueh better handled than last week's "Cinderella" and kept the audienee in good humor. It was followed by "Hypnotist's Revenge," a triek film from Melies' Paris studio, whieh upholds his high reputation for this elass of work.

"A Change of Complexion" (The Powers Company).—The first produetion of this company is generally praised as clever work and good photographically. This is encouraging, as it is the work of the Bianchi camera. Not a single word of eriticism is heard exeept that it was stretched out to a full reel. It is rarely the case that this ean be done with a comedy without its becoming tiresome.

"DESTINY."

Some Ameriean producers have been guilty of too mueh sameness. The eowboy and the Indian have been done to death, yet they bob up again every week. But the "Imp" produeers have started out with a variety of theme that is both refreshing and eneouraging. Their first may be termed a classie, the second a eomedy-drama, while the third, "Destiny," is melodrama or tragedy in its strongest vein. First we see a thief hiding the gold whieh he had stolen from his fellow miners. Then we are shown the camp of an unlucky miner. He is bidding farewell to his daughter as he starts out to dig for gold, while she gives food to a hungry Indian. The miner discovers the hidden gold and is so overeome that he dies from the shoek. Another miner discovers the body and is making away with the gold when he is seen by the friendly Indian, who aeeuses him of murdering the old man. The Indian is felled and the miner flees with the gold, only to be swallowed up in a quicksand. He is traced and killed by the Indian, who gets the gold and lays it at the feet of the fair daughter of the deceased miner number one. Then the Indian, too, dies, and the story ends with the girl wondering what she will do with all the gold now that all her friends are dead. The story itself is weak and the moral, if there be a moral, is obtuse; but the "Imp" aetors have done their best to make it attraetive. With the exception of the finding of the gold and the trail of the Indian, the aetions, if not the ineidents, are convincing. The quicksand effeet is cleverly handled and realistie enough and the scenes are well calculated to hold the interest. Photographically, if not otherwise, "Destiny" is an improvement on former "Imp" releases, and will make a strong addition to the Independent program.

A BROKEN LIFE (Roma).

This is a pieture that is being marketed here by Miss Frida Klug, to whom referenee is made in another part of this week's World. It was made in Turin, by Roma, who appears to have eommand of the serviees of some very fine actors and actresses, as well as photographers. It is a pieture whieh at the technieal end of matters bears very close serutiny, whilst to the story little or no exeeption can be taken. It is a domestic drama appealing to the passionate side of human nature and shows how a daughter sacrifices her own name and happiness for the reputation of her mother. Ineidentally the various situations give rise to some fine bits of acting, while there are some effects in the films sueh as we have never seen before, notably the simultaneous exposition of an exterior street seene with an interior and with movement taking place in both. Then another part of the pieture shows the figure of a woman almost silhouetted against a very bright exterior seene—an open-air effeet very popular in stationary photography. Artistieally, technically and histrionieally, we like this picture very mueh, with the reservation that perhaps the story is more readily grasped by the Latin temperament than by the Anglo-Saxon. Anyhow, Roma films are obviously good and they should find a great market here.

THE SHACKLETON FILMS.

Lieut. Shaekleton, of the British Navy, reeently returned from the Antaretie regions, having nearly suceeeded in getting to the South Pole, or "the bottom of the world." His exploring work seems to have met with the eommendation of the world's geographers; moreover, he was fortunate enough to seeure a number of stationary and moving photographs of Antarctic scenery and incident. These pietures have been, and are being, shown around Great Britain and are attracting widespread attention—indeed, they may be regarded as one of the greatest moving picture sueeesses on the other side.

It will interest our readers to know that Mr. R. W. Hulbert, of Toronto, Canada, who recently arrived here from England, has secured the Ameriean and Canadian rights for these pietures. Mr. Hulbert proposes having the pictures shown wherever practieable, and is espeeially organizing lecture companies for Canada for the purpose of making the Shackleton films a feature of the evening entertainment. Mr. Hulbert's address is 328 Confederation Life Building, Toronto, Canada. The same gentleman has also secured remarkably good photographs of a reeent prize fight at the National Sporting Club, London. This eontest, although only lasting four rounds, seems to have been full of ineident. Moreover, the photographie quality of the pictures is exceedingly good. As prize fight films are always popular with the American publie, and this particular one seems to be an extremely good one of its kind, this pieture will no doubt also be seen.

Because every one of our releases last week was so exceptional, the remark is current that we have set ourselves too high a standard to maintain.

THE SERIES D'OR

of which "Nero, or the Burning of Rome," by Ambrosio, was the first, contains twelve issues to be released at regular intervals, Every one is more perfect than the one mentioned. Then there is the "Dr. Phantom" series, by Raleigh & Robert, which are simply marvelous. Also, the wonderful comics and dramas by Itala, Cines, Le Lion, Eclair, Pineschi, and whole lot of others.

Our programmes are good—yes, exceptionally good. Why shouldn't they be, with 32 manufacturers offering us their productions. They know we only select the BEST—and we are hard to satisfy. They know they must make GOOD pictures, BETTER PICTURES—and keep on making better pictures, else they won't be able to sell them to us. The standard is always HIGHER, and so our programmes will always be better than the preceding ones.

MR. EXHIBITOR: If your exchange won't supply you with our programme, leave him or your business will leave you. Any GOOD exchange can supply you with our films.

Stories of the Films.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE RESTORATION.—The world's history would contain many blank pages if it were not for the frequent occasions of misconstruction of intent. How many commendable deeds have been misconstrued and made the genesis of woe! Wrong impressions, converted ideas and hallucinations have formed the greater part of the causes of calamity, and there is no stronger ideological force than jealousy, and jealousy thrives most in the fagged brain. Henry Morley was suffering from what seemed to be an attack of hypochondriasis. He was low-spirited, irresolute of purpose, and, in fact, on the verge of nervous collapse. His wife becomes solicitous and urges outdoor exercise, such as hunting, driving and the like. Feeling that she will be very much alone, she invites her cousin, Miss Alice Ashford, to spend the Summer with her, which invitation is accepted. Now Miss Ashford has a sweetheart, Jack Dudley, who, having met Morley, misapprehends his moody manner, and imagines he is disliked, prefers to meet the girl in the garden. One of these claudestine meetings takes place just as Morley is leaving for a drive. Jack and Alice indulge in a little quarrel over a photograph he has, the identity of which he teasingly refuses to disclose. Alice leaves him in a huff, declaring she will never speak to him again. Jack now realizes he has carried the joke too far, and endeavors to explain, but she is deaf to his entreaties and goes to her room, refusing to see him again. In desperation, Jack sees Mrs. Morley and begs that she intercede for him towards a reconciliation. This she consents to do, and volunteers to be the bearer of a note from him to Alice. Alice, however, tears the note in two, throws it on the floor, and stalks haughtily out of the room, followed by Mrs. Morley. Now the first meeting of Jack and Mrs. Morley was witnessed by Morley, who misconstrues the intent, hence his jealousy is aroused, and upon entering, he finds the note, which reads: "Dear Girl: Don't be hard on me. Meet me in the garden at seven. Jack." This, of course, he believes is intended for his wife, and he rushes out in a frenzy of jealousy. Not finding them in the garden, he starts back to the house. Meanwhile, Mrs. Morley has effected a meeting between Alice and Jack, and throwing her shawl playfully about their shoulders, leaves them practically bound together to settle their little tiff. They are standing by the window, Alice in the shadow, with her cousin's shawl around her, when Morley enters. One glance is enough to convince him, and the heavy handle of his whip sends Jack to the floor apparently dead. In an instant he realizes his mistake and rushes from the house, raving mad. Through the grounds he dashes, imagining his victim is pursuing him. In this condition he is apprehended by the doctor, who has resuscitated Jack, and brought back to be shown the harmlessness of his act. But, alas, his reason is unbalanced and he still imagines Jack the shadow of himself. The physician thereupon devises a plan to restore his reason, and that is to re-enact the episode, which scheme is successful. It not only dissipates his horrible hallucination, but seems to lift him from his lethargic despondency. This subject is rather a novel idea, logical as well as ingenious.

THE LIGHT THAT CAME.—We, of course, assume that being most unfortunate over whose sight Fate has drawn the mantle of darkness, and it is reasonable so to do, but Divine Providence is sure to compensate those so afflicted with ameliorating gifts that help them bear their ills with fortitude, and not only that, their powers of discernment are far more acute than those endowed with sight. There is the sight of the soul, which sees farther than the eyes. This may be called intuition; but whatever it may be, it is a rare gift. Carl Wagner was bereft of his sight when a small child, and in order that he might be independent and earn a livelihood he learned music, that art in which the blind become most proficient. He played violin for the dancing at many of the East Side balls. Grace, Vivian and Daisy are sisters in a family of the workaday class. Vivian and Daisy are pretty young girls, while Grace is considered homely on account of an ugly scar on her cheek, the result of an accident at her work. The two pretty sisters are great favorites, enjoying social distinction, while drudgery and loneliness is the lot of poor Grace. We see the contrast on Saturday. Vivian and Daisy are getting ready to go to a party, and Grace is allowed to mope at home. Mother, however, urges Grace to go, and helps her to dress in a becoming frock. At the ball Vivian and Daisy are the center of attraction, engaging all the gallants' attention, but Grace remains the wallflower. The ball is over, and the poor girl would be allowed to leave without an escort, but Carl, the blind musician, gropes his way through the hall, and the girl, appreciating his social proscription from the experience of her own sad lot, offers him her hand to lead the way. In that grasp of the hands there is a communion of two pure souls and tender hearts. It is the enkindling of love between them, and they become sweethearts. Shortly afterwards their betrothal is announced, when a young doctor, upon examination, declares that Carl's sight can be restored, but it would require money to have it done, as the services of a specialist would be necessary. Now the poor fellow is more miserable than before, feeling that his cure is possible, yet he is without the necessary funds, as his engagements have only afforded him a bare living, and frugal as he might be he could not hope to accumulate sufficient to pay the doctor. Grace, however, has saved something and is at first elated with the idea to help him, but on viewing herself in the mirror she reasons that when the light comes he will see her as she is and she will then lose his love. Her hesitation is but for a moment, for the true heart is unselfish, and she at least can make him happy. The eminent doctor is employed, and his work is successful. But what a pathetic scene is the removing of the last bandage. He is in the seventh heaven of delight and calls for her. She at first is loath to show herself, fearing the consequences, but he does not consider her personal appearance, which is at best transitory, and which he now sees for the first time, but her heart, the purity of which he has known by intuition.

EDISON MFG. CO.

A BRIDE AND GROOM'S VISIT TO THE NEW YORK ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—Especially produced for the Edison picture by arrangement with the New York Zoological Society.

Scene 1.—Here comes the Bride and Groom down Pelham avenue in their touring car, stopping at the Concourse entrance, where "Deary" politely inquires the way, while "Lovey" looks sweetly on.

Scene 2.—Now they are whirled into Concourse Court, the main entrance to the largest Zoological Gardens in the world. Before them spreads a beautiful Italian garden. After leaving instructions with their chauffeur, they start to ascend the broad, stone steps which lead up to Baird Court.

Scene 3.—And here they are lost in the crowd which collects around the band stand of a Sunday afternoon—lost with the thousands of pleasure seekers that have come to wander over these 264 acres of land made beautiful by the hands of man.

Scene 4.—When next we see them at close range, they are standing before the largest flying bird cage in the world.

Scene 5.—Here the birds of the water and the birds of the air are collected from all quarters of the globe, from the great white heron to the scarlet ibis of South America, these birds are given a section of nature's own domain.

Scene 6.—Here is shown the California sea-lion, or bark sea-lion as it is generally called, one of the most wonderful and intellectual animals that inhabit the waters.

Scene 7 shows the white polar bear, and the most showy animal of all the bear species. It is also one of the wonders of nature in its ability to live in ice cold water, often swimming in a sea of ice and defying all attacks of King Frost in the frozen north.

Scene 8.—While at the bear den, we have a beautiful panoramic view of our friend, Bruno, who must be a half brother to the famous teddy-bear of the children's world. Here in these wonderfully constructed dens are to be found over 23 different species of the bear, including the grizzly bear of the north and west, the everglade bear of Florida and the glacier bear of the Alps, all full of life in captivity, always playful and ready to amuse the thousands who view them; and from the glimpse we get now and then of the Bride's face, one can easily tell that she, too, is enjoying Bruno in his beautiful home.

Scene 9.—A short distance from the bear den may be found what is known as the "Jungle Walk," a long, shady walk through a dense forest of trees under overhanging branches. One may always trust two lovers to find a shady spot away from the maddening crowds.

Scene 10.—Snakes are unpleasant yet intensely interesting creatures to gaze upon; and no wonder, since their history extends back as far as the beginning and fall of man. One cannot gaze upon these reptiles without feeling both horror and intent interest.

Scene 11.—It is with a sigh of relief that one turns away from the serpent to that noble animal, the lion, King of the Forest. Here, again, is given a complete panoramic view of the out-door cages of lions, tigers, leopards and jaguars, among which are the finest specimens of these species of animals in captivity. Ferocious in the extreme, yet not without majestic grandeur and exquisite grace, these lords of the forest pace up and down their steel, wire-bound cages, licking their jaws in anticipation of the noonday meal which their keeper is giving them. At the extreme end of the cages Sultan, King of the Forest, is held prisoner. This royal captive is the finest and noblest animal of its kind in captivity.

Scene 12.—Now we have an ample view of Sultan in his royal anger and ferocious rage as he paces to and fro in the confines of his cage, emitting that deep and awful hunting growl that strikes terror and fear to the heart of the African hunter in the still watches of the night.

Scene 13.—Again the camera has succeeded in catching this royal monarch in his laziest mood, basking in the sunlight and drowsily yawning time away, dreaming perhaps of some far off forest glade deep in the heart of darkest Africa.

Scene 14.—Of all animals that take the prizes in the beauty contest for extreme ugliness, the hippopotamus stands pre-eminent in every respect both in bulk and grossness. His dainty mouth looks like a small-sized tunnel. As he opens his jaws to receive food, one has a fine view of his dental auxiliaries. He swallows a large head of cabbage with the same ease that a human being would a few grains of sugar.

Scene 15.—Just pause for a few moments before the outside cage of the chimpanzee. Here we catch a glimpse of pleasure on the Bride's face and amusement on that of the Groom while they view these two chimpanzees, "August" and "Baldy." Now we are presented a much closer view, and the contrast between man and monkey comes forth in bold relief. When the Bride takes "Baldy" in her arms and holds him as though he were a child, one fully realizes Darwin's theory of the missing link, which might well have been inspired by just such an example of affection and human interest as is expressed in this scene. A very humorous contrast is presented when the keeper takes "Baldy" by the hand for a walk. Not only does the little animal take the greatest pleasure in his walks with his keeper, but will sulk for a half day at a time should his keeper neglect that bit of daily attention.

Scene 16.—It was just as they were about to enter the bird house that the first awful separation happened in the lives of this "all too happy" pair. Intently interested in all there is to see or hear, the young Bride pauses a moment to view some animal in a nearby cage, while the Groom, unconscious of her absence from his side, passes on into the building. Suddenly the bride discovers she is all alone!

Scene 17.—As she hastens through the bird house in search of the missing husband a gallant who has been watching her follows.

Scene 18.—Meanwhile the terrified husband darts hither and thither, in quest of his dearest one.

Scene 19.—Rushing through the elephant house in search of her lost one, little "bridey" does not notice that "Jumbo" is fast bearing down upon her with a bale of hay in his trunk, until she is suddenly confronted by the four-footed monster. No wonder she is only too eager to find protection in the arms of our waiting gallant, who does not hesitate to improve the opportunity which has fallen his way.

Scene 20.—We have now before us four specimens of the finest African elephants, two of which are twins. The smaller one of the group, which appears to be a baby elephant, is no other than a dwarf elephant, and could well be called the father of the lot.

Scene 21.—This picture exemplifies the truth of the statement that the elephant has a wonderful intellect and can be more rapidly trained than any other animal in captivity.

Scene 22.—That he may be well trained to do whatsoever his keeper wills is shown by the friendly terms on which the man and beast associate with each other.

Scene 23.—The little scene that takes place at the telephone shows the quick perception of the elephant and his docility in the hands of a careful trainer.

Scene 24.—Again we catch a glimpse of the lost Bride and her gallant admirer before the cage of an exquisite specimen of the Grevy zebra, which was captured at Masilande, East Africa.

Scenes 25 and 26 show large pictures of the American buffalo and give one a splendid opportunity to see what may shortly be known as an absolutely extinct animal.

Scene 27 gives us a glimpse of those strange, beautiful creatures, the Nubian or three-horned giraffes. These two giraffes were brought to this country at the cost of no less than $5,500. Standing as they do nearly 15 feet in height, the strange positions they are forced to take while eating off the ground are interesting to observe. The giraffe is the most gentle member of the animal kingdom.

Scene 28.—Apparently oblivious of her loss the fair young Bride is enjoying the companionship of her gallant, when suddenly "hubby" appears on the scene and all said is forgotten. One fond embrace and, without so much as a "Thank you, sir," the Bride sails away on the arm of her fond husband, while the bold gallant swears that woman is false and fickle as she is fair.

HIS MASTERPIECE.—Artists, musicians, painters, sculptors and authors all know how hard it is to gain recognition, and that when the public favor is once gained, future success is established.

In "His Masterpiece," the Edison Company has depicted the struggles of an old musician. His larder empty, his last coin gone, he gets an inspiration for a composition that will be heard and will make him famous in the utmost corners of the universe. As quickly as possible he writes the music and then, seizing his violin, he hurries to the studio of some of his artist friends where all is life and gayety. He plays his composition for them with a charm of expression that is simply marvelous.

The music is so plaintive and beautiful that their hilarity is subdued, and they are so overcome when he stops playing that they cannot speak. For a moment he thinks his composition a failure, but soon his enthusiasm returns and he hurries out and back to his own attic room, his heart beating high at the prospect of fame and affluence. The reward of years of struggle and privation is at hand.

Arriving at his lodgings he relates his prospective good fortune to his landlord who, however, refuses to believe him and turns him out because he is unable to pay his arrears. He tries to gain a hearing with one of the world's famous opera impresarios, only to be refused and curtly dismissed from his office.

As he is leaving this great man's office, his fond hopes shattered, he finds a valuable piece of jewelry in the gutter and, in spite of the fact that the owner's card is in the jewel case, he hurries to a pawn shop. Arriving at the money lender's his conscience rises to reproach him. Reminded thus of his duty, he cannot pawn what does not belong to him, even though he is starving, and he hurries away to the address on the card to return the jewels to their owner. He arrives at the fashionable home while a musicale is being held, at which is the famous impresario who had refused to listen to him that afternoon. It is noticed that he carries a violin and he is asked to play. At first he is timid, but the prospect of impressing the man of influence restores his courage.

He plays "His Masterpiece" and at once captures not only those who have been ridiculing his appearance, but the impresario also. This means that his troubles are at an end, for when this great man approves of a musical composition its success is assured.

One of the scenes in this picture is a reproduction of the world famous painting, "Beethoven," and the light effects and acting throughout the entire production leave nothing to be desired.

A MAN WITH THREE WIVES.—The location of this picture is not in Utah as might be inferred from the title, but right here in New York; and the situation is not so serious as it sounds.

Jack Howard who, with his chum Ralph, occupies a pretty studio in the Artists' Quarters, has just been married and some vague rumor of the event has reached the ears of his Uncle Peter. Now, Uncle Peter is a man of millions and Jack is his heir; and, like many other men of affairs, Uncle Peter considers it among his prerogatives to decide the domestic future of his lawful heir. He, therefore, sends Jack a peremptory telegram forbidding him to marry, under penalty of disinheritance.

As Jack has already committed that indiscretion it is too late to obey the command so, when Uncle Peter announces that he is coming for himself to see about things, the situation becomes desperate; but Jack is a young man of resource and, despite the fact that Ralph has a wife and baby, he insists upon introducing his bride to Uncle Peter as the lawful spouse of Ralph.

Jack's mother-in-law has a constitutional objection to models in her son-in-law's studio, so when she discovers one posing there, Jack sees no way out of the dilemma except to introduce the model as Ralph's wife, thus presenting Ralph with his third spouse. Things might have gone very smoothly under such circumstances, but for the fact that, to Uncle Peter, Ralph must appear to have one wife, and to Jack's mother-in-law, another; and must keep the situation from his own lawful wife. How thoroughly things get mixed when the different members of the families arrive together at the studio can better be told by the film than by words.

The denouement is happy, however, as well as hilariously funny. The uncle falls a victim to the charms of Jack's wife and, gallantly accepting the inevitable when he is informed of the true state of affairs, he turns his attention to the model whom he embraces in his enthusiasm. Ralph's wife is pacified too, after an effort—in fact, everybody catches the spirit of the occasion, and joins in the hilarity except the mother-in-law, around whom they all dance ring-o-rosey, to her complete discomfiture.

The little comedy is played in a spirit of boisterous fun and unctious good humor, and the complications follow one after the other in a perfect crescendo of laughter. The acting is especially good. The film should prove one of the most popular farcical subjects of the month.

THE GAME.—A story of love and modern business caught from that seething commercial maelstrom, the Chicago Board of Trade. A powerful dramatic story depicting in vivid and realistic style the game of frenzied finance.

Young Robert Randolph is the son of the senior member of the grain brokerage firm of Randolph & Mowbray, holding an important position as confidential secretary to his father and his father's partner. His close business association with Mowbray has brought him into contact with Ellen Mowbray, the junior partner's daughter, whom he has learned to love and is engaged to marry.

The elder Randolph is sojourning at a Southern health resort when he receives an urgent telegram from Mowbray advising him to return to Chicago immediately, as a big deal, in which a million is involved, offers them an opportunity to clean up a big fortune. Randolph knows of the contemplated deal and is skeptical. He wires an answer to the effect that Mowbray shall take no action until his arrival, warning him that if they lose it means utter ruin.

When he returns an argument takes place between the two partners, ending in a bitter wrangle, Randolph accusing Mowbray of recklessness, while Mowbray denounces Randolph as a coward. Robert Randolph is confident that his father is wrong and sides with Mowbray. The elder Randolph finally leaves in disgust, washing his hands of the matter

Randolph goes to his home in a highly nervous state of mind, denouncing his partner as a fool, and racking his brain for some method of saving his firm. A lucky thought comes to him. In the company's safe at the office are certain securities amounting to several hundreds of thousands of dollars. Should he remove the securities Mowbray would find it impossible to attempt the deal.

The older Randolph returns to the office at a late hour of the night, enters stealthily and opens the safe. The small inner compartment containing the securities is locked and to his dismay he finds that he has left his key at home. Determined to remove the securities, he pries the lock with a penknife, which he carelessly leaves on the floor at the safe.

Eager to be at the scene of the big conflict, young Randolph arrives at the office the next morning at an early hour and discovers the robbery. He is about to summon the police, when he finds his father's broken penknife on the floor. He recalls the dispute of the day before, of his father's agitation, but refuses to believe his father would fall to anything criminal.

He is in a quandary as what best to do when Mowbray enters. Mowbray is informed of the robbery and detectives are immediately summoned. Although Mowbray cautions silence among his clerks, it is not long before the news leaks out and the credit of the firm of Randolph & Mowbray is not worth a cent. They are completely crippled.

In the meantime the elder Randolph, the securities packed in a suitcase, is half resolved to fly the country, but his conscience refuses to admit the temptation. He watches the clock nervously and sighs relievedly as it approaches the hour when the big battle is supposed to take place.

Suddenly young Randolph enters. The old man starts nervously as the cold steel-blue eyes of his son turn from the suitcase and flash an accusation at him. The old man murmurs a feeble, hollow greeting, which the youth ignores. Instead he points to the suitcase and demands the return of the securities. The old man shakes his head vehemently, declaring his innocence. Young Randolph brings out the broken knife and the father drops into a chair, staggered at the accusation. Young Randolph opens the suitcase, brings out the securities and hurries out.

When he returns the securities to Mowbray, in an effort to shield his father, he takes the blame himself. Mowbray orders him out. Ellen enters and is bewildered, but refuses to believe young Randolph guilty. The young fellow asks one last favor—that he may go to the pit and endeavor to aid in winning the game. Mowbray reluctantly grants it, and an hour later, grasps his hand forgivingly when the battle is won.

A few minutes later the elder Randolph enters. He confesses his guilt and begs forgiveness. Mowbray grants it and takes him affectionately in his arms.

Having made their million the two old men resolve to quit the business, offering young Randolph their chairs. Young Randolph refuses at first, but is finally won over by his sweetheart who promises to be at his side in the thickest of all fights, to cheer him and guide him and make the game worth winning.

TELLTALE REFLECTIONS—Showing a weird invention, called hypnotic mirror, in action. Placed before anyone the polished surface reflects the actual thoughts within their minds. Its uses in the court room, the home and the school house are cleverly shown. When the mechanism tells a wife the truth about her husband, something commences.

THE PIGMY WORLD.—The uproariously laughable dream of a mother-in-law abused man. He finds himself among a race of Lilliputians no higher than his ankles. The trick photography is most surely very mystifying and interesting.

A PEACE AGITATOR.—Mr. Pax, excited by rumors of war, attempts to preach a doctrine of pacific methods. He gets into a great many bad scrapes, being beaten by the people to whom he attempts to bring calm. Eventually he dons armor and wears a miniature arsenal at all times.

THE RHYMSTER'S RUSE.—An hilarious comedy built upon the old superstition that thirteen people at the table are unlucky. The poet by cleverly securing a thirteenth member to the party makes it necessary to invite him.

HARLEQUIN'S NIGHTMARE.—A thrilling drama told to us as dreamed by the leading actor, Jack Pudding. Jack loves Columbine, as does Cassandre, a rich youth of the village. Pudding's dream shows a series of rapid events in which he kills and robs his rival, is married, his crime is discovered, he is arrested and executed. He is awakened at this point by a jocund friend and rejoices in the thought it was only a dream.

DORA.—Dramatized from the famous poem by Alfred, Lord Tennyson.

Scene I.—The first scene gives us a view of the dairy yard at the home of 'Squire Allen, a well-to-do farmer of the middle class, whose broad acres spread for miles about his comfortable farm house. In the foreground is Mary Morrison, the daughter of a neighboring laborer, employed as a dairy maid by Farmer Allen, busy at her work. Up behind her comes William, Farmer Allen's only child, a manly young fellow, well liked by all who know him. Throwing his arm around Mary he steals a kiss. Mary gently remonstrates with him and continues her work. Now she attempts to draw a bucket of water from the old sweep well but William takes the bucket from her hands. As she tries to continue washing the dairy cans, William takes the brush away from her and secures possession of her hand. Both are laughing at the mere pleasure of being together. William draws an engagement ring from his pocket and places it on Mary's finger, then holds the hand up for her admiration. Mary smiles softly and hides her blushing face in the safe shelter of his shoulder.

Scene II.—Back at the farm house we find Farmer Allen and his orphan niece Dora, who has been his housekeeper since the death of his wife. Farmer Allen has been reading but now he stops and after watching Dora, busy with her sewing, for a few minutes, lays down his paper and tells her of his plan that she and William marry. Dora drops her head shyly, but Farmer Allan lifts her chin and sees by her blushing face and downcast eyes that he will find no opposition to his plan here. Just then William returns from his visit to Mary at the dairy lot. Farmer Allan stops him and begins to tell him of his plan for the marriage. William refuses to do as his father wishes, and after telling of his love for Mary, calls her forward for a father's blessing. The old man is furious. He orders Mary off the place and gives his son the choice of giving her up or being disowned. William refuses to give up Mary. Farmer Allan orders him from his sight forever. Placing his arm around Mary, William leads her away. Farmer Allan stands watching them go, his face convulsed with passion, while Dora sinks into her chair, horror-stricken at what has happened.

Scene III.—It is now four years later. William's first act after being driven from home was to visit the parsonage over the hill with Mary. After a hard struggle, he finally succeeded in securing work in a nearby stone quarry, and for three years they have been living happily in a little cabin just beyond his father's farm. William is leaving for his day's work. He gives the baby to Mary and kisses her good-bye. With the baby on her shoulder Mary watches him go, and as he turns the distant corner she and the baby both wave him a final good-bye.

Scene IV.—Here is the quarry where William Allan works. At first it was his duty to help push up the incline the heavy cars of stone that fed the crushers, but upon the installation of cables for this heavy work his task was the placing of the charges of dynamite that blast out the rock from the hill. Allan stops for a moment to look at the car sliding up the cable and thinks of how often he and a dozen fellow workmen struggled and puffed up the incline with a less load than the one he just saw gliding up so easily. Here is Allan at his work. The foreman indicates where he wishes the blast placed and William commences his work. But scarce has he begun when a blinding crash sends the rocks hurling in the air. A premature blast! When the smoke has cleared away the men rush in to find Allan's lifeless form lying on the ground. A flying stone has struck him in the temple, killing him instantly. With uncovered heads they bend over him in silent pity.

Scene V.—At the little cabin home Mary is busy with her household duties when she bears someone approaching and turns to find the foreman of the quarry by her side. His white face tells her something has happened. She asks for William. Unable to break the sad news to her, he wrings his cap in silent sorrow. She demands to know what has happened. He tells her of the accident. She reels and staggers into the house. The foreman calls to the men carrying William's body and they carry it through the gate and up the steps into the little cabin where the desolate widow and fatherless baby are awaiting it.

Scene VI.—During the four years that have passed Dora has continued as her uncle's housekeeper, but they have been long, unhappy years, for she has not ceased to love William nor to mourn over the unhappy quarrel that drove him away from home. Farmer Allan comes around the corner of the house. He has aged greatly, although never by word or look has he shown to Dora that he misses the son he sent away. After a word to Dora he passes into the house. Dora sees approaching a neighbor who always brings them their mail from the little village post-office. She hastens down to the gate to meet him. The neighbor sees her approach and waves a letter at her. Pulling up his horse, he hands it to her with a pleasant word of greeting, then drives on. Returning to the house, Dora notices it is addressed to Farmer Allan, but recognizes the handwriting of Mary, William's widow. She calls Farmer Allan and gives it to him. Allan opens it and reads Mary's pathetic appeal for aid, not for herself, but for her baby, his grandchild. At the sight of her name Allan remembers all she has cost him, his face darkens, with a curse he tears the letter in two and throwing it upon the ground re-enters the house. Dora looks at the torn letter, then stealthily picks it up and reads it. Pity floods her face, and brushing away a tear she starts towards the house, determined to aid Mary if she can.

Scene VI.—Dora loses no time in carrying out her determination. She fills a generous basket with good things and starts to visit Mary in the little cabin just beyond the last of Farmer Allan's many fields. As she passes one of the cornfields she notices the hands busy cutting and shocking the ripening corn. Seeing Farmer Allan among them directing the work, she hurries by for fear he may inquire where she is going and forbid the visit. Arriving at the cabin, Dora finds Mary sad and worn, a resigned look on her face, patiently fanning the baby, fast asleep in a big rocking chair. At the sight of Dora, Mary rises, half antagonistic, for she feels that Dora is the cause of her trouble. But Dora, all gentleness, extends her hand and drawing the poor, tired girl to her, kisses her. Mary breaks down and sobs on Dora's shoulder, while Dora tries to cheer her up. Now she goes to the sleeping baby and tells Mary of her plan. She will take the baby and place it in the cornfield, and the sight of his baby grandchild will soften Farmer Allan's hard heart, he will relent and give them both a home. Mary is fearful of the result, but finally consents. Dora lifts up the sleeping baby, kisses it tenderly and with an encouraging smile back at the little mother goes through the gate, while Mary stands with hands clasped watching them depart, half fearing, half hoping.

Scene VIII.—Back to the cornfield Dora hurries with the baby. She finds Farmer Allan still busy with the hands. Down beside one of the shocks she places the baby, then hides in the standing corn to watch the result. Up the field comes Farmer Allan. He sees the baby, looks around for its guardian, and finding none, stops to watch the child, his face gradually softening from its stern lines. Now Dora comes from her retreat. Seeing her, Allan asks if she knows whose child this is. Fearfully she tells him it is William's. Allan's face hardens with anger and in a passion he turns on her and tells her she can go as William did. Dora pleads with him, not for herself, but for the child. She will go if he will take the child and give it the home it is entitled to. Farmer Allan hesitates. He feels the tug of his own offspring at his heartstrings. He tells Dora he will keep the child, but she must go. Sorrowfully Dora leaves.

Scene IX.—Mary is still anxiously waiting when Dora returns. Noticing the baby has been left behind, her face lights up, for she thinks the plan has been successful. But Dora is forced to tell of her failure and of her own disinheritance. But the boy is all right and has a home. At this Mary's mother love flames up. What! leave her boy to be brought up by that hard-hearted man. No, surely the Heavenly Father will show them some way by which they can live together. Off she starts for the farm, followed by Dora.

Scene X.—Meanwhile Farmer Allan has taken the baby to the house. Down on his knees in the yard with his grandson on his back, Farmer Allan's usually stern face is wreathed in a smile. The baby has won his heart. One of the servants in passing holds up his hands in amazement at the sight. Now across the yard hurry Mary and Dora intent on reclaiming the baby. They pause for a moment to watch the unusual sight, then Mary comes forward. The baby sees her and goes to her. The old man turns, his face grows stern again. But Mary, no more afraid of him, pours out all the bitterness of her heart to him and tells him neither Dora, the baby or herself will ever darken his door again. Allan listens in stern silence. As the three, Mary, Dora and the baby, move away, he seems to realize what their going means to him, how lonely will be his future. He steps forward, holds out his arm, then drops it, and just as they are about to leave calls, "Dora, Mary, come back." Dora comes quickly, but Mary hesitates, for she thinks of her years of suffering. But the old man calls again and the three are folded in his arms. His face is wreathed in undreamed-of happiness, for instead of the darkness of lonely solitude, he sees his path down the declining years brightened by the presence of a rollicking grandson and two loving daughters.

BRAVE WOMEN OF '76.—War with its horrors. Men with the lust of battle in their souls—the inspiration of the drum beat, the wild charges to victory—or death—something at least to give an impetus to the jaded toiler. But the wives and daughters—theirs the tear dimmed eye—the aching heart—the solitary hearth. To them be no less glory.

A little company has left a village for the front. The women are left alone. Word reaches the Captain that a party of Hessian cavalry anticipate a descent upon the place, and circumstances preventing his being there, he sends a message of warning. His wife and daughter quickly summon all the neighbor women and with guns and any implement handy they hasten to repel the foe.

Over a small stream is a bridge which they fire. The Hessians advance but thinking an ambuscade prepared for them depart with disorder. The women win the day and are marching home triumphantly, when to their surprise they overtake a regiment, which proves to be their own local company. The wives and sweethearts with characteristic disregard of military discipline lovingly embrace their own and the company is overjoyed at the reunion.

A LESSON IN PALMISTRY.—A young girl and her intended are on the outs. He wants a kiss, which she playfully refuses. He threatens to go and she says she doesn't care. He then leaves. Now she does what women do when they don't know what to do; she cries.

Just then her friend enters and, learning the cause of the tears, advises her to consult a palmist to find out if her intended really loves her. She then informs the intended that his sweetheart will consult a palmist and advises him to play the part of the palmist, which he decides to do. The ruse succeeds and all ends well.

LET BYGONES BE BYGONES.—A convict has just been released, after serving a long term for stealing. He receives his pay and, wandering along aimlessly, the thought presents itself that perhaps a drink would cheer him. Entering a saloon the merry crowd soon causes him to forget. He seats himself at a table where two gamblers invite him to a game and quickly clean him out.

Dragging himself along in a dazed condition he pauses in front of a church. The pastor, on his way home, takes him to his study to administer food and consolation. How ill he repays the pastor can be imagined when the old thievish instinct asserts itself and he quietly emerges from the place with the golden chalice. This he tries to dispose of to a couple of rustics, who, recognizing the piece, overpower him and take him back to the pastor, who promptly forgives him. Right then and there the ex-convict resolves forever after to lead an upright life.

Five years have passed. He is happily married and the father of a child which he adores. He has become a skilled mechanic, working faithfully at his trade. One of the farmers who knew of his former guilt never ceases to inform his employers of his past. He is dismissed and goes from one job to another, only to be denounced by the hardened accuser. His old benefactor, the pastor, becomes again his champion and, knowing his change of heart, speaks in his behalf to his employer. They investigate his present life, learn of his earnestness, of his honesty, of his home life and uprightness, and decide that he deserves a better fate, so the employer offers him a position for life.

FOR LOVE'S SWEET SAKE.—A rich young man, not having anything better to do, decides to play a trick on his sister. He takes the place of her coachman and calls for her at the opera. Unfortunately he mounts the wrong coach and his kiss is not appreciated when applied to a strange young lady. He is arrested but freed by the young lady who rather took a liking to the fresh coachman. He is engaged by her father but soon recognized by a friend of the young lady and his identity given away. The young man has fallen in love with the young heiress and therefore decides to hold on to his position. Imagine his embarrassment when his own sister comes for a visit and he is asked to serve in her presence. This is too much for him. Matters quickly come to a climax. The coachman is forgiven and the engagement which was intended for a month is made for life.

THE BLUE GARTER.—A young married man finds a blue garter and in a spirit of jest puts it in his pocket. His wife finds the garter and notwithstanding his explanation she believes him to be faithless. He is bound to get rid of the garter and puts it into the pocket of one of his friends. He in turn hangs it on the end of a cane carried by an elderly gentleman in conversation with a young lady. It is needless to say trouble starts at once.

So the garter wanders from one hand to another. A thief takes a hand in the game; he is pursued and to get rid of the garter he puts it in somebodys pocket. So the garter wanders until it reaches the first man again. The thief has been caught, is brought before the police lieutenant and there the mystery is solved: it is the lieutenant's sleeve holder which caused all the trouble.

FOUND IN A TAXI.—A young husband receives a bill for two hours' taxicab service rendered to his wife. He also receives from the driver a package containing a man's collar, shirt and other wearing apparel. At once he suspects that his wife has a lover. He chases after the cab and he certainly has a hot time to catch it.

After many funny and exciting incidents, he gives up the chase to go home and confront his wife. Imagine his surprise when his wife explains to him that the wearing apparel he found are his own and were to be used as samples for new ones to be presented to him on his birthday. Hubby's face is a study; he begs forgiveness, they embrace and peace reigns again in the family.

GEORGE MELIES.

A TUMULTUOUS ELOPEMENT.—Old man Darling arrives home and finds Young Spooner making love to his daughter Dollie. He is very much enraged and orders Spooner from the house. Later, while looking from the window, he spies Seldum Fed, a tramp, creeping through the open pantry window of the house and emerging with pie and a jug of cider. Darling rushes to the scene and whacks the tramp furiously. The tramp, however, regains his composure, and throws the pies in Darling's face and knocks him down. The tramp then runs away and the old man returns to the house in anger.

As soon as Darling makes his appearance, Spooner, who had returned, conceals himself. The old man rushes out of the house again with a gun in pursuit of the tramp. Spooner then outlines to the daughter a plan of elopement.

The old man is hot on the trail of the tramp. He soon discovers him and levels his gun. He shoots but misses fire. Seldum jumps over a stone wall quickly and then places his hat on a stick so that it extends just over the wall in sight of Darling. The old man shoots again, thinking it is the tramp, but hits the hat. The tramp then jumps out, knowing that the gun is now unloaded, and makes derisive gestures at the old man.

Next is seen Spooner making arrangements with a man to drive a two-seated "carry-all" to meet Dollie and drive with her to the Justice of the Peace to get married.

The driver later goes down the road expecting to meet Dollie, but he picks up Seldum, who had been dressed in a woman's clothes. The tramp, who had found a lot of clothes being burned in an empty lot and among them a fine silk hat, silk underwear and a good suit of clothes, picked these garments from the fire and threw his old rags therein. Soon he saw a wagon on which is marked "Smallpox Hospital" arriving at the spot where he found his clothes and more clothes were unloaded to be burned. Realizing that the garments he had taken were worn by someone having this dreadful disease, he quickly discarded same, but was left without any clothes. He had to walk along in a barrel until he came to a place where women's clothes were on a line and helped himself to the apparel which he is found wearing when picked up by the driver.

He is driven in this costume to the house of the Justice of the Peace, and, as young Spooner comes from the house, he grabs the tramp's bonnet. All are astounded. The tramp breaks loose and makes his escape with the old man after him. In the meantime Dollie rushes to the house and flies into Spooner's arms. She explains that she had walked across the field instead of riding. They are married and, as soon as the ceremony is concluded, the father returns with Seldum. He is astounded and infuriated, yet after much explanation the couple are forgiven and the father gives them his blessing, while the tramp is taken to the prison.

PATHE FRERES.

MALICIOUS RIVAL.—At an old-fasbioned inn, situated in a mountainous and snow-covered district, a handsome young artist, Jack Branton by name, takes up his abode for a few days, with the intention of making a few sketches. Not averse, however, from beguiling his leisure time as pleasantly as possible, the artist is soon engaged in a flirtation with the serving girl, whilst her sweetheart, a mountaineer, looks disgustedly on. As soon as Jack leaves the girl, the mountaineer protests, and treats the girl somewhat brutally. Jack comes back, sees him, and promptly turns him out of doors, before his loaded pistol.

The next day, Jack takes his easel out and is fixing it up, when three men, among whom Jack recognizes his enemy, set upon him, bind him to a tree and leave him. Snow has commenced to fall, and Jack quickly realizes the fate in store for him. Big flakes fall, slowly burying him beneath their accumulated weight. The blood freezes in his veins, and there seems no hope of his being rescued, when he hears voices—a band of boys just liberated from school are having a snowball fight. One of them perceives the upright figure, and the snowballs are turned against the snowman. A lucky throw causes a mass of snow to fall, revealing the head of Jack, and in a few minutes the youngsters break away the rest of the hardened snow and liberate him. Jack lingers, after the youngsters have run off, and then piles the snow up again. Behind this heap he hides, and presently the mountaineer returns to see the result of his villainous scheme. Jack steps out to confront him, and terrified before what he believes to be a spectre, the mountaineer takes a step backwards and falls over a precipice.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO.

THE WITCHES' CAVERN.—The story opens with the scene of Joe Montgomery and daughter, who, with a party of hunters, decides to make a trip to the far west and hunt deer. They leave the camp in charge of Joe's daughter and after they have gone about 200 yards they are all startled, for, as they stopped at the edge of the rapids, there stood Wild Harry, who always lived in the woods with his mother, who is known as the witch of the valley. The hunters try to speak to him but he runs away. He gets to one of the large pine trees and stops to see if they are still following him, and turning around he spies the hunter's camp. He is off at once to investigate. Wild Harry finds Montgomery's daughter alone, and when the girl sees this freak of nature she is nearly frightened to death. She is in terror and her first thought is of the gun alongside the tent, but Mad Harry is on her at once and after a tussle he takes the gun away from her and breaks it in two. He now sits down and enjoys the hunter's food. The girl sees a chance to write a note to her father:

"Daddy—A hideous monster, half man and half beast, has me in his power. I fear he means to kill me or carry me off; do not lose a moment. Find me."

Just then the girl sees a chance to get away. She runs through the woods hoping to find her father and the hunters for protection. Wild Harry at this moment, after eating the food, sees the girl has disappeared and catches a glimpse of her in

THE RESTORATION

A Doctor's Plan to Retrieve a Shattered Mind.

The world's history would contain many blank pages if it were not for the frequent occasions of misconstruction of intent. How many commendable deeds have been misconstrued and made the genesis of woe. Wrong impressions, converted ideas and hallucinations have formed the greater part of the causes of calamity, and there is no stronger ideological force than jealousy, and jealousy thrives most in the fagged brain. Henry Morley was suffering from what seemed to be an attack of hypochondriasis. He was low spirited, irresolute of purpose, and in fact on the verge of nervous collapse. His wife becomes solicitous and urges outdoor exercise, such as hunting, driving and the like. Mrs. Morley's cousin Alice is spending the Summer with them. Alice and her sweetheart Jack Dudley indulge in a lovers' quarrel, and Mrs. Morley volunteers to patch it up. Morley misconstrues the intent of their meeting, and entering the drawing-room in the evening after the couple had made up, sees Jack enfolding Alice in his arms. Thinking it his wife he sends Jack reeling to the floor with a blow of his whip handle. Realizing his mistake, his mind is unbalanced. Jack is only stunned and the doctor, in order to restore Morley's reason, has Jack and Alice re-enact the scene, with successful results.

THE LIGHT THAT CAME

Romance of a Blind Musician.

We, of course, assume that being most unfortunate over whose sight fate has drawn the mantle of darkness, and it is reasonable so to do, but Divine Providence is sure to compensate those so afflicted with ameliorating gifts that help them bear their ills with fortitude, and not only that, their powers of discernment are far more acute than those endowed with sight. There is the sight of the soul, which sees farther than the eyes. This may be called intuition; but whatever it may be, it is a rare gift. Carl Wagner was bereft of his sight and in order that he might earn a livelihood he learned music, and played violin for the dancing at many of the East Side halls. One of the affairs is attended by Grace, Vivian and Daisy, three sisters. Vivian and Daisy are rather pretty girls and are the center of attraction. Grace, however, has a disfiguring scar on her face, which makes her a wall-flower throughout the evening. At the close of the entertainment, she meets Carl, and a sympathy, which ripens to love, springs up. They become sweethearts, and later become engaged. A friend of the family declares his belief that Carl's sight can be restored, and Grace is moved to help him with her savings. On second thought she realizes that when he sees her as she is, she will lose his love. This she struggles against, and when the cure is effected, she finds her fears were groundless, for the heart has seen farther than the eyes could have.

the woods some distance away; he starts after her. The girl, by this time, in turning off the road, sees an old lady some distance away whom she runs to for protection. This old lady is the witch of the valley, who, of course, is very glad to give her protection. Wild Harry, who is the witch's son, finds the girl in his mother's care and now is happy. Mother and son decide to take the girl to their cavern, but the girl refuses to go and is forced by the witch and Wild Harry.

The hunters, on their return to the camp, not seeing the girl, know something is wrong and upon investigating the surroundings find the note. The father is deeply shocked and all start out at once to find Wild Harry. On their way they meet two mountaineers with their burros. They tell them of the girl's peril and one of the men had heard of the witch's cavern and says he will pilot them to it. On the way to the witch's cavern they find the girl's handkerchief.

In the meantime the witch has placed the girl in charge of Harry and she is out for her mountain stroll. The men see her by the big falls picking herbs and follow her to her cave. The witch enters her cabin and the men follow. Harry gives alarm, the witch and Harry grab the girl and start out another entrance of the cave. The men enter the cave but see no one and start out again. As they do they are stunned by an explosion that the witch sets off at times for her own protection. By this time the witch and Harry are out in the woods dragging the girl with them. Montgomery and the rest of the hunters manage to stagger outside and the fresh air relieves them enough to enable them to follow the witch and Harry, when Montgomery sees them dragging his daughter with them. Montgomery overtakes them and a fierce battle follows between Montgomery and Wild Harry. Wild Harry is fast overcoming the father but the other hunters are soon to the rescue and with a blow on the head knock Wild Harry unconscious. The story ends with the father securing his daughter and all the hunters safe and all return to the camp.

SEALED INSTRUCTIONS.—The scene is laid at the White House, the President's home. Looking down the broad avenue are seen two autos approaching it with great haste. One stops in front of the building and a man dressed in military clothes quickly ascends the broad steps.

He is shown into the President's private office. The President is seen handing him a letter which is of a very secret and important nature. He is warned to be extremely careful and deliver it with utmost speed.

Outside his machine is waiting. He notices another close by, into which a man jumps as he reaches his own. The man's queer actions arouse his suspicions and he returns to inform the President. The shades are withdrawn and the President gives him further instructions. He departs at once for his machine and starts off in great haste, not noticing the other machine in the rear. He is rather tired and decides to stop and have tea with his wife before completing his errand.

His pretty wife makes preparations for tea and while so engaged Colonel Bruce dozes into slumber. The wife's attention is attracted by a movement behind a curtain in the room and there stands an old lover of hers holding a revolver in his hands and at the same time a packet of worn love letters. He makes known in a few words that he desires to search the colonel or he will show him her ardent letters. She begs him not to, but of no avail. He steps quickly to the steaming cup of tea and drops a small something in it and again hides himself. The colonel awakes, drinks his tea, and dozes off again into a sound sleep. The villain steps quickly to him, searches his coat, removes the envelope, and, in his haste and excitement, takes the colonel's coat for his own. He dons it and is off with all haste.

The colonel is seen dreaming and a vision comes to him. He sees himself in a convict garb, and here enters an old servant and discovers his master in a daze. He suspects foul play. He lifts the tea cup from the table, scents the peculiar odor, and knows his master has been drugged. He awakens him and here the colonel regains his senses, rushes for his coat so that he may be on his journey, and discovers the other coat in its place. He is in a frenzy. He searches through every pocket and discovers an envelope: "A Lazarre, Room 8, 22 Dover St., City."

He dashes to his waiting machine and drives to the address. He bursts into the room and there sees his unknown enemy. His wife is hidden in the room. He gives one wild glance and discovers his paper on the table. He snatches it up and rushes from the room. He is gone but a minute when he rushes back again and discovers his wife on her knees pleading with the villain. She explains all to him. He sends his man for the police and has his enemy arrested. He takes his wife in his arms, forgives her and, after delivering the letter, returns to his home.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

FROM CABIN BOY TO KING.—The Golden Crown, a sailing vessel in the South Sea trade, is about to sail and there is no cabin boy aboard, the last one having run away from the brutality of the master and the mates. The ship is one of those floating hells now less common than twenty years ago, but still existent. A bright young newsie comes down the pier in the hope of disposing of his stock of papers and is asked if he wished to sail. He knows something of the reputation of the skipper and his bucko mates, and a smile and a shake of his head are his only reply. He seeks another part of the dock for a nap before the afternoon editions are out and some of the crew kidnap him and place him aboard. His independent spirit is constantly getting him into trouble with the domineering skipper and his bullying mates and a month or so later, when they have crossed the line and are sailing in southern waters, he has an encounter with the captain, while he is swabbing the deck. The captain's cuffs and curses are met with a blow from the mop and the bully's wrath boils over. The boy will not make the abject apology that the captain demands and, wild with rage, he summons the mates and with wild imprecations declares that he will force the lad to cry for mercy. He is dragged into the galley, where the mates hold him while the cook burns a skull upon his breast, the ghastly emblem being seared deeply into the flesh. Even this torture does not break the boy's spirit, nor does the heavy revolver that is pressed against his breast by the now insane captain. But a shot is merciful and will not appease the brutal skipper. The boy is forced to leap from the ship's rail to battle with the waves until exhaustion shall mercifully end his torment. With the salt water cruelly torturing the raw flesh of the burns, the boy gamely keeps afloat and is brought within reach of an island inhabited only by savages. They make him captive and drag him off to the temple, where are practiced the horrible rites of the Skull Worshipers, whose infernal customs are even more revolting than those of the head hunters. The high priest, his face whitened to suggest the skull which is the fetich of their religion, prepares to decapitate the lad and prepare his skull for its place on the horrid altar. Bravely the boy bares his breast for the death blow, but to his surprise the priest falls in worship before him. He has seen the emblem and a moment later the horde of savages are groveling in the dirt of the floor before their new king. By a curious freak of fate the Golden Crown is wrecked near the same coast and the captain and his mates, escaping on a raft, are captured by the Skull Worshipers and carried before the king. He refuses them succor and turns them away, but the appearance of a United States warship and the landing of a crew changes the complexion of affairs. The officer in charge takes the sailors before the king, who tells his story. The captain and the mates are sent to the ship under arrest and the boy is given a choice between remaining a king or being taken back home. Home is a more potent attraction, and, after planting the American flag and enjoining his subjects to be obedient and loyal to the new authority, the little king takes his farewell and is carried off to the ship that will take him back home. The story is fascinatingly told with just the proper dash of extravagance to give an added charm to the narrative. The ship pictures are taken aboard an actual ship and the scenes in the South Sea are fully as convincing. There is not a boy alive who will not want to see the picture, and his elders will share his appreciation of this unusual subject. It is a marked departure from the usual run of releases and a most happy inspiration on the part of author and producer.

THE RANCHMAN'S WIFE.—There is no more absorbing subject than the West, and in this production we show one of our very best efforts. The owner of a Western ranch comes upon the scene in time to see a half-breed abuse his horse. When punished for the act, the half-breed resents it, and, in consequence, is paid off and discharged from the ranch. The owner of the ranch then proceeds to the depot to meet his bride, and after they start for their home, the half-breed, who has watched them, quickly mounts a horse and rides away. He joins a band of men, plans to hold up the ranchman, and all go with him. They lie in waiting, and when the wagon drives up, surround it, pull both out, tie the man, send the horses off, and take the woman away with them. The wagon is seen by the boys, who are decorating the ranch in honor of the bride, and realizing there has been foul play, they start off in quest of their master, whom they find tied. After he is mounted on an extra horse, they start in the direction the band took. The ranchman's wife has in the meantime been locked in a shack, and when attempting to escape, the half-breed enters. She pleads with him in vain, but succeeds in getting possession of his gun. This he gets back from her by stratagem, and a hard struggle begins. Just at the critical moment the ranchman and his followers come upon the shack and batter down the door in time to save the woman. They return to their home, accompanied by the half-breed, who is tarred and feathered by the boys, hoisted on a rail and marched off with. The ranchman and his wife watch this, clasped in each other's arms.

ACTRESS AND CHILD.—A story of the father of a happy household, who becomes so enraptured with an actress that his home is almost broken up, when his little girl comes into prominence at the right time and brings him to his right senses. The way it is told on the screen gives it high rank as an interesting subject. Surrounded with a happy family, wife and child, the father meets an actress through a friend. He is invited to the rehearsal of a play in which she takes an important part, and eventually becomes enamored with her. Meetings between the two result and he often takes her to luncheon. At one of these dinner parties a fight occurs. While the father is having a good time his wife is at home, very unhappy, as she has noticed a change in him. It is while visiting the home of his charmer a vision comes before him and he sees his only child waiting at a window. This is a part of the picture that is exceedingly grand. Instantly he leaves and goes to his own home, where he finds the family have retired. The influence of the actress is evident the next morning. He quarrels with his wife and leaves the house, his little girl following until he reaches the home of his actress friend. He enters, and the little girl, concealing herself from view, continues to follow him. Fate is with her. The father quarrels with the actress, and at this juncture the little girl comes forward and leads him out of the house. Back they go to their own home, where the father tells his wife and all is forgiven. Length, 950 feet.

GREAT NORTHERN.

A MESSAGE TO NAPOLEON; or, An Episode in the Life of the Great Prisoner of Elba.—After the united powers of Europe had been successful in defeating Napoleon's vast armies, the great Emperor himself was taken prisoner and sent into exile to the Island of Elba, on the coast of Corsica. His loyal friends in France, however, would not rest, and were untiring in their efforts to liberate the Emperor from his prison. The first part of this film depicts a meeting of a few of these friends and supporters, who formulate a plan. A letter is written to Napoleon, explaining that a messenger will bring him all particulars and plans of a plot to liberate him. A young officer is elected to make the dangerous journey to Elba, to carry to Napoleon the message from his friends. But these friends did not count on the enemies which every great man has, and did not observe that one of them attended their eventful meeting. The traitor informs the police, whose assistance he obtains, and together they go in pursuit of the messenger. Tired and exhausted, the messenger finds rest for a night at a small inn on the road, but not long after his arrival there his two pursuers arrive also, and over a glass of wine discuss how they can best capture the messenger. The daughter of the innkeeper, a great admirer of Napoleon, overhears the discussion of the two men, and immediately warns the messenger, who has just sufficient time to ride away, hotly pursued by the enemies. Fortunately, he soon reaches a farm house on his way, and induces the farmer to give him other clothes. Hastily changing his dress, and with the assistance of the farmer, who shows the pursuers the wrong way, he manages to get to the frontier. He arrives safely at the coast, from which he is to take the boat to Elba. Before he lands on the coast of the island, his small craft is demolished by the waves, and he is compelled to swim through the foaming sea to his destination. But even here, on this lonely island, he is discovered by a sentry, who uses his rifle effectively, and with a bullet-wound in his shoulder the poor messenger turns back into the water, pretending to be killed. Swimming to a more secluded spot along the coast, he sees the figure of his beloved Emperor standing by the water, looking sadly in the direction of his country. Trembling with excitement, the brave messenger approaches Napoleon and delivers to him the message. Napoleon, deeply moved by the loyalty of his friends, thanks the messenger in kind words, and embraces him, to show his deep and sincere gratitude.

FILM IMPORT & TRADING CO.

BANDITS OF THE ATLES GORGES (Eclair).—The main action of this picture takes place in one of the mountain gorges of South Algeria. An attack is made upon travelers by a band of native plunderers, the Kayhles. The coach is looted, then burned to destroy all trace of the deed. There are many other exceptional scenes of an intensely interesting character. The release of the imprisoned travelers by unexpected means concludes a most striking series of events which take place amidst scenery of imposing grandeur and beauty.

LINES OF THE HAND (Raleigh & Robert).—Attracted by an advertisement in a newspaper that the celebrated palmist, Madam Sybil, can foretell the future of anybody, Mr. Greenhead decides to make an investment. After getting his money, the palmist gives him a mysterious box and he is instructed to gaze carefully through the crystals it contains. He cautiously places one of his "optics" at the point of view and proceeds to obtain some startling ideas as to his future welfare. A series of dissected lines, the basis of many illustrated phases of life, appear with extraordinary effect, assuming most grotesque forms as they build up in illustration of virtues good and bad, beauty and ugliness, riches and poverty, love conquests, etc. At the conclusion he leaves dissatisfied because he did not get his money's worth.

GOOD FOR EVIL (Itala).—With his daughter's welfare at heart. Antonio refuses his consent to her marriage with Vincent, whom he advises to continue working until he has saved sufficient money to keep a wife and family in comfort. The young lover is resolved to try his fortune abroad, so he takes leave from his sweetheart with regret and tears. He obtains work in the new country, but is dissatisfied with his lot and becomes enviable of the wealth of others.

One day he yields to temptation. He takes from the overseer's coat a pocketbook containing the wages for the men, and hurries the notes for safety. Another worker who had discovered the empty pocketbook is suspected and eventually convicted, while the real thief escapes and returns to the object of his affections, whom he marries. He starts another life, but his conscience pricks him severely and his cheerfulness gives way to misery.

One day some years later his little daughter, playing near a hay loft, is cut off from escape in a fire which is started as the result of the child and her playmates firing some paper in childish fun. To the rescue, however, comes a weather beaten man who risks his life and brings the little mite from the blazing building. The rescuer, in laying down the child, starts aback as he recognizes in the father the man whom he knew to have committed the theft of the money, and for which he himself had paid the penalty. Unable to establish his innocence, he had returned from prison a human wreck. He is mortified at the thought that he had unconsciously assisted his greatest enemy and refuses to accept the handshake of the man who had been instrumental in his ruin.

The father is finally forgiven and gives a home to the man whom he had wronged.

THE NECKLACE OF THE HOLY VIRGIN (Eclair).—Alphonse passionately loves the cigarette maker, Paquita, who is as capricious as she is beautiful. She delights to tease this persistent wooer. After many refusals to answer his all-important question, she consents to marry him, upon one condition. She demands that to prove his love for her, he should take from the neck of the Holy Virgin the precious necklace and bring it to her. The suggestion almost stupefies Alphonse, and he cannot bring himself to the perpetration of the sacrilegious act. But one day his moral courage forsakes him, and silently making his way to the revered image he despoils it and departs with the necklace to his adored Paquita. He is dumbfounded, however, when she rejects the proffered piece of jewelry, telling him it was only a passing fancy, and chiding him for being so simple a fellow. She leaves him, a disheartened object of her derision, and coquette that she is, feels a keen sense of delight in testing her lover, for whom in reality she has an affection. Alphonse, thinking now only of the awful deed he has committed, and its uselessness, determines to replace the necklace. With an awful sensation, heightened by the sacred stillness of the church through which he creeps, he approaches the holy image and clambers upon the pedestal, but just as he is about to fasten the necklace in its place he loses his balance. Clutching the figure in his attempt to save himself from falling, he brings it with him to the marble pavement and it breaks into a hundred pieces. He is also killed by the fall. As the light of the moon steals through the church casements, Paquita, repenting of her foolishness, enters the sacred edifice, and discovers the lifeless body of her lover. Her heart is touched and she stoops down and sheds useless tears upon the brow of her lover who had made so terrible a sacrifice.

BERTHA'S BIRTHDAY (Raleigh & Robert).—The love affairs of the pretty "tomboy" Bertha have commenced in her early years. Her birthday serves as an opportune moment for her numerous admirers to bring her presents, but before she is able to arrange suitable times and rendezvous for the presentations, the eagle eye of her austere father espies upon the floor one of her billet doux which she has inadvertently dropped. The audacity of the baker's boy in addressing his daughter enrages him considerably, and he instantly orders his daughter to prepare and depart with him to a college where she will be placed under stricter supervision. In the seclusion of her own room she proceeds with packing her large basket-trunk, but is interrupted by the appearance of the baker's boy, the butcher's boy, the milk boy, and others who have lost their hearts to the fair young maid. Each comes laden with a gift in honor of her birthday. Suddenly her parent's steps are heard, and in consternation she bundles all the love-sick youths into the basket-trunk and turns the lock upon them. Papa, impatient and annoyed, appears and commands her departure. The trunk is unceremoniously handled by the baggage porters. The arrival of Bertha and the trunk in the dormitory of the college is the occasion of much excitement, for upon the release of the lid the collection of Bertha's helpless followers tumble out for the edification of the pupils. Fun galore follows, but amidst a feast upon ginger pop and toothsome cakes, the hilarity of the party is suddenly stopped by the appearance of the mistress, who orders the return of Bertha and her boys.

THE FARMER'S SON (Itala).—The son of an old farmer had just returned from the military school, where he had been learning the tactics of war. He arrives home and is affectionately greeted by his parents. He meets the daughter of the general and immediately falls in love with her.

The next scene shows the lovers roaming through the gardens, and he learns for the first time that she returns his affection. The next evening, as he meets the young lady at the rendezvous, two burglars break open the general's safe. As they make their escape they are followed by the farmer's son, who had heard the noise. The burglars escape, but the young man is left with the booty which they had dropped. Soon the general, who also has been disturbed from his slumbers, arrives on the scene and finds the farmer's son in possession of the stolen goods. He is accused of the deed. The young man denies that he is guilty, but offers no other explanations for his presence on the grounds. Fortunately he is cleared and his innocence is established by the fact that a hat belonging to one of the burglars is found. Explanations and apologies are then in order, and the general gives his consent to the marriage of his daughter to the farmer's son.

LOGGING IN THE ITALIAN ALPS (Ambrosio).—Through some of the most delightfully picturesque parts of Cadore, in the Italian Alps, this work of logging is carried on to the accompaniment of a series of exciting, almost breath-holding incidents.

The courage and skill of the plucky navigators as they rise and fall with the movements of the resilient-like log rafts on the breast of the mighty torrents, is something indeed to inspire the spectator with more than ordinary pleasure. Carried onward at a great pace by the force of the rapids and waterfalls, huge collections of logs are finally landed at the sawmills.

Moving Picture Managers

Those who are looking for "Jammed Houses" to write us for terms on Military Tournament films—the kind of Feature Films you are always looking for—The kind that "Get the Money"—The kind you have heard of—All exhibitors wild over it—Repeat Bookings are the rule—There's a reason—Over 4,000 soldiers in action—Over 3,000 feet of film. Ten cents admission is the usual price—Receipts average daily from $45.00 to $75.00. Flashy advertising, samples sent on request. Tell us your seating capacity; if your exchange won't serve you, we will, right out of the can. Write—Get Busy.

A GREAT MODERN DRAMA

THE GAME

A Story of the Chicago Board of Trade

Length, Approx., 985 Feet

A story of love and modern business caught from that seething commercial maelstrom, the Chicago Board of Trade. A powerful dramatic story depicting in vivid and realistic style the game of frenzied finance.

In accordance with our announcement of last week, the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, beginning with the release of November 17, will release two full reels of film each week. The Wednesday release will be devoted entirely to high-class Comedy subjects, the Saturday release will be devoted almost exclusively to Stirring Western subjects.

Moving Pictures of the

Johnson-Ketchel Contest

Taken at Colma, California, Oct. 16th, 1909

The Most Sensational Contest of the Age—For the World's Heavy Weight Championship

Wonderful reproduction of every incident and blow in the most exciting contest of modern times. Life-sized and as clear as crystal. The best moving pictures ever taken at a great public event. Every face in the tremendous throng in the open air arena recognizable. Showing the champion JOHNSON knocked down, followed by the dramatic and sensational climax, KNOCKOUT of KETCHEL. The most intensely nerve tingling Moving Photographs ever flashed on a canvas.

By special arrangement with MR. J. W. COFFROTH, who controls the films

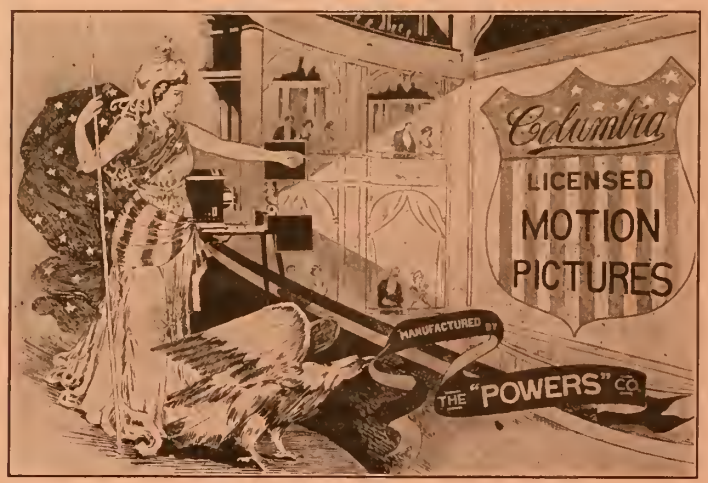
"A RED MAN'S LOVE"

Approximate Length, 830 Feet. Code: Maid

An Indian Story during the early settlement of the West, while the bow and arrow were still in use.

Scene effects alone are not received with favor by the Exhibitor or Audience, but when used as a setting surrounding a good story with action, they are appreciated by both.



This condition exists in the above picture, furthermore the costumes are the real goods —genuine Indian garb of the period—and it's a pity the camera is not capable of depicting them in all the glory of color and detail.

A Red Man's Love for the Settler's Daughter—His renunciation of his tribe—His final sacrifice, have been worked up with historical accuracy. The theme is new and an agreeable relief from the modern Wild West Cowboy stories. A picture that women and children can view without fear or apathy.

I Expose

A Rotten Secret

There is a secret agreement among certain film exchanges, whereby their customers are penalized for transferring their business from one film renter to another. It is known as "the ten per cent. penalty," and a worse thing for exhibitors was never devised. Suppose you grow tired of the film service you are getting from some certain licensed exchange. You switch your business to another licensed exchange. The second exchange must communicate with the first and find out how much you were paying per week for service. Suppose you were paying $40.00. Before the second exchange can accept your business it must add 10 per cent. to the price you were paying the first exchange. In other words, the price would go up to $44.00 instead of $40.00. The object of this is so self evident that it would sink through the think tank of an addle pated wooden Indian. It is a hold-up, pure and simple. How long, Mr. Exhibitor, how long are you going to sit back and let the trust and its minions use you for an easy mark? You have an inalienable right to transact your business with whomsoever you will, without paying a penalty to anybody on God's green footstool. Assert your rights? Come into the Independent fold! You'll get better films now, better service, better treatment and breathe more freely. And I'll protect you against all the imaginary dangers that you think are hiding around the corner waiting to bat you on the box office. My independent films are bringing delight to the heart and money to the pocket of every one of my customers, and they'll do the same for you. Write!

Your audience will rock with laughter when you show my Fifth "IMP" Release, entitled

"LEVITSKY SEES THE PARADE"

Levitsky and his wife and some friends go to see the big Parade. They sweep the crowds aside to get a good location. They see WILBUR WRIGHT FLYING IN HIS AEROPLANE! (and it's a corking good picture of the world's record flight!) They see A REAL BALLOON RACE, then one or two snatches of the Hudson-Fulton Parade. As a final and ludicrously funny scene, Levitsky has a dream. He sees the West Point Cadets, Scotch Highlanders, and Ancient Order of Hibernians, but they all look like regular George Sidney Hebrews to Levitsky in his dream. It's terribly, terribly funny, and it's going to make a big hit with everybody. I laughed my spectacles off from the very start to the silly wind-up. Even without the humor it would be a cracking good show, because it gives the airship and balloon scenes in great shape. Tell your exchange you don't want anyone to beat you to this. For everybody will be saying, "Oh, say, have you seen Levitsky?" This film will be

VITAGRAPH FILMS

THE FILMS OF "QUALITY"

Tuesday, November 16th

Benedict Arnold

Another really notable historical subject, many of the scenes of which were photographed on the spots made famous by the Arnold-Andre incident. The historical narrative is closely adhered to, but the story possesses all the compelling interest of romance. Splendid photography, spirited acting and charming scenery combine to make an out-of-the-ordinary film. Approx. length, 685 feet.

Indian Basket Making

Passmaquoddy Indians making the baskets for which they are famous. Nominally an "industrial" release, the subject possesses strong pictorial value, and the presence of several chubby little papooses adds to the human interest of the picture. Approx. length, 245 feet.

Saturday, November 20th

The Sins of the Fathers

A stirring tale of the Kentucky feud belt in which the feud is carried into the second generation and becomes provocative of strongly dramatic situations and charming love scenes. The action is unusually effective, and the stirring events follow each other with a rapidity that does not permit the interest to flag for an instant. Possessing a happy ending, the outcome is in doubt to the very last foot of the picture. Approx. length, 985 feet.

Editorial.

"Linked Sweetness Long Drawn Out."

"Bit disconnected, isn't it?" said an official of a moving picture theater to us one day this week when we sat in our usual seat, looking at the pictures for the purpose of writing our comments. This week, as we frequently do, we have spent many consecutive hours in studying the pictures and their effects upon an audience. This is a most important point with us, as we have mentioned before. We endeavor, in the interests of manufacturers and in the interests of moving picture theater exhibitors at a distance who are guided by our opinions in the matter of these pictures, first of all, to give our purely personal opinion, which that of a critical writer necessarily must be, plus that of the sense of the audience of which we happen to form one. This, we think, is a fair and rational way of arriving at an opinion of a picture for publication.

The remark quoted to us was made in reference to one of this week's releases. Oddly enough, the remark also applies to other releases that have been made in the last few days. We pride ourselves on being able to seize upon the salient points of a moving picture story as it is unfolded on the screen, as quickly as anybody. But for the life of us, during the last few days, we have been occasionally puzzled at, and have found ourselves evincing lack of interest in what is being shown, whilst in other cases we have been downright unable to know exactly what the shadowy characters on the screen were doing, and why they were doing it. In other words, many recent stories are not only obscure, but they are, to quote our friendly interlocutor, "a bit disconnected."

Nor were we alone in noticing this. The stories of the films which we print every week are alright, but, frankly, in the instances which we have in mind the pictures on the screen seemed to bear little or no relation to the stories that are printed. In other words, the producers have failed to get the narrative story over the footlights.

Now, we think that the responsible manufacturers should be made aware of this fact and that the persons in their employment should also be made aware of it. Generally speaking, the complaint we have to make is that the stories, or rather the pictures, are not, in technical parlance, playing so closely together as they should. They are too long drawn out. They are "disconnected." They are lacking in real dramatic action. The result is, audiences are receiving them in stony silence.

We know our moving picture audience. We know its moods; we know almost by instinct when a moving picture film starts if the audience is going to applaud and when it is going to applaud; we know, too, that if it does not applaud there must be some very strong reason for its silence. Moving picture audiences just now are singularly silent. We may have struck a streak of unmovable subjects; that remains to be seen. But there is the fact, and the fact is so depressingly frequent that we specifically go the length of bringing it before the attention of responsible manufacturers.

At the end of one of our long sittings in a moving picture theater this week a foreign-made film (licensed) began to appear. "Ah!" said a man seated on our right, "French films are always good, aren't they?" Yet, like ourselves, the same man had sat in silence through more than an hour of moving picture film, without uttering a word of commendation or applause.

All those mostly concerned please note these reflections upon the floor of a crowded but disappointed moving picture theater!!

The Flowing Tide.

An eminent European statesman, who fought for years in the cold shade of opposition and neglect, coined a phrase indicative of what in his mind was a return of popular sentiment in his favor. He said the flowing tide was with him. Ever since then the phrase "the flowing tide" has been taken to mean the progress of a movement bound, sooner or later, to effect wonderful changes in some branch of the world's doings.

"The flowing tide" is with the moving picture, or to express ourselves more clearly, the moving picture is on top of the tide of increasing public favor. Several times lately we have in these pages alluded to the theatricalization of the moving picture. Last week we described how one theatrical impresario had taken hold of the game in the accepted theatrical manner. Then, again, we have more than once ventured to hint that the moving picture theater was seriously threatening the pre-eminence of the ordinary theater in public favor, and indeed, bids fair to jeopardize that pre-eminence. In other words to take the lead. We have pointed out that here in New York City it was inevitable sooner or later that Broadway would have its specially erected moving picture theater. And Broadway has.

Now this is a very important sign of the times. But there are others. Only this week we saw on the billboards an announcement that the Colonial Theater, New York City, is adopting the moving picture as its staple entertainment. The other morning when taking our walks near Central Park yet another sign of the times was made palpable to us. Nothing more nor less than that the well-known Circle Theater, at Columbus Circle, one of the most prominent spots in the city of New York, is also a moving picture house, under the direction of W. J. Ganes. We pointed out months ago that the conversion of many of New York's theaters to the moving picture was inevitable and here we have the fait accompli. These, as we have said before, are signs of the times which mark the progress of the moving picture in public favor. They also in our opinion indicate the accounting fact, which is, that the ordinary theater and the vaudeville house do not possess the magnetism for the entertainment seeking public that they once did. Into the causes of this state of conditions it is hardly the business of a moving picture paper to inquire. They do not concern us. The fact alone is sufficient; and that it is a fact we have ascertained for ourselves by inquiry amongst those best qualified to give the information.

This rapid displacement of the old theatrical entertainment by the moving picture entertainment is worthy of careful pondering by all interested; especially by those whose duty it is to organize and present moving picture entertainments to the public. It is evident that the public want moving pictures. It is very doubtful if they want vaudeville allied with them. This is a fact we have pointed out over and over again and moreover it is a fact as to the existence of which we have always satisfied ourselves by personal inquiry. The moving picture is quite capable of satisfying the requirements of the public by itself without the assistance of inferior vaudeville. It is so in continental Europe and in the middle West, so, why not here in the East? We have used the phrase "the theatricalization of the moving picture." "Theatricalization" is an ugly word which we are sorry to have to plead guilty to having coined: still it expresses our meaning. And our meaning is this: that the time is ripe for handling, by everybody concerned, the moving picture in just as large, comprehensive, and grandiose a manner as the largest theatricaal enterprises. "Nero," "Rigoletto," "The Prodigal Son," to take the names of some very notable recent releases, surely deserve as much consideration in their presentation to the public as they did in their preparation in the studio or the moving picture making arena.

An American School of Moving Picture Drama.

A friend who is largely interested in moving picture production draws our attention to a striking fact in connection with the attitude of moving picture audiences towards the photographs shown. It is this: That the most popular subjects with those audiences are those which deal with Indian or Wild West themes. He points out that the audiences are largely composed of young people and he has ascertained by inquiry at moving picture theaters that these young people show preference for the subjects named. Independently of this we perceive, in our own experience, that these subjects are popular and that such themes as "Hiawatha," Indian dramas and Wild West plays commend themselves to manufacturers, producers, and audiences alike.

In this respect, therefore, we seem to see evidence of the foundation of an American moving picture drama; something around which sentiment clings just as it does in other countries. Sentiment is always strong where national life and character or history form the themes of pictorial or literary treatment. Here the question arises: Is there a national literature upon which film producers can draw with certainty and success? You have, of course, these Indian and Wild West subjects, as to which, perhaps, except in rare cases, the fullest justice is not always shown. But even so, these pictures form but a very small proportion of the pictures produced by American film manufacturers who too frequently, in our opinion, go abroad for their themes. For example: Comparatively few pictures dealing with the Revolutionary War are shown. Then, again, it is probable that the Civil War era has by no means been exhausted. The earlier period referred to is rich in the makings of history, a fact of which the average producer, or may be the average scenario writer, seems to be somewhat ignorant.

On this occasion we are more concerned with the more popular sources of American subjects than with history. How rarely do we see a high class American novel dramatized in moving picture form! We write under correction, but we are very doubtful if the beautiful books of Nathaniel Hawthorne, one of the most fascinationg American writers who ever lived, have been turned to account in moving pictures. Mention of the Scarlet Letter; The Blithedale Romance; Transformation; Mosses From an Old Manse, and others, will suffice to convince an intelligent producer or writer that there is a great field open for moving picture plays in the Hawthorne pages. Mark Twain has done duty on the stage and he, we think, is the only important American writer who has.

Then you have Mayne Reid, Fennimore Cooper, Artemus Ward, Judge Habberton, Max Adeler, W. D. Howells, Henry James, James Russell Lowell, Henry W. Longfellow (who by the way wrote a great many things besides "Hiawatha"). These writers are classical, but there are a whole crowd of moderns such as Winston Churchill, Marion Crawford, Mrs. Margaret Deland and others to draw from. Many of these people would no doubt be willing to trade the copyrights of their books to moving picture publishers.

We are only touching the fringe of an important matter which has been brought to our mind in reading through the stories of the films that are sent out by the manufacturers week by week. These are not American enough to suit our ideas. We do not want to see all American themes illustrated on the moving picture stage. That would be absurd, while there are so many of the world's masterpieces waiting for representation. But we do put in a plea for the creation of an American moving picture drama and we point out that the material lies ready to hand for adaptation by scenario writers and producers.

The Alliance.

Since the publication of our last week's article on the Alliance, we have been glad to learn that our attitude towards that body has met with the approval of those most concerned. These men were amongst those who, when we severely criticised the weak points of the Alliance at its foundation, rather resented the attitude of the World, but they have since agreed that our criticisms were just and to the point. That those criticisms were urgently called for is proved by the action of the Alliance committee itself, who have carried out our recommendation in lopping off many undesirables, and in other respects getting down to a business-like way of administering the affairs of the Alliance.

It has been pointed out that time is necessary before this organization can be properly perfected. Time, it is also pointed out, was taken to launch the Patents Company as a complete scheme. We agree. The Patents Company was an evolution. It had to shed its undesirables, but it went about the business in a business-like way. And when it started last January, not even its bitterest enemy could say that it had allied itself with any objectionable elements. The elements comprising the Patents Company are straightforward business men and that is why we presume the Patents Company has kept together so well.

All that we desire in respect to the Alliance, therefore, is that if the example of the Patents Company is to be followed it should be followed in detail as well as generally. If it does that, and the influence of the Alliance in our opinion makes for the betterment of the moving picture business, then the Alliance will find it no warmer supporter than THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. Certainly it has seemed to us from the report of the last meeting, which we printed and commented upon in our last week's paper, that an excellent start has been made in the work of organization, and in lining up the Independent manufacturers and making a solid front to the exhibitor. For the exhibitor, after all, is a most important factor in the situation. The Alliance people aim to control 40 per cent. of the moving picture business in this country. They are laying themselves out, therefore, to cover a wide field. To do it successfully they must have a perfect organization, and they must make and sell high class films. Will they do this? That is a question which time only can answer.

Another question of the moment is whether separate existence for a manufacturer or a renter is possible outside of either the Motion Picture Patents Company or the Alliance. This is a question to which only a conjectural answer can be given. One thing, however, is tolerably clear, namely, that many of the foreign manufacturers are disposed to ignore all existing organizations and start their own agencies. They cannot get into the Motion Picture Patents Company, they do not see the utility of joining the Alliance. They claim absolute Independence. Again there is at least one large importing company which is indifferent to the Alliance at present. How long this will continue is also a matter of conjecture.

It would, of course, be a good thing if the Alliance were really an important factor in the situation, and actually secured control of the Independent side of matters. We mean aan Alliance working along the lines such as we have outlined above. Probably, as time progresses, and the Alliance strengthens, it will be to the interest of all Independent factions to line up with the main body; in that case we should have something like unity on the opposing sides. At present there is not.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

CHAPTER XXV.
DECORATION.

The atrocities which have been perpetrated in the name of "decoration" in five-cent theaters are legion. Too many owners, in erecting and finishing their fronts, seem to have in mind only something flashy to catch the eye, rather than something dignified and beautiful. Color "schemes" that shout louder than the most leather-lunged barker are of common—far too common—occurrence. Only once in a while is the eye pleased with a really tasty, beautiful five-cent theater front. The same is true in a somewhat modified form of the interior decorations. It should be remembered that the various colors have a sub-conscious but very decided effect on the human mind. Usually we are not aware of this effect, but it is there, just the same. It should also be known and remembered that the tawdry front that would look swell in an amusement park or on a midway is much out of place on a business street, where it will be surrounded by staid, sober business houses. It has no place there and looks garish, cheap and ugly. Interior decorations which take no account of the "eternal fitness of things," which abound in color absurdities and crudities, are, to say the least, distasteful and far from pleasing. In the matter of a front one must be, of course, guided largely by the architectural possibilities or impossibilities of the building. In general it may be said that for a front of moderate size there is no material capable of producing so rich, dignified and quietly beautiful an effect as high-grade wood; but it must be fashioned by a real carpenter, not a "wood butcher," and must be finished by a real painter, not a "dauber." Sheet metal makes a fairly handsome front, provided the design be very carefully selected and very carefully put in place; but crude workmanship in placing the metal will utterly ruin the effect. Stucco may also be employed with excellent effect, but must not be used within seven or eight feet of the floor, since it is soft enough to be easily scratched, and this possible form of vandalism is quickly discovered by the ever-present small (and large) boy. Figures, human or otherwise, should be used very sparingly, if at all. One in the center, over the arch, or one at either side, as nearly life-size as possible, may add somewhat to the appearance, but they are very easily broken. As a rule, figures should only be used on fronts permitting of their being life-size without being out of proportion. If columns or cornices are used, by all means model them from one of the established architectural orders, such as Corinthian, Doric, etc., etc. Modern architects and designers have never been able to improve in any degree on these designs emanating from the old masters of bygone centuries, and it is not at all likely that your carpenter, or you yourself, will be able to. Their effect when copied in comparative miniature is most excellent. The majority of five-cent theater fronts have an arch, and where this form of construction is properly designed and carried out the effect is excellent. But whatever the general scheme, the details must be symmetrical and proportionate to appear well. Many an otherwise handsome front is spoiled by too small a ticket office set in the back arcade wall. The ticket office, doors, windows, etc., must be in proper proportion to look well. Perhaps the most common error is the disproportionately small ticket office set in the wall. One sees it so very often. The arcade should be as deep as you can make it without sacrificing too much seating room. It affords shelter to waiting patrons on stormy nights and sunny afternoons. It looks exceedingly well with added depth and is suggestive of retirement from the street. It affords space for posters, photograph frames and other forms of advertisement, and when well lighted looks both beautiful and cheerful at night—assuming, of course, it is properly made and finished. The arcade floor should be sloped to the walk where the building floor is above it. A step is not nearly so desirable as a slope. There is no color looks so well on a theater front as a cream enamel. This is a quietly beautiful tint and must be properly applied over good woodwork to look well. Enamel tints trimmed with white look well also, and to these colors a little gilt may be added, but not too much. To look best, the gloss should be killed just a little with turpentine. Such a front will require far less light for equal brilliancy than will one finished in darker colors. Where sheet metal is used (pressed metal, I mean), considerable thought should be devoted to its painting. Too many colors will not look well. Dark colors are not good for any theater front. The writer believes two carefully selected colors are enough for any ordinary front and that in nine cases out of ten two shades of cream, with some gilt and white, will be the wisest possible selection.

To enter into detailed instructions for erecting or planning fronts would be an almost endless task, since width, height, depth of arcade, and surroundings, each have a decided effect on the general result and must be taken into consideration in each individual case. This I may say, however: Be your front large or small, amid poor or wealthy surroundings, stick to a comparatively plain scheme of constructive decoration, along the lines of some standard architectural order, if the front be not arched. Be sure that the ticket office, windows, etc., are in proper proportion as to size. Avoid "loud," garish colors.

Polished brass gratings always look well on the ticket office windows, and the windows should invariably be of plate glass, with plate glass money shelf. As to lights on the front, aside from expense of operation, there can scarcely be too brilliant an illumination within reasonable limits. Colored lights, however, seldom look well on a front. Somehow they seem to suggest cheapness and tawdryness. One exception to this is that a row of light green globes look well around the top of the ticket office if the front is painted white; but there should not be too many of them. Especially should there be brilliant illumination if the house is to cater to "transient." The "regular" knows what is inside, and the front does not cut so much figure with him, but the "transient" is largely influenced to enter or pass by, by the appearance of the front. No set rule can be given for number or location of front lights. I would suggest to the man contemplating the installation of a house that he visit a large city (if he be in a small one) and carefully study the fronts and interiors of several of the better houses. It will pay him well to do so. He probably would not wish to copy any one house in detail, but from all he should be able to get ideas enabling him to plan a thoroughly charming and satisfactory house. His trip could scarcely fail to be a good investment.

As regards interior decorations, the possible pleasing combinations are many, ranging from very cheap to as expensive as you may desire. White is, as a rule, unsuitable for interior decoration, but light buffs are excellent and light grays are occasionally used. Where paints are used, they should be almost or quite "flat." That is to say, they should have little or no gloss. This is accomplished by using plenty of turpentine in mixing the paint. You should consider the effect of colors on the human mind, for the effect is there, though sub-conscious. Red is exciting, yellow is cheerful, green is soothing, while blues are depressing to the senses, though the latter have some very beautiful tints. Unless white finish plaster is in perfect condition, it is not advisable to apply paint to it directly. It should first be covered with plain burlap and the paint applied to that. The added effect is well worth the money, even though the plaster be in good condition. Well-finished rough plaster, however, finishes most excellently with paint. Rich shades of tinting colors or ingrain papers may be used with excellent effect, provided the walls be carefully prepared, but every plaster crack will show in either of them. But whatever you use, the walls and ceiling should be blocked out in panels, and in store-room theaters it is well to have a moderately dark colored dado from four to six feet high. In a theater to be used for moving pictures alone it is well to adopt a somewhat darker color scheme than in one to be used for a combination show. But the colors should not be dark enough to be gloomy or have a depressing effect on the audience. You will notice that in this matter I am dealing largely in generalities. I believe my friends, the readers, will appreciate the fact that the subject is so wide and has such a multitude of angles that it is practically impossible to go into detail. Certain things I can point out to you and other things you must decide for yourself according to the needs of your own house. Let your watchword in decoration be cheerful colors combined so as not to violate the artistic sense, pretty panel designs and plenty of well-distributed lights. Study these matters closely before attempting to decorate your house or have it decorated. It is hardly within the range of possibility that the ordinary man can intelligently decide such matters in the best way without considerable study, nor is it likely the ordinary house decorator will produce the best possible effect if left to himself. Bear this fact in mind: The best effect cannot be produced by the use of prepared paints. Use white lead mixed and tinted to suit, if you want the best results.

MAN-ABOUT-TOWN SEES A BROOKLYN SHOW.

I wandered across the Bridge last week and came across a moving picture theater in Brooklyn, with the name of "The Hanover." This theater is situated on Fulton street, one of the main thoroughfares of the downtown section of Brooklyn. It was formerly called the "Cameraphone," showing at that time talking pictures. This kind of entertainment did not prove to be a drawing card for the inhabitants of the vicinity, so it was abolished, and silent motion pictures were put on, with illustrated songs. Although this particular theater is located on the main thoroughfare, it does not seem to be coining much money, although the theaters there are not so close together as they are on Fourteenth street, or any other main thoroughfare of New York City. The nearest picture theater to the Hanover is about half a mile away.

The films shown were a Pathe, Vitagraph, Gaumont, Lubin, and two other old films with no titles. The Vitagraph and Pathe films were applauded, and so was a comedy from the Gaumont Company. These films were not of recent release, some of them being so full of rainstorms that the actors and actresses could hardly be distinguished. As for the song slides, only one set was shown, and this was as old as the hills. Notwithstanding its age, the audience joined in the chorus.

The Hanover will hold quite a large number of people. The admission fee is 10 cents. The attendant is courteous, the place neatly kept and cleaned, and there is no reason why the house should not be well patronized, if the entertainments were more up-to-date. The exterior appearance is so clean that a millionaire should not be ashamed to "fork" out of his pocket the admission price. The interior is also nicely kept.

The audience was scattered and composed mostly of men, with a fair sprinkling of women and children. The piano player gave some nice music, but it was unsuitable for the pictures shown. We are sure that if the management of the Hanover Theater would give more up-to-date picture and song slides, it would be one of the best paying houses in that section of Brooklyn, because, as we have said, although it is on the wrong side of the street, it is situated on a main thoroughfare.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

Public Interest in Film Actors.

Up-to-date moving picture places have adopted the ancient custom of regular play houses in placing in the lobbies of the theater large frames containing photographs of the leading people in various film subjects. It is making quite a hit and the film manufacturers are being besieged for photographs. The patrons of the picture houses have at last become convinced that the pictures are made from posing by regular actors and actresses and that they are reproductions of regular performers. This has led to the bringing forward of personal identity of the people engaged in the productions. Regular patrons of the houses have their favorites and are quick to recognize them on the screen. It is no unusual thing to see these people applaud as their respective favorites make their first entrance in a picture. This is especially the case with the hero-worshiping girls and women. The boys are also in line. The men have not become worked up to the pitch yet, but I am told by a manufacturer that many letters are received from men asking the names and addresses of women taking parts in the pictures and they do not shield the purpose for which the information is asked. At the same time it is stated that the inquiries are very respectfully made and the writers evince a strong disposition to pop the question. The manufacturers pay no attention to such letters. In this the girls and women who take parts in pictures are more fortunate than those who take part in regular productions on the stage. They are not tormented by Johnnies at the stage door. One manufacturer showed me a letter written by a farmer in a Western State. He asked the manufacturer to intercede for him and facilitate the opening of correspondence. He said he had watched his favorite in the pictures for weeks and every new picture increased the fascination. As evidence of good faith, he offered to sell his farm, travel East and open a picture house convenient to the abiding place of the actress whose acquaintance he sought. "It beats the Dutch," the manufacturer said. "Why," the lady he wants to meet is happily married and is the mother of four children. She makes up young and is exceedingly attractive in the pictures. I am not surprised at men becoming smitten, but they are wasting time in seeking personal acquaintance."

I am often asked if people taking part in pictures use dialogue in their work. Nearly all of them do. They tell me it is very helpful to them. No, the dialogue is not incorporated in the plot for the picture. It is spontaneous and in some instances, particularly in comedies, most amusing. In serious parts horse-play talking is strictly prohibited, so that there may be no breaks. Every foot of film used in making the negative represents so much time expended and so much money. If anything goes wrong with the scene, or that particular part of it must be taken over again, that means extra negative and extra time. I happened to be present when a negative was being taken of a scene of pathetic character. The leading man felt a little humorous and at the critical stage made a remark that threw the leading woman off her guard for a moment and caused her to smile. The camera was in operation and the scene was doomed. The leading man was dismissed at once and the leading woman was severely reprimanded for losing her self-control.

Pictures Increasing in Public Favor.

I visited the Keith-Proctor Theater, on 125th street, a few nights ago and became convinced that people who say the moving pictures have seen their best days as an attraction do not know what they are talking about. I entered the theater shortly after 8 o'clock. People were standing in rows six deep at the rear of the orchestra seats and there was not a seat to be had in the boxes, or anywhere else in the house. The program consisted of moving pictures and songs. There were no star singers and nothing was featured. It is a simon-pure picture show. Many exhibitors lose heart too quickly. If business drops off a little they jump to the conclusion that the people are tiring of the pictures. Nothing of the kind. The regular theaters have their off nights and weeks, and always have. There are exceptions. Some houses are sold out weeks in advance, but this is on account of some strong feature with regard to the star, the company, the play or the production as a whole. Time and time again managers have "papered" their houses to keep up appearances until an adverse period could be bridged over. Picture houses are not "papered." The price of admission is so insignificant that the managers are ashamed to hand out "comps" and only iron-nerved people would accept them. Every visitor to the house represents coin. I figured the Proctor business mentally on the night I have referred to and the result certainly was a fine testimonial to the drawing power of the moving pictures. They have come to stay. It may be that in time improvements and innovations may be necessary to maintain the money getting power, but the pictures will predominate. My word need not be taken for this. Ask any conservative man in the theatrical profession, manager, actor or writer, and the answer will be in the affirmative. Look over the country and see how many theaters have been turned into picture houses in the past two years and see how many picture circuits have been formed. As further proof note the fact that none of these theaters have reverted to the old line.

The Fight Pictures.

Several exhibitors have asked for information as to how they may secure the Johnson-Ketchel fight pictures. I am afraid that nickelodeon managers must wait awhile. I told one of them this the other day and he replied that if the nickelodeons did not get hold of them soon the pictures would be valueless to them as the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures will be out in about four months. The fact of the matter is that the Johnson-Ketchel pictures are controlled by the parties who were connected with the fight arrangements and they have sold the rights for production in the United States and Canada to the Kleine Optical Company, of Chicago. I know nothing of the details attending this deal, but from past experience I am convinced that it cost considerable to secure these rights. Now this heavy initiative cost, coupled with the expenses incidental to the handling and sub-leasing of the pictures, puts them out of reach of the general run of nickelodeons for the time being. It is true that several weeks have elapsed since the fight took place and such subjects must be handled quick to get big money, but these particular pictures seem to be an exception to the rules, judging from the demand that exists for them. According to the information I have at hand, the Kleine interests are selling territorial rights and the people securing these rights are booking the pictures in theaters and such large picture houses as are enabled to increase prices of admission for such attractions. Now figure it out for yourself. The original holders of the pictures, the Kleine interests, the holders of the territorial rights and the local managers must get their share, and these interests cannot be cared for by an exchange renting to nickelodeons. In time the pictures will no doubt get upon the shelves of film exchanges. I say in time. By that I mean some time, and I will not venture a guess as to when.

Exhibitors should not condemn the exchanges they deal with for not securing control of pictures like those I have just referred to for the reason that the exchanges cannot accomplish impossibilities. I have endeavored to show that such pictures are beyond the reach of the exchanges while interest in them continues. It is a case of the highest bidder and exchanges cannot participate in the game for the sake of getting the pictures to supply to a customer who is paying a weekly rental of $50, $60 or even $100. I don't know what was paid for the pictures by the Hammerstein interests, but I would not be surprised if $2,000 per week was the figure. I am quite certain that the price paid was pretty close to this figure for the first week. Such attractions come high and I understand that these particular pictures are still held at proportionately high figures.

One exhibitor complained that it was a shame to have the fight pictures monopolized and the nickelodeon people deprived of even a "look in." Business is business the world over. It is really not a question of monopoly, but an arrangement by which the pictures can be handled to the best advantage and the most money can be secured in the quickest time. They are not like what may be called stock pictures. The expense attending the making of them is enormous and their topical nature makes them comparatively short-lived. A story picture can be handled over and over again by an exchange, month after month. A fight picture becomes a dead one very soon, no matter how good it may be. Some people think that sporting and other clubs will seek the pictures for months to come. They will not. Many organizations may have lots of sporting blood in them, but its circulation is controlled by current events. Each new fight, race or other sporting event dims recollection of the preceding one. One would think that the reappearance of Jeffries in fistic circles would revive interest in the pictures that were taken of some of his battles, but you do not see any of the sporting clubs seeking the pictures. I have made inquiry at several of the film exchanges and all report that there have been no requests for such pictures. In the language of an old sport I met the other day, "The past amounts to nothing in the sporting world. Only the live ones count." The international interest created by Burns winning his fight in London made the pictures of that contest a big attraction for about two months. The Burns-Johnson fight pictures next followed, but by the time the pictures were made and brought to this country from Australia the people had almost forgotten such a fight had taken place.

Notes of the Trade.

The Johnson-Ketchel Fight Film is now controlled by George Kleine. State rights are for sale, and exchanges who have calls for this popular film should write to George Kleine, 52 State street, Chicago, for particulars.

The Moving Picture Specialty Co., 769 Lexington avenue, New York City, are advertising a "Stay-on Oil" for which they claim many advantages. We know that this oil has been long used by one of the firm, and it is due to demand from those who have seen it in use that it is now being marketed. It is put up in half-pint cans at the very reasonable price of 20 cents, so they ought to do a large business.

For every "Film d'Art" Pathe Freres have printed a handsome little booklet telling the story of the picture. A great many exhibitors use these booklets to circularize the so-called better class in their towns, with very satisfactory results. As these booklets are sold to the exhibitor at cost, it is necessary to order them at the earliest possible date. When desired, the Pathe "ad man" will have the booklets imprinted with the name of your theater without extra charge; but no orders for booklets can be filled if received later than one week prior to the date of release.

The Worrell Mfg. Co., Sedalia, Mo., are offering to the trade a preparation under the name of "Pino Spray," which we think so well of that we advise all exhibitors to write to them for their booklet. "Pino Spray" is a volatile liquid to be sprayed on the floor of the theater after closing. It lays the dust, kills the germs and the musty odors. In the morning a pleasant odor like new pine pervades the premises, and we believe it will prove a necessary and inexpensive adjunct to every exhibitor.

Pathe Freres will shortly bring out a new "Film d'Art," "La Grande Breteche," taken from Balzac's short story of that name. The film is intensely dramatic, acted in superb fashion by artists of the Comedie Française, and will no doubt prove as great a success as its notable predecessors. "La Grande Breteche" is one of the shortest, though one of the most finished of Balzac's stories, and tells, as only Balzac can, of the cold, malignant revenge of the Count de Merret on discovering a Spanish prisoner of war concealed within his wife's apartments. The film is as finely finished as the story and is doubly interesting on account of the pictures being taken at the very spot in Vendome about which the famous tale was written.

The Vitagraph Company are giving the finishing touches to another of their film de luxe series. The subject is no less than a rendition of "Cardinal Richelieu," as dramatized by E. Lytton-Bulwer. The part of the great Cardinal is represented by a well-known actor who has frequently starred in the same part on the living stage, and he is ably supported by the Vitagraph Stock Company. The story of Richelieu—the intrigues and plots and the strenuous court life of this period of French history—gives the Vitagraph Company opportunity for a display of moving picture art that will even eclipse their "Napoleon." The scenery and preparation of "Richelieu" represents months of study and application, and the Vitagraph Company are deserving of the greatest praise for their efforts in lifting the silent drama to the highest level.

Film Renewing or Cleaning is a risky proceeding for anyone to attempt unless qualified by experience. We have had many requests to furnish a formula or instructions for film cleaning, but do not know of any practical formula which would be safe for the average ignoramus to handle. Now there is a concern doing this kind of work, and doing it so well and so reasonably that it would not pay for anyone to experiment. The Film Renewing Company, 744 Orleans street, Chicago, Ill., whose advertisement appears on another page, are doing work for some of the best exchanges and we recommend our correspondents to let them do the work and not bother themselves with a messy job.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

Wanted—a censor; or a board of censors. Not the Board of Censors so ably presided over by my friend, John Collier, whom I have seen at work passing films for public exhibition. Not that kind of censor—the censor who acts as a filtrate for the unsuitable subjects. Not even a censor of photographic quality. But an exhibition censor or a board of censors. Somebody, or some body, who will be severely censorious as to the manner in which films are publicly shown. In other words, somebody who will stand between the exhibitor and his operator, and the public, and see that the public will get their money's worth, in the shape of well-shown moving pictures.

Early in the reign of the Patents Company it seemed to be generally understood that that body would take in hand the work of seeing that licensed films were done the utmost justice to by exhibitors. Is that work now being carried out by the Patents Company's officials, either formally or informally? Who, in fact, is responsible for seeing that in the five or six thousand licensed moving picture theaters in the United States, licensed film is intelligently and intelligibly shown? Is anybody responsible? I ask this question for the reason that will be made quite clear in the succeeding paragraphs. Again, who performs, if anybody performs, a like office for the two, three or four thousand non-licensed theaters in the United States? Like the man in the play, I pause for a reply. And I suppose I shall go on pausing until I get cold at the game.

For nobody in authority appears to have taken hold of this very important end of matters, otherwise I should not be the recipient of a whole batch of complaints from all parts of the country as to the shameful manner in which pictures are being shown to the public—in which the effect of the pictures has been simply ruined by gross carelessness or ignorance, or a combination of both. To the law and to the testimony: A highly cultured lady friend of mine in this city, who has been converted from the ordinary theater to the moving picture theater, complained most bitterly to me the other day of the way in which the pictures were shown at a house of some reputation not a hundred miles from Fourteenth street. She describes the pictures as a series of jumping blurs which could not be distinguished on the screen. And these, mark you, were the latest releases of licensed manufacturers! Again, one of the most prominent men in the moving picture importing business complained the other day that in many theaters which he recently visited the operators were showing thousand foot reel pictures in eight minutes—an obvious atrocity—twenty minutes being somewhere near the average.

Nor is this all. A leading man in the business of moving picture supplies has recently returned from a tour of some of the Southern and Southwestern States, where he visited innumerable theaters. He describes the condition of these places as deplorable. The conduct of the audiences, to put it mildly, is the reverse of good-mannered, while, as for the pictures and the manner in which they are shown, he seemed to have no words sufficiently strong to condemn them. These are only a few instances, to which I could add many of my own experience, of the absolutely shameful manner in which the public is being fooled by exhibitors and their employees.

The immediate consequence of this sort of thing is to disgust the public, which is very tenderly disposed towards the moving picture as a public entertainment. Surely it is within the power of the Patents Company to appoint a few officers whose duty it shall be to see that this sort of thing does not happen, and if it does happen, to withdraw the license of offending exhibitors. Then there is the Alliance. Let Mr. Swanson, Mr. Morgan, Mr. Murdock, Mr. Kessel, and Mr. Oes—you see, gentlemen, I name you all by name particularly and specifically in the matter, so as to direct your personal attention to it. I name you all so that you can have no excuse for not knowing of the existence of a fundamental evil in the moving picture business, namely, the maltreatment of the picture by the exhibitor and his operator.

It is not the smallest use in uplifting the quality of the picture, photographically and dramatically, and making it a work of art—"a thing of beauty and a joy forever"—if it is not to be presented to the public in a proper manner. This point is so obvious that it does not need discussion. What is wanted, of course, is action. Here in New York City you have something like an operators' union, who have charge of the trade interests of their members. I beg to draw the attention of the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Protective Union of Greater New York to the fact that the complaints of inefficiency of operators are becoming so serious that it is time official notice was taken of it.

This is a matter in which, perhaps, the exhibitor, most generally ignorant of technicalities, is less to blame than the operator, although responsibility rests with him. Possibly the blame is about equally divided. Certainly none of it rests with the manufacturers, who are, generally speaking, making pictures that deserve the best possible treatment in the way of exhibition arrangements. The fault, therefore, is clearly traceable to the exhibiting end of things, and it is the exhibitor and his operator who must be gone after, if necessary, by the manufacturers themselves, or by the Patents Company officially, or the Alliance officially.

There is an economic side to this matter. Operators complain that they are underpaid; exhibitors complain that they cannot get good men. Both classes are right; and both classes are wrong. A good operator will command good wages, and an exhibitor who will take the trouble will always get a good man. The real fault of the matter, the real explanation, is lack of intelligence. In ninety cases out of a hundred your operator is not in sympathy with his subject. He is a mere piece of machinery operating another piece of machinery by means of a crank, looking perhaps strictly to the pure technique of his subject and overlooking the fact that each picture on the screen demands separate personal treatment in the way of speed. His artistic perceptions are nil. Same with your exhibitor. He, in far too many cases, is a mere business man, running a moving picture house simply to make money somehow or anyhow.

I know all this from actual personal observation. How, then, when you have these two elements in combination, can you expect proper treatment of the film? The consequence is that the public is getting tired of it, getting disgusted, and is complaining and staying away from indifferently managed houses. By and bye even the well managed houses will fall under suspicion, and then dry rot will set in and the moving picture business will crumble away as the theatrical business is crumbling away.

Fortunately, this is the bad side of things; but if that bad side is left uncauterized it will grow and expand until wholesale mortification sets in. On the other hand, it is fair to say that the majority, or perhaps a large percentage, of exhibitors are men of intelligence, treat the pictures well, and therefore treat the public well. These men deserve to prosper and are worthy of all praise. But, then, the large minority is at fault—and it is upon this large minority of criminal blunderers that I desire to empty the vials of my wrath this week. Mr. Exhibitor and Mr. Operator, mend your ways, or the manufacturers or the public or the organizations will put you out of a business in which you have no right to be.

INDEPENDENT EXCHANGE FOR CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA.

The Union Film Exchange, 5 N. Market Square, Harrisburg, Pa., is the name of a new film exchange that has started on the right lines. I. Bernstein, who is favorably known among the trade in the East, is the general manager, and he is building up a good trade by giving his customers all the latest and best subjects available in the independent market. The Union Exchange has laid in a full line of supplies at the right prices and by careful attention to customers has already built up an excellent trade. Pennsylvania exhibitors who want an independent service should correspond with this new concern.

UP-TO-DATE EQUIPMENT FOR NEW THEATER AT POTSDAM, N. Y.

H. E. Flack, of Potsdam, N. Y., has opened a new modern moving picture theater, which is equipped throughout with "Hallberg" specialties, as follows: Alternating current Automatic Electric Economizer, to operate a double dissolving Motiograph stereo outfit, combined with the Motiograph flickerless machine; alternating current exhaust fan and the "Hallberg" 4,000 candle-power Flaming Arc lamps, and "Hallberg" Economizer with special incandescent lamps for house and lobby lighting. The saving on the entire bill for moving picture stereopticon and incandescent lighting is guaranteed to be two-thirds as compared with rheostat control and the regular incandescent lighting system.

DIME THEATER AT WALLA WALLA, WASH.

Something strictly modern in the line of a moving picture theater is the "Dime," which is located at Walla Walla, Wash. As can be seen by the illustration herewith, the "Dime" has a very attractive front and street entrance. Decidedly new features in connection with this Pacific Northwest theater include its ventilation scheme and safety from fire. The oval lattice work to be seen in the illustration is covered by a canvas curtain. During the Summer months the curtain is kept open, which permits of an excellent ventilation for the house; during the Winter months the curtain is kept shut to any degree desired. The lamp house in the "Dime" is constructed of steel, with automatic steel shutters, making the theater absolutely fireproof. The sign "Dime" contains some 200 Tungsten electric lamps. The theater's doors are French plate mirrors; the theater's heating system is heated air. The seating capacity is 400. The "Dime," Clarence C. Crews, proprietor, opened in its present location on the 20th of July. It employs a four-piece orchestra. Since its opening it has played to houses that have been highly satisfactory to its management.

Travellers have often informed us that we Easterners should go to the Far West to see the best in moving picture houses. We want to show up and give all due credit to the progressive houses and their promoters, be they from East or West, and invite any of our readers to send us a picture of their theater front or interior, with some details of construction.

ENGLISH APPRECIATNON OF G. K. SPOOR.

"The Essanay Company's President" is the subject of a short article in the International number of The Kinematograph, which thus writes of "G. K. S.":

"Mr. Geo. K. Spoor, as renter and manufacturer, has a reputation throughout the States as one of the 'square men' of the business in that country, and by general consent has obtained his present position of prominence by scrupulously straight dealing. One of the first to take and show a living picture film in America, he has the distinction of introducing Mr. George Kleine to the film business, and for many years bought all his films through the latter. At the present time the Geo. K. Spoor Company, of which Mr. Spoor is sole proprietor, supplies over 200 theaters in the States with their full equipment projectors. films, etc. As a renter, it was Mr. Spoor's policy, even before the Patents Company came into existence, never to sell a second-hand film, but to 'retire' every subject after a certain period, and the shelves of his offices contain film which could have been disposed of for a good price, but the release of which would probably have been detrimental to the business.

"Two or three years ago Mr. Spoor, in partnership with Mr. G. M. Anderson, extended the manufacturing field, and the Essanay (S. and A.) Company is now recognized as one of the foremost producing concerns of America, its specialty being "Western" subjects. The situation of the studio and factory at Chicago, within a few miles of typical prairie and mountain scenery, is particularly favorable to the production of the best work.

"The Essanay Company is represented in this country (England) by Mr. H. A. Spoor, brother of the principal, who was previously treasurer at the McVicar's Theater, in Chicago, where all the Drury Lane successes are staged, and although his arrival in London was comparatively recent, Mr. Spoor has already succeeded in building up a considerable connection with the English film buyers."

AN APPRECIATIVE AUDIENCE.

Perhaps it would benefit some of the New York managers, and some of the producers, as well, to go to a motion picture entertainment in a country town and see the appreciation, yes, downright vociferous enthusiasm, which carries the audience captive from the time the first announcement slide is thrown on the screen until the last picture fades into the familiar "good-night" of the last announcement slide. What comes between these two slides is what makes the show, and it is one of those shows that pleases the mutitude. They applaud every film, some more vigorously than others, but none is passed without some recognition of appreciation, and in instances the enthusiasm breaks bounds and ebbs and flows across the audience with surprising regularity and strength.

There is a spontaneity to the applause and an apparent determination to get all possible from the pictures which must be good to see, more especially as the house is filled at 50 and 35 cents each. City showmen would like to fill their houses at that money. And even though one runs a risk of an accusation for heresy, one must say in all candor that the show itself is no better than can be seen in any 10 or 5-cent theater in New York any day in any week.

The country audience prefers the rough films. Perhaps that statement should be qualified by saying that this country audience preferred such films, if one might base his judgment of their preference upon the waves of applause which followed each fresh tumble. Take the old film released by the Gaumonts some months ago, "The Human Squib," the one in which a more or less inebriated gentleman runs amuck with a burning lamppost. Screams of laughter greeted that, and the same was true of the "Two Chinamen," released by the same firm. These two films undoubtedly received the most generous applause, perhaps because there were so many boys, who like a rough-house, and never hesitate to let their preference be known as vociferously as their noise-producing faculties permit.

One very beautiful picture, a railroad journey through the Gorge du Var in France, received scarcely any applause; but it was a marvelous piece of work. Not only did it run perfectly steady on the screen, but the operator succeeded in making his picture sharp and also impressed one with a sense of size in the mountains. The tonal qualities of the picture were all that could be desired. Unquestionably this picture is a model of that class of subject.

Another picture, representing a similar journey through the Canadian Rocky Mountains, failed in these particulars. The tonal quality was not good, and only occasionally did the mountains impress one as mountains. The difference was with the photographer, a matter too frequently overlooked in making such pictures.

The program included Gaumont's wonderful sunset and twilight pictures, unquestionably a standard which will never be surpassed in that kind of a picture. Slowly the hush of the gathering twilight spread over the house. Scarcely a murmur arose, and when the delicate trill of a bird broke the stillness the illusion was complete. The world was asleep. Even on that riotous throng the effect was marvelous. The artistic picture exerted the same influence that it does everywhere. The beauty calmed the turbulent spirits and helped men to rest.

There was "A Dash for the Pole," not very convincing, with the exception of the portion made by the Great Northern, illustrating Dr. Cook's return and his reception. The rest of it may have been made in the Arctic regions, and it may not. Perhaps it is sufficient to say that it did not convince.

"Casting a Big Gun" in the Siemens furnaces in France was a good picture, and when it closed with a close view of the monsters in action, the effect was very impressive. It was heightened by the turning of the turret until they pointed out over the audience, and every person shrunk into his seat, impelled by the fear of consequences should they be fired again, when aimed in that direction.

Such was a motion picture show in the country. It might be well for producers and managers to visit such a show occasionally and learn what motion picture enthusiasm is. This show was given by Lyman H. Howe.

The first reel of "The Life of Moses," prepared by the Vitagraph Company, under the direction of the Rev. Madison Peters, D.D., is now ready. It deals with the sacrifice of the male children, the hiding of the child, Moses, and his adoption by Pharaoh's daughter. The scenic effects are superb and the subject is handled with due respect of its inspired origin.

THE AGENT FOR "LUX" FILMS.

Mr. R. Prieur, agent for the Lux films in this country, is one of the hardest men in the trade to interview. He is always willing to speak about his company or trade matters generally when he can spare time for a chat, but that is not so often as one would like, for he is an exceptionally busy man, with interests outside the film business calling for attention. However, we (The Kinetograph) managed to catch a few minutes with him at the Film House on his return from America recently, and found him quite satisfied with the demand for the Lux films, which has gone up considerably since the move from Basinghall street to the Film House was made. Mr. Prieur ascribed the increase partly to the opening of more central offices and to a great extent to the improvement in the quality of the product, which has been considerable, and which a visit to the Lux factory in Paris convinces him will be maintained.

We were naturally anxious to hear Mr. Prieur's impressions of the American trade, especially when such conflicting reports reach us in England, and it must be admitted that he did not paint a very rosy picture of the Independent position, although holding out hopes of improvement. Visiting New York, Pittsburg, Chicago, Detroit, Boston and other centers in the course of his three weeks' trip, Mr. Prieur was in a position to speak from personal knowledge of the relative position of the warring parties in the trade, and although an Independent frankly admitted the predominence of the Patents party. Of some 150 shows which he visited the bigger proportion—and almost all the best establishments—were using "Trust" films. He by no means thinks the position hopeless, however, as is shown by the fact that he has undertaken the American agency for the Lux films, and is now in the States again for the purpose of opening offices there.

Mr. R. Preur, who has been some time in the States, investigating the market, has located himself at 31 East 27th street, New York City. Exchange men are familiar with the high quality of Lux films, and those who have not ordered should place a sample order for the next shipment.

FRENCH-MADE FILMS IN AMERICA.

"Who has charge of European interests in the States?" asks the Paris correspondent of "The Kinetograph."

"The Film Import and Trading Company makes a claim to this effect, with the thirty agencies entrusted to them by MM. Raleigh & Robert. But the International Projecting and Producing Company also pretends to be an important champion of the Independents, thanks to a number of contracts for the exclusive agency of first-class products announced by Mr. Murdock.

"Repeated enumeration has been given in the American papers of the agencies claimed by the Film Import and Trading Company, and less is known of the agencies obtained for the sake of the International Projecting and Producing Company, though the reading of the list abundantly advertised by the Film Import Company shows the majority of the best makes have been tendered to that concern by MM. Raleigh & Robert. A few makes remain which will probably be secured by or for Mr. Murdock; among these the Theatro-Film, which promises to find a high place in the field of high-class films. We on this side wish to know more of the true position of the competing forces, as well as the results of Mr. McMillan's travel in Europe, where he found much to approve and secure for his clients.

"Why Our Films Must Sell in the United States."

"The inducement is very tempting to handle the best class of French films in the United States, and we find pleasure in reading the Edison Kinetogram, in a number of circumstances showing the nature of the progressive work now made in America, and for the Americans. We quoted from that paper a few lines which sounded like a claim from abroad for the reinvention of the art films. The same paper in the last issue announces the engagement of an artist of the very class needed and traces her qualities for 'silent drama' to her origin. Here is the short quotation we allude to: 'On the French stage the study of pantomime is one of the greatest assets of an actor. Words are but the expression of thought, and thought is the expression of emotion, and when the emotion fails to express through the body, words fall short of their purpose, leaving the actor a mere puppet of sound.' We know we are faithful to our countrymen's opinion, and answer their uncomfortable feeling of the present, by adding that we like better to export our films than our actresses."

[The correspondent who writes so intelligently on the foregoing subject will find his questions fully answered in recent issues of The Moving Picture World.—Ed. M. P. W.]

THE "IMP" FILMS.

No American film manufacturer has more openly invited criticism or shown more willingness to profit by it than the "Imp." The first releases of the Independent Moving Picture Company were naturally weakest technically, and we pointed out that this was only to be expected in a new concern. But how quickly they have improved. The third "Imp" film was better than the second, but the photographic quality of the fourth places the "Imp" far up among the older manufacturers and decidedly in advance of some who have been longer in the business. This photographic quality includes the work of the camera man and the dark room man, and we hope to see them keep on advancing.

With respect to the subject and action of the fourth release we cannot speak so favorably. "The Forest Ranger" is a subject that presented greater possibilities than were evolved. There is a feeling that the story is not clearly told—at any rate some incidents require reference to the synopsis of the film for explanation. As pointed out in our editorial of this week, this is a prevalent infirmity among almost all manufacturers. The first man who strikes a line of clearly told, condensed, natural sketches of daily life, and keeps to that line will succeed—as past history proves. But on the whole "The Forest Ranger," as a comedy drama, leaves a good impression. There are bits that stand out strong and touches of art that show good taste, while the characters are well fitted to the parts. This latter can hardly be said about the "Brave (?) Policeman," a short comedy which completes the reel. The leading character in this would more creditably carry a more serious part, but the mishaps of the "Brave (?) Policeman" are so absurdly funny that it makes a good ending to a good American reel, and that is what the Independent exhibitors are crying for.

"NERO" INJUNCTION DENIED AND CASE DISMISSED.

On October 25, The Film Import and Trading Company commenced action against The Empire Film Company for damages and to restrain them from using or exhibiting a certain film known as "Nero, or the Burning of Rome." They claimed that they were the agents for Raleigh & Robert, who had the exclusive rights for this film in the United States. This was supported by two affidavits, one of C. M. Freeman, the other by Charles Raleigh. Raleigh's affidavit said that the International Projecting and Producing Company's contract had expired on the 28th of September, 1909, and that some time in August, 1909, they sold, or he sold, a copy of the film known as "Nero, or the Burning of Rome," to the International Projecting and Producing Company to be used by them only as a sample. And that they had no right to sell or release it, but should have surrendered it and been refunded the cost. Mr. A. L. Kessell, for the Empire Film Company, claimed that he bought the film from the International Projecting and Producing Company in the regular course of business and was not aware nor made familiar with any terms of any contract or the consummation of one between Raleigh & Robert and the International Company. That he had a perfect right to use the film inasmuch as he had bought and paid for it in the usual course of business.

The motion was returnable before Justice Charles Truax, of the Supreme Court of New York, and was argued on the 29th of October, 1909. Mr. Kauffman appeared for the Film Import and Trading Company and Mr. Louis Burstein argued the case for the Empire Film Exchange. The decision was handed down November 11, by vacating the preliminary injunction and denying the motion for a permanent injunction. Under this decision Kessel can claim damages for the loss of the use of the film as well as legal expenses.

Taking this as a precedent, the position of the film importer is certainly not an enviable one, as it appears that no contract or international agreement can prevent any exchange in this country from purchasing copies abroad and issuing to the trade here before the American regular release date of the film. There is only one course open for the importer and that is to refuse to place orders for any film that has been released in Europe more than a few days before the date set for the American release. The European manufacturers who are now in this country are willing to enter into such an agreement.

The large pool in the Vitagraph grounds which did such good service in the aquatic feats of Miss Kellerman is in use by this firm's company of Italian actors. It looks like a bit of Venice transported as stirring scenes of Italian life are enacted. Gondolas float on the surface of the lake and the air is rent with the cries and gestures of these Italian actors, who enter into the spirit of their parts with great gusto.

Comments on the Week's Films.

THE NEW YORK ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS (Edison).

The New York Zoological Gardens are among the finest in the world. We have seen the zoos of other countries, but they do not compare in many important respects with the New York park, which has all the aspect, in parts, of wild nature, so that the animals, or some of them at least, up in the Bronx have the consciousness of enduring their captivity in surroundings resembling those from which they were taken. From a purely personal point of view we welcome the moving picture of the Bronx "Zoo"; so, we believe, do many others. Under the inspiring title of "A Bride and Groom's Visit to the Zoological Gardens," the Edison Company have sent out the picture with a touch of the comedy element in it which raises some mirth while not detracting from the real interest of the subject. The bride and her groom arrive in an automobile and are taken around the park by kindly keepers to see the animals fed. They become separated and the girl momentarily yields to the fascinations of an agreeable stranger, who, however, is soon displaced by the lawful groom and all ends happily. This slender thread of a story gives the Edison Company the opportunity of taking us on a tour of the animals' houses. We see them fed, and it is great fun. The hippopotamus, for example, astonishes us with the capacity of his mouth. The lion gets angry at his keeper; the elephant plays with him; yards of snake coil themselves about his arm; the bears dance; the monkeys fondle the young bride's arm; the harmless, necessary buffalo gambols in his own reservation; the giraffe bends his neck to the level of the keeper's hand, etc. It is just for all the world as if we ourselves were going the round of the park taking a look at our old favorites at feeding time. For they are old favorites, as we know the Zoological Park as intimately as we do Twenty-third street. The photography of this interesting film is well done and the operators can be congratulated upon having photographed the salient features of the park. It is a subject that is bound to be popular with old and young. By the way, we had almost forgotten to mention that the polar bear stands up for his meal; that the lion surveys his critics with almost human interest; that the rhinoceros is a bit of a sport, for he gambols like one. We were very much interested indeed in this animal feature film, and we think it will be generally liked.

TELLTALE REFLECTIONS (Gaumont).

The idea of this film is one which earns our commendation for its very whimsicality. It deals with the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. We do not know if any of the readers of The Moving Picture World are of a sufficiently speculative nature to ask themselves what sort of place the world would be if everybody told the truth, or the truth were instantly discoverable. No doubt, in the present imperfect state of human nature, the world with nothing but the truth in it would be a very unpleasant place to live in; in fact, come to reason it out, it could not be done. Some years ago, W. S. Gilbert, the dramatist, handled this very theme. He wrote a fairy play called "The Palace of Truth." All the characters in this play told the truth, and the result was that everybody was made uncommonly uncomfortable. Something like this idea has instigated the Gaumont film of "Telltale Reflections." A piece of apparatus, called the hypnotic mirror, has the wonderful faculty of revealing past misdemeanors of persons in whose presence the mirror is uncovered. For example: A wretched burglar is brought before a magistrate. The mirror is uncovered, and in its surface we see reflected the actions of the burglar, who, being thus found out, is led away by a policeman. Then hubby comes home under suspicion by his wife, who, uncovering the mirror, sees re-enacted before her the Bacchanalian orgy in which her faithless spouse recently took part. So she gets real mad and smashes up the happy home. Next we are shown a schoolroom interior and the head master asleep. A pupil puts a fool's cap on his head and plays other jokes on the sleeping master, who, when he wakes, tracks down the real culprit by means of the hypnotic mirror. So it goes. As we have said, this is a whimsical idea, and it received applause for its whimsicality. Of course, being a Gaumont, it is an excellent photograph.

A HEAVY GALE AT BIARRITZ (Urban-Eclipse).

We have before commented upon the immense attraction which sea pieces have for moving picture audiences. The sea is popular with us all. The sea, too, has its moods, as some of the greatest of the world's painters have discovered. The moods of the sea, in fact, are as numerous as the moods of the other and smaller half of nature, the land; and we are glad to see that the makers of moving pictures are getting alive to the fact that in the moods of the sea there is a wealth—one might almost say a limitless wealth—of material for moving picture subjects. In this release Mr. Kleine has a subject entirely after both our editorial hearts. For each of us responsible for this publication has lived much by the sea, studied it and photographed it. We know something of the fascinations of the sea, of the difficulties of adequately portraying it on a sensitive surface, and the delights of looking at good sea studies when they have been obtained. In "A Heavy Gale at Biarritz" the sea is shown not in the placid aspect which it wears when seen from the deck of a smoothly moving Atlantic liner, but in its wild, stormy, tempestuous, tumultuous mood. For there are rocks at Biarritz and the sea at times breaks in upon them, angrily, lashingly and stormily. The result is that in this picture, which is a tribute to the cleverness of the operator, we have a short study of the sea in its passionate moods. The waves roll in, they break, they dash, they thunder; they create clouds of sea mist; one, indeed, could almost feel the atmosphere of the very spume which the sea forms when smashing down on a rockbound coast. For all this, then, we can see that this little picture, though only 256 feet long, will enthrall moving picture audiences as it enthralled us who have stood and watched the sea many a time and oft just in the mood as it is shown in the film. It is a very fine piece of photography, indeed, and far more worthy of careful attention than much of the trashy manufactured stuff with which, unfortunately, the moving picture screen is still burdened. We hope that the Urban-Eclipse people can be induced to give us more nature studies.

THE BLUE GARTER (Lubin).

To Mr. Lubin we send our sincere thanks for the only hearty laugh we have had in the moving picture theater this week, which has been an interesting and instructive one, but scarcely a hilarious one. For the comedy subjects just now are running in an uncommonly dull groove. But we live in hopes of better things shortly. Meanwhile Lubin scores with "The Blue Garter." This interesting piece of feminine apparel was picked up by a young married man who fails to convince his wife, when she finds it in his pocket, that he had only brought it home for fun. So he gets rid of it. Now, if the foolish fellow had got rid of this blue garter in the proper way, that is, by destroying the blamed thing, he would have saved himself a lot of trouble and also his friends. On the other hand, Mr. Lubin would not have made this delightful film and we should not have had a hearty laugh. So perhaps it is best that hubby acted rather stupidly by passing the garter to a friend, who also gets into trouble with a lady, through having the pesky thing in his possession. So it finds its way into the baggage of a rube, who, miraculous to say, is robbed of it by a thief, who, also finding the garter an uncomfortable possession, gets rid of it; until it finally comes around to its original owner. The fun grows fast and furious. The victims of this unfortunate garter's maladroitness are nearly driven crazy by the confusion it creates. Finally the thief is caught and all the characters gather before the police captain, who solves the mystery by pointing out that the garter is not a garter at all, but his sleeve holder. So all ends happily. There is quite a touch of the chase in this film, but there is great diversity of action and the mind is kept occupied in watching the disagreeable escapades of the victims of the blue garter. We laughed because we saw catastrophe after catastrophe coming. The humorous situations anticipate themselves. It is all pleasant fooling, but it is clever fooling, and we and the audience like this kind of thing. "The Blue Garter" is a Lubin success and is bound to be popular in the moving picture theater.

THE STAGE DRIVER (Selig).

One of those stirring pictures which come from the Selig studio with surprising regularity, and which are generally the subject of applause. Selig knows how to make an interesting picture, and while sometimes his actors overlook details, in the main their stories are interesting and their method of acting them is quite satisfactory. Weaknesses appear in the photography, but where the action is swift and sure these things appear to pass unnoticed. And this film is no exception to the general run from the same house.

THE RESTORATION (Biograph).

Loss of reason has been shown before in motion pictures, but in this one, where it is occasioned by a misapprehension, the restoration becomes the important feature. To re-enact the episode by which, through jealousy, a man lost his reason, as a means of restoration, is a novel climax to an interesting development of a case of hypochondria, merging into insane jealousy and resulting in attempted murder. The scheme is successful and the former victim of melancholia is not only restored mentally, but his physical condition is improved, and he becomes again his original self. The picture contains a good many subtle psychological suggestions, perhaps offering suggestions for the modification, if not the cure, of similar cases. Apparently the motion picture is invading every field of human endeavor and offering suggestions along lines of thought hitherto deemed impossible of illustration. The effect upon an audience of a picture like this must be beneficial, since it sets them thinking, and that, after all, is the main purpose of all educational agencies and influences.

ACROSS THE ISTHMUS (Selig).

The world is waiting for the completion of one of the greatest engineering feats ever contemplated. That is the cutting of a navigable canal across the Isthmus of Panama. Much time, labor and money are being devoted to this great work, which has assumed the importance of a political proposition in the United States. The result is that the progress of the undertaking is a subject of constant interest and therefore Mr. Selig was wise when he sent his operators around to Panama. He saw that he would have a subject of surprising interest to every American. That he was right in his conjecture is proven to our mind by the fact that when the picture was first shown, one day this week, it held the attention of the audience throughout. The picture starts by showing the condition of affairs before the work of reorganization took place, and the dismantled and ruined houses marking the scene of the former administration. The improved condition under the newer order of things is also shown. Of course it is impossible in the moving picture film to give an adequate idea of the extent of the operations, but sectional incidents are shown with sufficient judgment and clearness to impress the beholder. For instance, we see the great steam scoop at work, an uncanny piece of machinery which seems to operate with almost human intelligence. Then there is a locomotive driving an earth plow on rails. Then we see the earth being transported away in rows of cars. Diggers, engineers and others pervade this great ditch in the making. It is not a pretty picture, but it is an instructive one. It shows man engaged in work of worldwide importance and, moreover, it shows the progress of a scheme for obviating an unpleasant water journey around Cape Horn. There is not much scope for the purely pictorial or picturesque in this picture, but for all that the photographic work is well done and we think the picture deserves a special word of thanks by reason of its industrial value.

"The Tale of the Fiddle" (Urban).—While one may not just like this picture and the legend it tells, nevertheless one may not overlook nor deny its scenic beauties and its dramatic qualities. All these are present, and the actors develop the dramatic features fully. In these directions, at least, one may not offer criticism. Yet it must be confessed that this copy of Faust is not wholly convincing, nor is it quite what one would like to see a film of this kind show. That a girl should sell her soul for love is not strange. Many have done it in the centuries past and many more will do it in the centuries to come. But the way the fiddle is made from the bodies of her friends is not pleasant. It seems the film would be improved if this portion were cut out and some other method of obtaining the fiddle inserted. That Satan comes for his own is not strange, nor does it seem out of place that the girl is almost mad when she comes to herself and discovers that she has lost not alone the sweetheart whom she loved so ardently, but her own folks as well. The story is gloomy, but well worked out.

"Eat Your Soup" (Pathe).—A story of an obstinate baby which may possess some element of interest to those who have been caught in a similar predicament; but there is comparatively little fun in exhibiting a baby who steadily refuses to take his soup. Some interest attaches to the action, but apart from that the picture is insignificant.

"The General's Birthday Present" (Pathe).—An illustration of the difficulty which develops when one bundle is mistaken for another. In this instance a testy old general, who is to receive a bust of himself as a present, gets, instead, a huge pumpkin. Possibly the actual situation was not so badly represented by what he obtained, yet he did not quite see it as a joke and the picture shows a general mix-up as a result of the unfortunate mistake. It develops rather more real fun than most pictures of this sort.

"A Bachelor's Love Affair" (Essanay).—Somehow there is a pathos about this film which makes one begin dreaming, and the thoughts of it will bring again the dreams which followed seeing it. The love story of the bachelor is so tenderly and delicately told; there is such a satisfying development of the beauties of character under the tender hands that brush up things about the house, and so unconsciously the elder man drifts into a series of delicious dreams, which dissipate even as the smoke rings from his pipe, until his nephew returns from college, that one almost pities him because these dreams were not realized. Beautiful and tender beyond expression is the gentle hand of love. Gentle beyond conception is the development of character under the same gracious influence. The transformation in the bachelor's surroundings first, and afterward in himself, are so naturally brought about that one watches closely to see where the transformation begins and the development becomes a paramount influence. But the young people must have their way. And the elder man hides his own dreams and gives them his blessing, with something more substantial. Then they leave him and he returns to his rooms, his smoking jacket and his—dreams. The film ends, and one wonders if it is not typical of the life and dreams of many men and women. The Essanay Company deserve congratulations.

"Nursing a Viper" (Biograph).—A graphic story of the French Revolution which illustrates convincingly an episode which might have occurred, perhaps did occur, during that period of bloodshed and terror. The dramatic possibilities of subjects of this character are well developed by the Biograph actors, and in this instance they seem to have outdone their own previous good work. The dramatic climax, when the husband returns in time to save his wife from the clutches of the man he had befriended, and when he thrusts him out into the hands of the infuriated mob, which was hunting him, are well managed and seem integral parts of the picture, as indeed they are. One cannot say that a picture like this is pleasant, but one cannot consistently question the dramatic quality, nor the art of the actors. Both rise to heights which are seldom reached in motion picture work and perhaps have never been surpassed. If some of the gruesome parts had been cut down the film would be more universally approved. But is it wise or necessary to depict those dark spots of past history? Why not let them be forgotten?

"Napoleon and Princess Hazfeld" (Itala).—A story of Napoleon's career which represents him as something better than a monster, consequently may be welcomed. The acting is good, though it does not seem to be sustained, and in places the pictorial work is not as clear as it should be. That it gives a merciful view of Napoleon's character is worth something, however, and for that reason it may be commended. As a story, however, it is not especially strong, nor has it much interest for an American audience.

"The Witch" (Le Lion).—A story which has some dramatic features of interest, but which, as a whole, can scarcely be said to be sufficiently worth reproduction in such an expensive form. The machinations of a witch who attempted to secure a wife for an exceptionally ugly son, are not likely to be of much interest to an average audience. And the stealing of the soul of a girl is not a subject that will appeal either for its dramatic qualities or for its beauties of development.

"Cultivation of Tea in Java" (Pathe).—A high-class educational subject, showing the various processes of tea cultivation in Java. The industrial subjects which this firm has brought out make a long list of instructive pictures, and this one is quite up to the average. The photographic work was done with all the skill employed by the Pathe's trained men. It is worth much to have the scenes of production of so important and universally used article as tea brought home to the thousands who will see this excellent picture.

"Misadventures of a Pair of Trousers" (Pathe).—A bit of comedy which has some broad allusions and represents what might occur under certain circumstances. This sort of picture seems to please a good many in every audience, though improvement in the class of comedy would appear to be desirable.

"Lines of the Hand" (Raleigh & Robert).—A picture of considerable merit, showing numerous interesting combinations obtained by gazing through a crystal supplied by a palmist. The searcher for occult information discovers an unusual combination of virtues, and traits quite the opposite; yet, notwithstanding all this, he leaves dissatisfied, because, as he conceives it, he did not obtain his money's worth. Technically the film is rather better than the average from this house, indicating that in this direction, at least, progress is being made.

"Bandits of the Atlas Gorges" (Eclair).—Striking scenes in the mountain gorges of South Algeria mark this picture. The action is sufficiently melodramatic to satisfy the most exacting in this respect. The coach is held up, looted and burned. Then follows the release of the prisoners. The film is made up of a striking series of pictures, all made amid mountain scenery of surpassing beauty and grandeur.

"Destiny" (Imp).—Death and depression and gloom. One hoped for something different from the "Imp" house; something that would at least be more satisfactorily American than some of the pictures seen on the screen. Yet here is a picture in which the death of everybody, except one lonely girl, is made the important feature of the film. True, the girl gets the gold; but what is gold without friends with whom one may divide it, sharing the comforts and pleasures it brings? Surely, nothing; and this impression is emphasized by the appearance of the girl herself as she looks ruefully at the gold and realizes that her friends are all gone. A succession of deaths is far more depressing and dispiriting than one, and in this story absolutely unnecessary. That makes them even more depressing. Nothing about the picture is attractive, excepting, possibly, the novelty of the quicksand scene. That is new and is sufficiently well managed to be interesting. The actors are to be commended for the efficient work they have done on what is really a poor story. Photographically improvement is possible, but some leeway may well be allowed a new firm in this direction.

"A Duel in Midair" (Edison).—A bit of melodrama which is peculiarly thrilling because it represents a fight on a girder swung high in the air, twenty or more stories above the street. It is a story of love and jealousy, with the disappointed lover undertaking to kill his successful rival by attacking him when on a girder to be used in a skyscraper which is under construction. While the same story of love enters into it that has been used many times before, and it is neither better nor worse for that fact, yet there is a certain degree of additional interest which attaches to it from the fact that the fight is carried on so far above the ground. But the aggressor falls and is so badly injured that he dies. As he is expiring he joins the hands of the lovers and gives them his blessing. As a melodrama this picture is a success and is certain to win applause because of the novelty attaching to the place where the fight occurs. It is, in a way, a distinct innovation for this firm to put out such a strong melodrama, yet perhaps it is none the less interesting from that point of view. The story is concisely told and the scenic qualities give one many a thrill before the picture ends.

"Bill, the Billposter" (Edison).—A bit of comedy in which Bill discovers a number of new things about his bills in his dreams. The bills he puts up become animated and perform numerous interesting stunts for his especial benefit. The result is that he is seriously disappointed when he awakens from his dream to find that he missed a drink while he was asleep and also finds that his bottle is empty. There are funny situations which develop as the film runs, but the chief charm of the picture is its novelty. It is not often that the Edisons do anything better in this line.

"The Cattle Thieves" (Kalem).—A melodramatic story of the Northwestern mounted police, with a love story, a number of fights and final rescue of a captured policeman from the hands of thieves. Perhaps the most striking feature of the film is the wonderful shot by which the girl severs the rope with which her lover is suspended from a limb by his thumbs. There is much of the swashbuckler style about this film, but it is none the less interesting for that reason. The whole picture attracts a good deal of favorable attention wherever it is shown. The situations are unexpected and the development of the dramatic portions of the plot are sufficiently active to keep the audience wondering what is going to occur next. The improvement in the photographic quality is quite as marked as the improvement in the acting. Altogether it is one of the best things Kalem has brought out recently.

"The Prodigal Son" (Pathe).—A beautifully colored production illustrating the scriptural story which is familiar to all students and readers of the Bible. Mr. Lavedan, who prepared the drama of the "Duke of Guise," which was called by many competent critics one of the best motion picture dramas ever offered to the public, prepared this one also. And he has done his work well. It follows the original very closely, with the exception that it shows the brothers in a quarrel at the opening, which seems to be the determining influence in the boy's decision to go away. The scenes are reproduced with fidelity to the original story, the description being followed closely in most instances, only here and there a deviation being necessary to increase the dramatic effect. It is needless to go over the story itself. It is assumed that everyone who sees the picture knows what that story is and in the telling of it through the medium of the silent drama the Pathes have rendered a distinct service to teachers of Bible truth and lovers of the beautiful in literature and art. The scenes are faithful reproductions of the Biblical scenes and undoubtedly give a true impression of the home life and surroundings of a gentleman of wealth at that time. The young man's experiences follow closely the narrative, hence it is not difficult to understand them. The effect is wonderfully realistic and the story is emphasized and brought home to those who see it in a way hitherto impossible. Sunday schools would do well to use this film in their instruction. It would impart a sense of reality to it which could not be secured in any other manner.

"The Warrior's Sacrifice" (Gaumont).—A beautifully staged picture which tells a story of love and renunciation, with a display of bravery which is unique and thrilling. The warrior lover marches away, leaving his sweetheart behind, and when she learns that he has been killed she accepts the attentions of another, to whom she is married. Then her warrior lover returns, only to find that she belongs to someone else. During a meeting the husband discovers them and a duel almost ensues, but the girl persuades the former lover that her place is with her husband. Then the soldier dies in the defense of the drawbridge which allows entrance to the city, one of the most thrilling and convincing scenes ever shown in motion pictures. The film is good throughout, and while the love story is not new, the setting is so beautiful and the development of the plot is so smoothly and so well done it is interesting from first to last. The outdoor scenes are more than ordinarily good and the photography is rather above the average.

"For Love's Sweet Sake" (Lubin).—A love story which may be novel in the method the young man took to obtain his prize. Possibly the consciousness that young heiresses have a habit of falling in love with coachmen may have been an influential factor in this story. Anyhow, the engagement, which was originally for one month, was made for life, with the consent of all persons interested, directly or indirectly. The story has lively action and is cleverly produced.

"Cops on a Strike" (Pathe).—A story of insubordinate policemen which has one novelty, the enforcement of order by the releasing of the prisoners in the local prison, who capture the police as they are discussing a strike and put them in prison to reflect upon their obliquity in refusing to obey orders.

"Elephant Hunting in the Camboge" (Film Import and Trading Company, Le Lion).—An interesting picture, showing the methods of killing elephants, illustrated by a picture made of the killing of the largest elephant ever shot. As a whole the picture is good, the technical quality being as good as the average of such films, but there are places where improvement would be possible. The firm that made this film is steadily improving its output, and in some instances the pictures are as good as any that have been sent out of that particular character.

"The Sack Race" (Film Import and Trading Company, Le Lion).—A comic showing an entry in a sack race who conceals springs in his sack to help him along, but when the deception is discovered he is roundly denounced. During the argument his sack becomes animated and starts around the course on its own account, but a well directed shot causes it to burst, showing the whole scheme.

"Actress and Child" (Phoenix Film Company).—A picture of infidelity on the part of a man, who becomes enamored of an actress and is disposed to neglect his wife and child, as a result. The story is told with a good deal of attention to detail and is, on the whole, convincing. It seems a bit strange, however, that his only little girl can follow him on his visit to the actress' home, and be there ready to lead him out when he quarrels with his charmer. Photographically the film is quite up to the Phoenix standard, and there is no criticism on the acting. The Phoenix people are doing better work each week, and while this particular film leaves some things to be desired, it is, on the whole, a satisfactory picture.

"The Pigmy World" (Gaumont).—A laughable drama, based on the timeworn mother-in-law joke. The trick photography is well managed and the little people are clearly shown.

"A Peace Agitator" (Gaumont).—The multiplied difficulties of Mr. Pax, who attempts to preach the doctrine of universal peace. The result is that he puts on protecting armor and appears like a walking arsenal.

"Good for Evil" (Itala).—A picture based upon the fact that one man pays the penalty for another's crime. Years after, the wrong man saves the life of his enemy's daughter. Eventually they settle their differences and the former wrongfully accused man is given a home for life. The acting is ordinary. The story possesses some interest, but scarcely sufficient to hold attention to the end. Technically the film is fairly good.

"Ursula, the World's Fastest Motor Boat" (Urban).—A beautifully photographed picture of a motor boat which develops forty miles an hour in motion. The pictures are surprisingly clear, and the scenery is so finely shown that it adds much to its attractiveness. The last views, made across the bows of the boat when it is pitching under the swift movement, are particularly good. The view of the engine, developing 800 horse-power in twenty-four cylinders, is interesting, and the pictures illustrating the perfect control by the operator under the highest speed make the owners of average motor boats sigh.

"The Robber Duke" (Urban).—A dramatic subject of merit, worked out with the skill which usually accompanies a play of this character by the Urban actors. There are numerous melodramatic features which hold the interest of the audience through the film. The photographic quality is unquestionably quite up to the standard set by the house and the picture appears to be well received wherever it is shown. The dramatic quality of the Urban pictures is unquestionably improving, with the result that they are showing increasing popularity.

"A Tumultuous Elopement" (Melies).—A comedy so full of lively action that it is almost impossible to follow and understand it. The difficulties include a couple who undertake to elope to escape from a father who objects to a wedding, a tramp, who steals pie and cider and is chased by the infuriated father, and a combination of clothes from a smallpox hospital, and other complications that add to the general mixup, ending at last in a wedding, followed by the forgiveness of the girl's father and the incarceration of the tramp. There is no dramatic feature in the development of this plot. On the contrary, the film is marked wholly by action, not by acting. The photography is fairly clear through most of the film's length and the printer did his work as well as possible. A good deal of merriment is exacted as the film runs, ending with applause when the young couple are finally married.

"The Game" (Essanay).—If one wants his blood to tingle with the pure joy of battle he should see this picture. There is in it the very spirit of the maelstrom of the frenzied financial operations which mark the contests of the money kings in all the great exchanges of the world. A disagreement between two partners over a contemplated deal leads to their estrangement and results in one taking the securities required to carry the deal through. Dramatic complications follow, but the firm wins the battle in the exchange, makes its millions and decides to turn the business over to the son of one of the members. The love story is well told and convincing and there is a snap to the pictures which is sufficiently marked to create the impression of actual life. The actors in this picture seem to have caught more of the spirit of the real life of the financial world than ordinarily, and they have interpreted that life so clearly that it appears convincing. The life and action which goes with it is so contagious that almost involuntarily the audience joins in the struggle which takes place, and feels a sense of relief when it finally ends and everybody is made happy.

"The Necklace of the Holy Virgin" (Eclair).—It is difficult to criticise this film. There are certain elements about it which will appeal to different people, in different ways, and perhaps none will be exactly clear in their comprehension of it. Some will be affected one way and some another. None will deny the dramatic quality of the film, and few will see the close without a profound impression of something indefinable, yet plainly apparent, and to that extent, at least, the picture is elevating. The moving impulse in forcing the man to undertake something which was clearly a desecration and ended in his death, will not appeal to American audiences as sufficient, yet perhaps with certain peoples might be all powerful, though possibly temporary, impulse. A strong film in its impressions, this will appeal to a good many because of the influences which almost unconsciously become fixed before it closes.

From a theatrical paper:

"Better a good moving picture than a bad drama any time. Some of the attractions now offered are so inane, that they would not suffer at all if they were given in pantomime."

Quality Counts

We are not POETS, ORATORS OR MESSIAHS, but just plain business men. We are building up a tremendous business for profits—dividends, if you like. To pay dividends we must sell good films. We must see to it that our customers get films that will make THEM a profit; films that will satisfy their customers; films that will increase the receipts of the exhibitor. So from the time the scenario is written until the audience sees the pictures, when shown on the screen, we are interested—yes, vitally interested, because we want profits. Your success is our success.

Choice of the Market

Think of thirty-two manufacturers offering us their pictures every week. We look at every one of them and select the best. (Read the program, it speaks for itself.) Those whose pictures we reject may complain and ask why we don't take them. But you can guess what we tell them—"Quality, we must have quality," and so they go home again, vowing to made a better picture next time. It's like a prize contest—every order we place is a prize for one of these manufacturers. This contest is daily, and the effort to get orders can only result in Better pictures—constantly Better, continually Better.

How to Get Them

TRAVELOGUES AND SENSIBLE SONGS WANTED.

Sherman, Tex., November 4, 1909.

Editors The Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—I am a subscriber to your paper. I use a moving picture machine and stereopticon solely for church entertainments. Will you kindly give me the address of some illustrated song slide concern that turns out nice illustrated songs other than silly and sentimental ones, something that will elevate and entertain people who do not care for the cheap, sentimental songs of the day? Also please to give me the address of some rental agents who rent travelogues.

Yours truly,

G. S. MURPHY.

[All slide makers have to keep pace with the popular demand by illustrating the trash that is turned out by the song publishers. Occasionally among these is a song that will "elevate and entertain" and your dealer can make selections for you. The Kleine Optical Company, 52 State street, Chicago, Ill., make a specialty of renting travelogues or educational subjects. Williams, Brown & Earle, 918 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, Pa., also publish a series of illustrated travelogues. Dealers who can supply Mr .Murphy's needs will please correspond with him direct.—Editor M. P. W.]

Motion Picture World,

Gentlemen—I have just been informed of the tragic death of Thomas A. Graves, a motion picture operator. This man has indirectly been in our employ in the last few weeks ,and was killed last night, while riding a Milwaukee freight train, at Mapleton, Minn. We know nothing of the man's former life, but, judging from his appearance, I imagine he has come from a good family. No one in Minneapolis knows anything concerning him, and I would be very thankful indeed if you would use a news item in your paper and endeavor to locate his family. His full name is "Thomas A. Graves," dark complected, smooth face, about 27 years of age, weighs about 140 pounds, and height about 5 feet 4 inches,—neat appearing and gentlemanly manners. I have instructed the authorities at Mapleton, where he was killed, to give him as respectable a burial as possible, and if you will endeavor to locate his family, I know it will be a worthy cause.

Thanking you sincerely for your most respectful consideration to the above request, I remain,

Respectfully yours,
JAMES V. BRYSON, Manager,

A PLEA FOR MORE CARE AND INTELLIGENT USE OF MACHINES AND FILM.

Rockford, Ill., November 6, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Lately, in thirty days, often after tenth run, I receive films so badly scratched they look like junk. The exchanges claim it is the fault of the N. I. film, which may be true to some extent, but if operators would clean their machines and be more careful in rewinding half the remedy would be applied. I have read so much lately of the business ability of various exchanges and while they are getting together to make the poor exhibitor pay more for service, yet with their ability of combining, they do not seem to care what sort of an outfit or operating booth the exhibitor keeps, so long as they get the money for rentals on the early runs. Present conditions leave no chance for the smaller exhibitor to show decent pictures unless he gets tenth or fifteenth run. Now, as the life of a film in good condition after thirty days is the main profit for a film exchange, it would seem they could get together and refuse to rent an exhibitor unless he had a takeup and a Lang rewinder in the operating booth, and films would then be as good ninety days old as they are at present in twenty days. An operator, and a good one, will tell you he takes care and keeps everything clean and that a takeup is hard on the machine and makes the picture jump. The latter argument can be answered by having good mechanical knowledge, and using more care in adjustment. The fact that he takes care and keeps things clean may be true in his individual case, but 90 per cent. of operators who say they do, don't do it when they are alone and get rushed. There are a number of exhibitors who hardly know the name of the machine they are using, and the condition of the films proves the average operator is careless and handles it like rope. Yet it is to these exhibitors film is rented without question by the exchanges and many exchange managers, and even owners, are practically ignorant of the full necessities of an operating booth. One exchange manager told me he was afraid to enforce rules on his customers or propose such a system to other exchanges for fear it might queer him with some of his trade as the original trouble breeder. And there you are, Mr. Editor. I think there is a great improvement to be made. The average manager cannot see beyond the box office and the operator plugs for the end of the show. An exhibitor on the road, starting out with a new reel and the use of a Lang rewind and takeup, will find his film will be in equal or better shape in six months than a copy going through a film exchange for thirty days. On investigation and conversation you will find few exchanges know whether their customer renews the parts which bear friction when worn out and they apparently give none of those details much consideration.

Yours very truly,

W. CLARKE.

LECTURER WANTED.

Freeland, N. J., Nov. 1, 1909.

Gentlemen—An article in your valuable paper, that good lecturers can be had, interested me very much. For the past month I did my best to locate one that positively could entertain. If you know of one or more, will you kindly send me his address or let them have my address, and if possible I will enter into a contract for two or more weeks. If you know of one that you know could make good, I would be very grateful indeed.

Yours truly,
R. H. HERBERT,
Manager Lyric Theater.

It is now needless to travel great distances to see popular events, and the moving picture is the coming illustrated newspaper. The Johnson-Ketchel fight pictures give a better view of the details of the fight than those at the ringside secured. In two weeks' time hundreds of thousands of picture show patrons will see on the screen a splendid view of the evolutions of the dirigible balloons at St. Louis. The pictures, secured by the Vitagraph Company, show close views of these monsters of the air, and the eye of the camera follows their evolutions, showing the rare sight of two of these balloons in the air and in close proximity.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

TWO WOMEN AND A MAN.—It is not man's nature to be fickle, and if at times he changes his allegiance it is not through a fickle nature, but rather an aberrance induced by subtle forces. Frequent are these occasions during life, which occur to sll to strengthen our will power, but there are times when in a state of unrest, our natures are more receptive of a change, and we yield in opposition to ethics. Hence we should ever be on our guard, for once astray from the moral road, we may never regain its path. Off that path we are as the mariner without his compass, huffeted by the sea, and each shining beacon we steer for only lures us upon a shoal on which many other poor unfortunates have foundered. This Biograph story evinces the above most forcibly, for John Randolph was truly a happy man when he brought Molly as his wife to the humble little home in the village. John was a bright, ambitious young man, who sought to improve their condition in life. It is true he worked hard, but it grieved him to see his wife toiling at her arduous household duties. His fondest dream was to have his dear wife mistress of her home, with those around her to do the labors. At length his dream is realized. Having studied the stock market, he becomes successful therein, and they remove to New York, where they occupy a palatial home. Alas, how much better off would they have been in their simple country house. But one never can tell. It is the old story, earned success brings happiness, easy money, woe. In New York success attends his every move, and he is soon a very rich man, snd a power in the stock market. It is now that domesticity chafes and he seeks recreation outside his own home, mingling with a set in which his wife would be entirely out of place. While at a Bohemian gathering, he becomes smitten with a music hall singer. After this it is all for her, and neglect for his wife. He showers bouquets and presents upon her, the most costly being a magnificent diamond and pearl collar. This neglect is felt by the wife and a separation and divorce is the outcome, with a settlement on his discarded wife. Free from further obligations in' that direction, he marries the singer. This step is ominous for he at once reaches the turning point. Beaten in the market, his friends turn from him. His only chance is to secure his second wife's jewels, all his presents, with which to start anew. Would she yield them? Would she make one tithe the sacrifice poor Molly made? Not much. She deserts him coldly. What a lesson is here depicted. Ruined, friendless, he wanders back to the old village home, which is as he left it, and finds rest again, where he found rest before, in the old-fashioned rocker. In conclusion we can only add that this subject in staging, acting and photography is excellent.

A MIDNIGHT ADVENTURE.—"The golden sun was sinking in the West, as it was wont to do, at the dying of an Autumn day, bathing the silent landscape in a ruddy glow. There was a suppression that seemed on the verge of bursting, when the distant patter of horsehoofs was heard. Was this the mere simulation of the property man, or was it a reality? This thought held Lucile in breathless suspense as she stood awaiting him. Her fears were soon dispelled, as a moment later the gallant Knight Armand rode up on caparisoned steed —he despised trolley cars. With a leap he was at her side, and—" This was the line of slush that Mercedes' brain was sopping up from a novel by Clara Jean Dippy, when her beau Frank called. Mercedes was a confirmed disciple of the aforesaid Clara, and would be wooed hy a gallant Knight of "ye olden tyme," and as Frank looked as much like a gallant Knight as a mouse resembled a rhinoceros, he stands a poor show. However, she is reasonable and gives him a chance to do something daring and audacious. He is required to enter the home of a friend of Mercedes and surreptitiously secure a photograph of herself. As he does not know the family, the act is indeed an adventure. Disguised as a robber, he enters the house, secures the picture, and is about to decamp when caught by Miss Eleanor, Mercedes' friend, who, thinking him a hold had burglar, hands him over to Sergeant Reginald Vandyke Worthington, the society guardian of the peace (meaning cop). The situation is precarious for Frank, and it looks for a time that he will enjoy a season of quietude in the "cooler." However, on the way to the detention camp, a friend is met, explanations are listened to, and Frank is released. Taking to Mercedes the result of his daring, he hands her the photograph and then shakes a "day-day." She is so delighted that she doesn't notice his last move, and prepares to return to Eleanor the pilfered portrait, only to arrive there in time to see Eleanor enfolded in the arms of Fearless Frank, for though he stole the photograph she stole his heart. Mercedes, ejaculating that classical expression "stung" falls fainting into a Morris chair.

SWEET REVENGE.—Revenge is sweet, but like many sweet things if often leaves a bad taste. How many wreak vengeance only to be heartily sorry after its commission? How many are there who would give anything to undo deeds done, that they at the time of perpetration felt justified? Sweet revenge—it is a bitter sweet. In this Biograph subject is shown an exemplification of the theory, with rather better results than is usually attendant upon vengeful moves. The young man jilts his first sweetheart to marry another. He apprises her of this by leaving a newspaper containing the notice of his approaching marriage. She flies into a frenzy of rage, and for revenge dispatches a messenger boy to the bride-elect with a package of his love letters snd a joint photograph of themselves. The boy depsrts and she follows with her mind's eye this bearer of her malice, when suddenly her hand falls upon one of his gloves on the table. This is like a shock, for she now realizes the woe she has apparently caused. What would she not do to recall the messenger, but fate has intervened, for the boy has accidenly dropped the package from a bridge into the river.

EDISON MFG. CO.

THE IMP OF THE BOTTLE.—The fable of some article like Aladdin's Lamp or the Wild Ass' Skin possessing magic properties that will enable it to fulfill almost every human wish, yet with penalties attached to offset this advantage, is as old as time itself.

In the present picture the wonders are worked by a terrible little imp who has his residence in an oddly shaped bottle. He has the power to grant every wish that the owner of the bottle can frame, except that for a long life, and the penslty attached is that any one who dies with the bottle in his possessino goes straight through to perdition and eternal punishment. Consequently, whoever owns this wonderful bottle is anxious to get all he can as speedily as possible and then get rid of the bottle; but here another hard condition appears—the bottle can be sold only for less than it cost. This sounds very simple until the price, reduced from purchaser to purchaser, reaches the two-pence mark, at which point the story of the film begins.

A young sailor's rapt admiration for the King's daughter attracts the attention of an old magician who owns this wonderful bottle. Being, like every other purchaser, anxious to get rid of it, the magician seizes the sailor's love as a possible means to an end. He takes the young man to his own house, shows him the wonders of the bottle and offers it to him for the small sum of two pence. The sailor is only too glad to close the bargain, but after testing the properties of the bottle hy wishing for a sum of money, he incautiously desires to see the Imp himself, and the sight is so terrible that he would gladly call the hargain off—only the thought of the beautiful Princess makes him wish to still retain the bottle.

We see him stand upon the hillside and wish for a house worthy of her, and we see the house appear in the thin air. We see him wish for the Princess, and she stands before him; and then we see the start of his troubles when the real heart story begins. The knowledge that no one will buy the fatal bottle for one penny when aware of the fact that it might he impossible to sell it for less, weighs upon the now prosperous young sailor, until the Princess notes it and asks the cause of his depression. When she learns it, like the wonderful little woman that she is, she resolves to lose her own soul to save that of her sailor lover. She bribes an old beggar to buy the bottle from her for one penny. Relieved of it, the sailor's joy is unbounded, but curiosity makes him follow the beggar, and hy so doing he learns of the self-sacrifice of his Princess wife.

He now faces the alternative of seeing her a lost soul or of finding some way of getting the bottle himself. The thought of the half penny comes to him and he gets a drunken sailor companion of former days to buy the bottle from the Princess for a half penny, knowing that by so doing it will come back to his possession, and this time irretrievably. The drunken sailor comes from the magnificent house carrying the mystic bottle, and noting its emptiness, wishes that it were full that he might have another drink. The wish, of course, is instantly granted and the bottle overflows with liquor. The reprobate is delighted and resolves not to complete the hargain, hut to keep the hottle for his own. Though warned what its possession means to him, he decides that it is worth the price, and we see the bottle disappear from the lives of the now happy young people.

The story is clearly and happily told by the Edison players, and the bottle's magic properties are taken full advantage of. The costuming and scenic environments make the picture one of the most pleasing to the eye that the company has ever turned out.

A WINTER'S TALE.—Jack Frost certainly did play havoc with the Smiths one cold Winter's day, and the little icicled elf is not in the habit of doing things lightly when once he sets out to play pranks. At such times he is sure to leave a trail of trouhle behind him, of which the Smiths certainly got their full share and a great deal besides.

It all started in the kitchen. No one knew just when or how, hut it started there. Now, food is a very essential thing for man, and the Smiths are no exception to the rest of the human family who generally wake up pretty hungry for breakfast. Nine o'clock is a very respectable hour for breakfast, too, but Mr. Smith and Mrs. Smith and the two miniature Smiths, seated at the family table, waited in vain for it to materialize. As she paid no heed to their frantic ringing of the bell, shouting and whistling, they decided that the cook was neglecting her duties. So the entire Smith family started to investigate the cause of delay. They were in a particular hurry that day, too, for the Browns were coming to dinner at four, and they could not understand why cook had not risen to the spirit of the occasion.

The law of cause and effect was very evident upon their arrival at the altar of good things—the kitchen. They discovered Mary Ann afloat in a washtub, with a miniature Atlantic Ocean around her, holding her symhol of work, the broom, tightly against the water boiler, which Jack Frost had tapped lightly during the night and from which was now gushing a veritable geyser of ice water. Then the Smith's troubles began. One thing after another followed quickly to add to the woes of the wet, hungry and shivering family. After what seemed to be hours of telephoning and waiting, during which interval they made frantic but ineffectual efforts to stem the flool that was threatening the inundation of the entire house, the plumber and a particularly tired assistant arrived on the scene.

The philosophical way in which they surveyed the situation and the calm, deliherate manner in which they set about to relieve it were aggravating enough, but the limit of endurance was reached when they tore out half the side of the house and exposed the almost frozen family to a ten-below-zero temperature. That isn't half what they did, either; nor have we even attempted to recount the many comicalities that added to the Smiths' discomfiture on that memorable day. We'll let the film do that, with the assurance on our part that this "Winter's Tsle" is full of more genuinely funny and more varied situations than are generally to be found in a short comedy film.

THE PERSONAL CONDUCT OF HENRY.—When Mrs. Henry Lee decides to spend a few days with her mother in a neighboring town, she gives her husband a brief, business college sort of a training in the art of housekeeping and makes her departure. Henry, to his surprise, finds that a woman's work is not such a cinch as he had imagined, and after a few vain efforts to follow accurately his wife's instructions regarding dish-washing, sweeping, etc., he gives the thing up as s bad joh.

The night before Mrs. Jones returns Henry invites a number of his men friends up to have a good time. When they leave, Henry, too weary to clean up the mess of cigar stubs, champagne bottles, etc., goes to bed, resolved to arise early and get things cleaned up before Mrs. Lee's return.

A short time after he has fallen asleep he hears a noise at the front door, the sound of iron filing, then the front door creaking on its hinges. "Burglars," ssys Henry.

Taking his revolver Henry creeps stealthily down the stairs to the hallway and covers the intruders with his revolver, just as they enter. He is ahout to call the police when a happy thought comes to him. Why not make the burglars clean up the house?

Providing the astonished duo with brooms and cloths, Henry drives them through room after room, leaving cleanliness and order in their wake. When he is through with them, he thanks them, shoves a hox of cigars and a few bottles of wine at them and turns them out.

The burglars, however, are unappreciative of Henry's sense of humor and plan revenge. The next morning when Henry goes to the station to meet his wife they steal certain feminine apparel from a neighboring clothesline, enter the house again and litter the table with the mess of the night before.

Henry and wife returns. Henry is jubilant in the belief that Mrs. Lee's estimate of his character will be raised fully 100 per cent. But no! The littered table, women's stockings and lingerie, conspicuously arrayed about the room, dispel his dreams. Vainly he tries to calm his enraged spouse, to explain things. But the evidence of his guilt is only too convincing, and with the air of a martyr, Henry is dragged to the kitchen, where those implements of torture, the rolling pn and flat iron, await him.

A MISLAID BABY.—Mr. and Mrs. William Brown, proud parents of William Brown, Jr., aged six months, start out to purchase a baby carriage. A suitable perambulator, at a very reasonable price, is on display in front of a furniture store, and Mrs. Brown, turning William, Jr., over to her husband, enters the store to ask the clerk ahout it. While she endeavors to drive a bargain with the proprietor of the store, Brown grows weary of waiting, and placing the baby in the coveted carriage seats himself on a bench and hecomes absorbed in his paper.

Mrs. Smith, also on the lookout for a baby carriage, is attracted hy the beauty of the carriage in which William Brown, Jr., is reposing, hastily calls a clerk, pays him instantly he names the price and wheels it away, entirely unaware that the vehicle has an occupant. Brown continues to read his paper.

Mrs. Smith arrives home, leaves the carriage outside, and sends the maid with her infant out to inspect the new carriage. The maid hurriedly enters again, with William Brown, Jr., in her arms.

In the meantime, Mrs. Brown, unable to strike a bargain with the furniture man, leaves the store, when the discovery of the kidnapping is made known. After a tedious search they find Mrs. Smith and

WHY—The Motiograph is the Best Motion Picture Machine

Because the Pictures are More Brilliant. The special patented Shutter is so arranged that it saves a lot of illumination otherwise lost.
Because Flicker is eliminated by the new patented Shutter.
Because the Pictures are Rock Steady when using a good film, and are restful to the eyes of your patrons. The result is because of accurate workmanship and excellence of design.
Because it has patented quick Rewind (one and one-half minutes) connected to main crank handle. No other similar.
Because it has the only perfect Fire-proof Shutter, automatic and absolutely reliable.
Because it has Enclosed Spiral Gears. They work smooth and wear longer.
Because it has a Perfect Take Up. Easy on the film and always reliable.
Because it has inclosed Framing Device. Wears longer, is quickly removed and patented.
Because it has "Wide Open" Lamp House, convenient for changing carbons, adjustment, etc.
Because it is absolutely Fireproof.
Because it has Double the Wearing Qualities possessed by other Machines.
Because it is almost Noiseless; runs more quiet than any other.
Because it has Heavy Pedestal Base, adjustable and patented.
Because it has more than 40 other points of special merit. Boston, New York, Chicago and San Francisco approved.

Rewinding the Film on the Motiograph

the newly purchased perambulator, and William, Jr., is restored to his own.

A picture that will make them all scream. Full of funny situations, cleverly acted by good comedians.

THE BEST MAN WINS.—Charles Shea, the handsome young foreman of the Bar Z ranch, has won the love of the winsome daughter of his employer, John Graham. Alice and he are engaged to be married when a telegram announcing the death of his father and the request that he immediately return East, is handed Shea. Promising to return immediately the estate is settled, Shea bids Alice good-bye and leaves for the East.

A year passes and no word from Charley. The girl is in despair and, though every cowpuncher on the place loves her madly, she refuses each one in turn, declaring that she will wait for Charley, whom she is sure will return soon.

Graham, her father, however, is growing old and needs some one to take his place. He therefore desires that Alice marry as soon as possible and urges her to accept the suit of one of his men, all of them being honest, good-hearted fellows. She tells him that that is where the trouble lies. She likes them all and could not marry any one of them without hurting the rest.

Finally, resolved to give up Charley entirely, she resolves on a plan to pick the best man. Her husband must be a good horseman. She informs them that at 8 o'clock sharp the next morning ever mother's son of them must be in his saddle ready for a swift and important ride.

The next morning she lines them up and tells them that they are to race to the county seat, each procure a marriage license and the first man back to the ranch will have the honor of being her husband.

There is a crack of her pistol and the race begins! Mile after mile they cover, each trying the utmost speed of his pony, until the courthouse is reached. The marriage licenses are procured and the real race back to the ranch begins.

In the meantime, the Limited, stopping at the county seat just for a moment, has dropped a passenger, a big handsome fellow—Charles Shea. Charley walks straight to the courthouse, procures a license to wed the daughter of Bar Z ranch, hires a horse and sets off at full speed in an effort to overtake the other cowpunchers.

Known to him only is a short cut to the ranch, and putting the spurs to his horse's flanks, he dashes down through rocky defiles and surging mountain torrents and arrives at the ranch several minutes ahead of the foremost of the racers. A minister is waiting, the license is brought out and the surprised and happy Alice marries him immediately. The chagrin of the other cowboys soon melts to laughter at the joke and congratulations and a rousing cheer are tendered the bride, all heartily agreeing that the best man has won.

GAUMONT.

(George Kleine)

A CONVICT'S HEROISM.—The story opens with a scene in a prison yard early in the XVII. century. This is manifest by the costumes worn by the prisoners and the uniforms of their soldier-guards, who stand by heavily armed, while the unfortunate convicts toil with picks and shovels. There has been a prearrangement among the prisoners to enable one of them to make good his escape. He is a political prisoner of noble character and pleasing personality. One of the convicts refuses to do his work and in order to suppress his rebellious spirit and to prevent the spreading of a possible revolt, the soldiers sieze and hustle him back to the jail.

Taking advantage of this temporary absence of his guards, the political prisoner gets away and after running through the woods he falls exhausted among some kindling wood and branches left by the woodcutters. In the meantime the news of the prisoner's escape has come to the ears of the governor, who offers a big reward for his capture and return to the prison.

Some peasant children gathering firewood, find the poor fellow and give him some of their lunch in return for which he carries a heavy bundle of fagots for them to their parents' cottage. There the peasants attend him and bring him food and drink. While they are gathered together in front of their cottage, a sheriff comes with papers to sieze their home because of their debts. The escaped prisoner, who has heard of the reward offered for his capture, urges the peasants to bind him, give him up to the governor, and claim the reward which will enable them to retain their home and live in comfort. This they do but are stricken with remorse afterwards at the fate they have brought on the heroic and generous prisoner.

A SET OF TEETH.—Mother-in-law has been presented with a new set of false teeth—the gift of her son-in-law.

The teeth are much admired by the family, but unfortunately their acquisition enables mother-in-law to chatter even more volubly than heofre. She gets into a quarrel with a neighbor on the street. In the argument she drops her teeth and loses them. A man passing by finds them. While examining them closely the "jaws" close with a snap on his nose. Another person coming along helps him to get rid of the biting teeth and places them on a bench. A gentleman of leisure coming along takes a seat on the bench, but instead of getting the rest and comfort he anticipated, he finds himself in the same predicament as if he had sat on a sharp-jawed rat-trap. His screams of anguish bring two policemen to the rescue, who gingerly remove the dental apparatus. They take it to the police station, but when they get there, in explaining to the chief how the teeth work, they themselves are cruelly bitten. At last the chief of police, with the assistance of a pair of tongs from the stove, succeeds in securing the teeth and throws them out of the window beyond the possibility of creating further trouble.

MOON FOR YOUR LOVE.—The story is enacted amid scenes of the Middle Ages and the costuming and settings are appropriate and most pleasing.

A poor young student loves a fair girl who tells him that she will only love him if he brings her the moon out of the sky and puts it in her apron.

Nothing daunted, the gallant scholar is about to sell his school books in order to get money to secure the services of an enchantress who will be able to get the moon for him.

He consults a good fairy, who leads him to the witch's cave where they undertake his mission and flit through the skies on their broomsticks. They capture the moon and bring it back with them to earth.

Our hero takes the moon to his sweetheart and she accepts it with his love, which terminates happily in the advent of a beautiful baby boy.

VISIONS OF A NAG.—A poor old, broken-down cab-horse is taken to his stable, where he dozes off to sleep and, in a comatose state, he dreams the whole story of his past life. First, he sees the fields where he appears as a lively colt, frisking around his mother and nibbling for the first time the juicy shoots of the tender grass.

Then he sees himself as a handsome young yearling disporting with other graceful young horses of his own age. Next, comes a vision of the Derby where he triumphs as the winner of the season.

Later he spends his declining years in the country and is finally sold to a cab company where he leads a hard and wearisome life on the streets drawing a heavy, old-fashioned cab. Evidently the last part of his dream is too much for him for as his driver comes for him in the morning he finds the poor beast breathing his last.

THE PALE FACE'S WOOING.—The first scene opens with a view of a little stream of water that starting in a tiny spring at the bottom of the foothills wanders slowly down through the valley and out over the plain. Down the bank rides Bud Dawson, the pale-face of our story, a young cowboy of the E. Z. outfit. Reaching the stream Bud throws himself from his pony and kneeling down takes a long drink of the cooling water. The pony follows his example. Both having satisfied their thirst, Bud again mounts the pony and moves on down the little gully. Around the next bend we find Silver Moon, a beautiful young Indian maid awaiting him. This is their trysting place and here they have met almost every day during the few weeks her tribe have had their tepees pitched along this valley. She glances around expectantly. Ah, here is Bud. Both faces light up with pleasure. Drawing from his pocket a string of "Nation" heads Bud places them around Silver Moon's neck. Now what will she give him for them? Shyly she tells him she has nothing to give. Bud tells her all he wishes is a kiss.

Further down the valley is the tepee of Silver Moon's father. Up to the tepee stalks Eagle Feather. In a few grunted words he tells of his to lay his treasures before the old brave. The old man sits watching in stoical silence. As a rifle is added to the pile his eyes glisten. When finally the pony is led forward, he gives his consent to the match. The pipe is solemnly smoked. The old brave calls Silver Moon. He tells her she is to marry Eagle Feather. Silver Moon starts back then straightens up and dramatically refuses. The old brave is astonished. He demands to know why. Silver Moon tells them she loves a pale-face.

The next day Eagle Feather is returning from a visit to his line of traps when he hears someone approaching. It is Silver Moon and Bud Dawson. Bud's arm is around her waist and Silver Moon's head is on his shoulder. As soon as they have gone, Eagle Feather comes from his hiding place and stands looking after them. Lifting his arm he swears vengeance against Bud.

Back to the tepee of Silver Moon's father hurries Eagle Feather and tells of having seen Silver Moon and Bud. The old brave's anger flames up again. He and Eagle Feather are busy planning how they can rid themselves of the cowboy, when Silver Moon is seen returning from her meeting with Bud. The old brave calls her forward and tells her she has been seen with Bud. He commands her to give him up. She refuses. The old brave takes her by the shoulder and puts her inside the tent. Calling the old squaw he tells her to keep guard over Silver Moon. The two now hasten away to intercept the cowboy before he returns to the outfit.

Prone on the ground they crawl along and hide themselves behind a bush. Up the path comes Bud. Past the two silent, motionless Indians he goes. Not a sound do they make as they rise to their feet. Down comes the club and Bud drops from his pony senseless. In a few seconds the senseless cowboy is bound hand and foot wit hhis own lariat and carried back to the tepee. The two Indians begin the discussion of how they shall make way with the cowboy. Eagle Feather tells of the deep pool in the river back of the camp. Throw him into this with a stone tied to him, no one will ever know what became of him. Silver Moon overhears the plot to kill her lover and hurries to his aid.

Arriving at the river bank the two Indians throw the bound cowboy into the bottom of their birch bark canoe moored there. Quickly jumping in they push off and are soon paddling away. Things look very black for poor Bud. But far up the stream we see brave little Silver Moon coming to his aid. Now she is speeding down to the place where she knows they will land. Ah, she hears them coming and from the water's edge she watches them land. Out of the canoe they lift Bud. Picking up a piece of rope they start off leaving him lying bound. But Silver Moon is hurrying down the opposite bank to his aid. If she can only reach him before the two Indians return.

Bud left alone is tugging desperately at the rope that binds him. Suddenly brave little Silver Moon rushes in. From her buckskin leggins she draws her little hunting knife and in a second Bud is on his feet and free. But Eagle Feather is upon him. Desperately they struggle. Now Bud has the knife. A quick downward thrust and Eagle Feather drops mortally wounded into the shallow water of the landing. But the old brave has heard the noise of the struggle and has returned. He and Bud grapple. Bud's knife is uplifted when Silver Moon rushes in and stops the blow. She pleads with Bud to spare her father. Bud consents and takes her in his arms, while the old brave crouches in fear. He knows his daughter is lost to him and his people and the pale-face has triumphed.

THE RED STAR INN.—A sailor who has returned from the war, receives a letter from his sick mother asking that he come home at once.

On his way he meets his sweetheart and he tells her he is going to see his mother.

As it takes more than a day to arrive at his destination he stops at an inn, called the Red Star Inn, where he asks for lodging for the night. The innkeeper informs him that all the rooms are taken but that he may sleep in the main room. It being a dreary night and very hard to travel, other wayfarers ask for lodging over night.

Among them is a pay warrant broker and another who appears to be a questionable character. They are told by the hostess of the inn that there are no rooms unoccupied but that if they would slep in the main room on the chairs they would be welcome.

The sailor noting that the claim agent is rather weak, offers him the use of the couch for the night. The sailor passes a sleepless night and goes out for a little while to have a smoke and to pass the time away.

When he goes out the other man who was apparently asleep, gets up and steals from the pay warrant broker a belt in which he carries money. The broker awakes as the money is extracted, and seizing a gun is about to shoot. Lo and behold! He drops dead at the feet of his assailant. Being a sufferer from heart disease, the shock was so great that it killed him.

The thief places the broker on the couch and covers him carefully to make it appear that he is still asleep. He also replaces the revolver near the dead man.

The thief then rests his head on the table in the same position as he was before. The sailor returns and goes to sleep again.

Early in the morning he gets up and makes his departure. A little later the other lodgers awake and all are assembled in the main hall. The claim agent is still lying as if he were asleep. The efforts of the hostess to awake him are in vain. They, for the first time, do all realize that he is dead. The next thought immediately is, who is responsible for his death? Of course it is the sailor, is the verdict of all those present. Who else could it be if not him? The hostess had seen him going out during the middle of the night and he departed before anybody else.

Immediately an alarm is sent out for his arrest. Imagine his surprise when a policeman hails him and places him under arrest.

He is brought back to the inn and identified. He swears by the American flag that he is innocent, but in spite of his assertions he is taken to jail.

His sweetheart comes to visit him in the prison, and when she arrives he tells her all. She believes in his honesty and integrity. His mother writes him that she believes that he is innocent and asks him to place his faith in God and to pray to Him.

His sweetheart is determined to trace the man who is responsible for the death of the broker and goes in pursuit of evidence. She arrives at the inn and finds a simpleton there who tells her that he saw the thief hide the money and that he had taken it out of the thief's hiding place and concealed it elsewhere. He leads her to his place and returns to her the money and the gag. She then rushes with the boy to the court room and when all hope is lost for the sailor and the judge is about to deliver the verdict, which is quite evident would be against him, the girl rushes in and places before the judge and the jury the new facts. Of course, the new evidence proves conclusively that the sailor is innocent.

Don't Throw Away Your Profits

If you start business with an inferior machine, that gives shaky and indistinct pictures, the same crowd won't go to your show twice—you're throwing away your patronage before you've gained it, and eating up your income on repairs.

THE EDISON KINETOSCOPE

is the machine on which you can depend to give the clearest, steadiest pictures, bring back the same crowd time after time and build you a paying business from the start. It requires fewest repairs, and will outwear any other motion picture machine made.

Write to-day for booklet giving full details, and a copy of the Edison Kinetogram.

The real thief, who was in the court room as a witness, is seen by the boy when the tries to escape. He points to him as being the one who hid the money. The man is placed under arrest and the innocent sailor acquitted.

MR. AND MRS. DUFF.—Mr. and Mrs. Duff are in their parlor. Mrs. Duff asks for money from her husband, and he gives her all he has. She wants more and searches through all his pockets. She takes off his hat and puts it on her head and goes shopping.

The unlucky husband decides to throw off his yoke.

Through the windows he sees an old-clothes man whom he calls and sells all the clothes belonging to him and his wife. Now he has some money. He buys the old-clothes man's hat and writes on a huge placard that he wishes to leave his home forever. Before leaving, he wants to take revenge against Mrs. Duff. He puts a pail full of water above the door so that as soon as Mrs. Duff enters she will be drenched. Mr. Duff is very much overjoyed with this idea. He then goes out.

When Mrs. Duff returns she cannot open the door. She looks through the windows and sees the room empty. She strides over the window sill and looks in vain for her husband. After reading the placard she is in a rage, she opens the door to run after Mr. Duff, but the pail drops down and she is drenched by the water.

In the meantime, Mr. Duff meets a beautiful girl with whom he becomes fascinated. He is so much absorbed with her attentions that he does not see an automobile which runs him down. While he is lying senseless in the street, a policeman runs to him and an alarm for an ambulance is rung. Unfortunately for Mr. Duff a card is found in his pocket and he is brought home once more.

He is severely injured. They wrap him well and lay him down on a couch. Mrs. Duff scolds him and he is very much afraid.

During her short absence, Mr. Duff writes a letter to his family asking for help and protection against his wife. He gives his letter to a boy through the window.

Mr. Duff's father and brother arrive. One is an old soldier, the other a strong, tall cowboy. Both are armed. The cowboy shoots often. Mr. Duff is delighted. They go to see Mrs. Duff to force her to change her ways and behave better to her husband.

Mrs. Duff is just finishing a day's exercise on the punching bag. She hears some noise and wants to know the cause. The three men rush into the room and begin to explain what they want. Mrs. Duff does not listen very much, she kicks them one after the other and they fall down. She then seizes poor Mr. Duff and gives him a good spanking.

THE COUNT'S WOOING.—The daughter of a millionaire is in love with a plain ordinary American, but unfortunately not rich.

One evening the young man asks the stern father for the hand of his daughter in marriage, but the old man refuses to grant his consent, because he has arranged a match with a French nobleman, the Count O. de St. Estephe, who is going to call the following day. When the girl is left alone, she indulges in shedding a few tears over the refusal of her father to grant his consent to the American.

She is informed by a letter that a number of friends will come the same night to rehearse a play. She explains her trouble to her friends, and they decide that they will don costumes and play the parts of lunatics and thus scare the count out of his wits and drive him off.

Well, what a circus they all had when the count made his appearance. One, dressed up as an American Indian, seizes the count by the hair and goes through motions as if to scalp him. Another appears dressed as a cowboy, who forces the count to dance at the point of a pistol. After he is through with the torture imposed upon him by these and also by others, he meets Lady Macbeth and later Ophelia. He is so much annoyed that he wants to make his escape, when suddenly one dressed as William Tell makes his appearance and places a pumpkin on the count's head.

He is about to take aim with an arrow, when the poor count faints away. He is hit on the head and he comes to his senses. Many other incidents are depicted until he finally makes his escape and is seen approaching a policeman whom he asks for aid from the attacks of lunatics who have escaped from an asylum. The policeman, with extra reserves, arrives at the millionaire's house to capture the alleged lunatics. The millionaire has just arrived home and is enraged at the encroachment of the police and declares that the count is intoxicated, and orders him ejected.

The father is now thoroughly disgusted with the count, and he grants his consent to the marriage of his daughter to the young American, thanks for the support of her friends.

PATHE FRERES.

CULTURE OF TEA IN JAVA.—There are two kinds of tea cultivated in Java, black and green tea. This picture shows how black tea is made. The freshly picked leaves are left in the sun for two hours, and are turned over from time to time, so each leaf will be well dried and lose that too sharp and bitter taste. Afterwards they are torrified or roasted for less than a minute and then rolled in balls.

The coloring in this film is beautiful. The scene, three years after the tea has been planted, is particularly beautiful; the full, green bushes tremble in the breeze while the coolies go from bush to bush with just their flat hats visible, looking like huge mushrooms scattered here and there over the field. Tea is such a popular beverage that everybody, especially the gentler sex, will find this film most interesting.

MISADVENTURE OF A PAIR OF TROUSERS.—An old workman, having received his week's wages, hurries home, anxious to conceal the money from his wife, whom he considers to be just a little bit too fond of spending money. Arriving at his house, he looks around for a good place to hide the precious coins. He finally decides to put the in his drawer, believing that his wife will never money in the pocket of a pair of trousers he finds think of looking there. Just as he puts the trousers back in the drawer, his wife enters and meets him with a request for a little change. The old fellow refuses absolutely, saying he has no money with him, and goes out, slamming the door behind him. The woman needs some money, however, and determines to get it one way or other, and so calls in an old clothes man. Looking through her husband's wardrobe she first drags out a coat, but as it is quite worn, the old fellow pushes it aside. She then hands him a waistcoat, but this also fails to appeal to him; but when she opens the bottom drawer and produces the trousers, which are almost new, a bargain is immediately made, and both the wife and the merchant of cast-off garments are made happy.

When the woman's husband makes his appearance again, she hastens to tell him that she has just sold a part of his wardrobe and thus secured the money he refused her. On hearing her words, the man rushes over to the bureau, and pulling out the bottom drawer in an agony of fear, finds the precious trousers missing. He then turns on his wife and beats her unmercifully before starting out to overtake the old clothes man.

Just as the husband and wife are having this altercation, the merchant of second-hand garments is already in the act of disposing of the precious trousers. A fashionable young man is the purchaser; the latter, taking a stroll with his ladylove, is unlucky enough to catch his trousers on the sharp edge of a fence, and of course is unable to proceed further in this condition. His companion, sympathizing with him, spies the old clothes merchant sitting under a tree looking over his stock. The couple rush over to him, and in a jiffy the young Adonis is putting on the trousers, one of the pockets of which holds our hero's week's wages. Just after the lovers have passed on, the owner of the trousers comes dashing down the road, and before asking the ragman any questions he administers an awful thrashing to the bewildered fellow. When explanations are made, the disappointed workman hastens to follow the direction his victim points out to him and starts out to overtake the couple. Before coming to the right party the excited man gives no less than three unfortunates he meets by the way a beating. One a bicyclist, another a fisherman and the third a strong, sturdy looking pedestrian, who almost does him up. He finally reaches the youth and his girl, who are spooning in the park, but with the recent beating he just received still fresh in his mind, he takes the precaution of examining the trousers before he proceeds to pull them off the struggling youth. When this is accomplished he dives into the pocket and fairly dances with joy as he counts out his entire week's wages—not a coin missing.

THE FLIGHT OF MONSIEUR VALETTE.—Count de la Valette, Counsellor of State under Napoleon I., who, though progressive in his ideas, severely condemned the excesses of the revolutionary party, was arrested on the return of the Bourbons and sentenced to death as a conspirator.

Pursued by the police, the Count decides to flee with his wife and little daughter. Their friend, the beautiful Diana de Vaudemont, who secretly admires the handsome Count, offers to conceal them in her home and they gladly take advantage of her kind offer. But while staying at the de Vaudemont's the romantic Diana endeavors to carry on a flirtation with the Count, who, devotedly attached to his wife, discourages all such advances on her part. Furious that she should be so treated, Diana de Vaudemont, in the heat of her passion, decides to give the Count up and goes herself to the King, Louis XVIII., and tells him where the fugutive is concealed.

It is not long therefore before the Count is arrested and cast into prison. In the meantime the woman who played him so falsely has repented her rash act and induces Mme. de la Valette, the Count's wife, to go to the King's palace at Versailles and beg his Royal Highness to forgive her husband. The wife finally musters up courage enough to go to the King, and we see her making her sorrowful way through the magnificent park of Versailles, the beauties of which are lost upon the heartbroken woman. The King, however, refuses the woman's appeal, but consents to let her and her little daughter have a last interview with the condemned man. As she and the child are conducted to the cell an idea comes to her, she will change clothes with her husband and he can escape with their little girl while she remains to greet the officers when they return. It all happens as she planned. We tremble with fear when the father and child come to the gate, but the sentry, shaking his head with compassion for the poor woman who is so soon to be a widow, opens wide the door and they pass out.

When the guard returns to de la Valette's cell he is astonished to find it empty, but hearing a noise he moves forward a step and almost stumbles over the trembling woman and she kneels begging for mercy. She receives little of this from the furious guard who, fearing for his own head now that he has let the prisoner escape, drags her before the King.

In the meantime mounted men are sent after the fleeing Count, whom we see at first a good distance away as he comes riding madly down the road. He stops a minute at a farmhouse and compels the bewildered farmhand at pistol's point to give him a fresh horse which he mounts and is off not a minute too soon, for his pursuers are now seen galloping down the road in his wake. And then the chase begins! Just as the officers of the law have almost caught up with the fugutive, Diana de Vaudemont, now only too glad to make amends for the wrong she did, stands waiting for him with a carriage into which he jumps and drives off, leaving the girl to greet the officers with a mocking smile on her lips as she points to the disappearing vehicle. The pursuing party, therefore, their horses completely spent, give up the chase and de la Valette goes free and is allowed to spend the rest of his days surrounded by his adoring wife and little daughter, for Louis, on hearing of the woman's strategy, impressed by her wifely devotion, merely turns and says, "Madame de la Valette has done her duty."

THE MAN WITH THE DOLLS.—A frumpy old professor, an enthusiastic collector of dolls of all nations and periods, gets into his head that if he only tries hard enough he will be able to infuse life into the pretty playthings. We see him now in his study surrounded by quantities of smiling dollies, the largest and most beautiful of which he holds in his hands. After making mysterious passes over its head and looking intently into its eyes he stands in an expectant attitude waiting to see a gleam of intelligence light up its countenance. But of course he waits in vain; in spite all the books he has read and all the experiments he has made the only thing he has accomplished thus far is to make himself ridiculous and unbearable in the eyes of everyone and to cause his wife, who naturally resents his giving so much time and attention to the dumb and lifeless figures, no end of unhappiness. She hits upon a plan to win back her husband's affection and make him forget all about his foolish hobby. So stealing into the study, she picks up the large, beautiful doll, her husband's special treasure, and going to a costumer's she procures a complete costume—which is almost a counterpart of the doll's, shoes, hat and all.

In the next scene, a great, long, narrow box is being carried into the professor's house and when he spies the words "Poupee Francaise" (French doll) marked on the cover he sends all the servants flying and proceeds to open it himself. Standing it up on end he takes off the wrappings and removes the cover and a cry of joy escapes him as he looks upon the most beautiful, perfect doll he ever laid eyes on. Catching it by the arm he places it on the couch, and seems disappointed at first that it should act just like any other doll, with one foot stuck stiffly out and hands that one could not mistake for wooden hands. However, he will give it a treatment and see what can be done. The very first pass of his hands seems to have effect—the doll's eyelids move, she makes a little step, then another, and then twirls round in response to his command. At last she sits down and smiles up into his face, and wild with delight the old fellow hurries out to get her some refreshment. The minute his back is turned, up jumps Miss Dolly (in reality his wife) and clasps her hands with joy at the success of her trick. When the old man comes back, his hopes are dashed to the ground, because in place of the beautiful creature he left on the chair he finds only the old staring doll in pink, but before he recovers from his surprise he hears a noise, and turning sees the lid of the French doll's box moving. Rushing over, he takes off the lid with trembling fingers, when out jumps his wife in her usual dress and embraces him fondly. Recognizing her now to be the beautiful doll, he kisses her and promises to give up his foolish hobby and devote himself always to the sweetest little woman in the world.

RUNNING IN HARD LUCK.—Dobbs, an unfortunate individual out of work and down on his luck, while wandering in the park one day, spies a man seated on a bench scrutinizing a piece of paper he holds in his hands. Dobbs' curiosity being aroused, he steps nearer and almost jumps with agitation on recognizing that it is nothing less than a thousand franc note that the stranger is examining so closely. With the thought of all he could do if only once possessed of such wealth running through his brain, Friend Dobbs, acting on the impulse of the moment, snatches the bill from the astonished stranger's hand and takes to his heels.

In his haste to get away with the precious bit of paper he just escapes being run over by a cab, collides with a baby carriage and knocks a bill-poster head over heels into a pushcart filled with oranges. Oblivious, however, to everything in

TWO WOMEN AND A MAN

The Fascinating Woman contrasted with the Faithful One

Paradoxical as may seem the expression "too much prosperity" there is a world of truth in those three words that is undeniable. Prosperity has caused more woe than poverty, and this Biograph story is one of the many cases which evince it. John Randolph was a happy man when he brought Molly as his bride to the humble little home in the village. Fortune smiled on his every endeavor and he becomes a rich man. His environment is not attuned with his wealth, so he removes to the metropolis. Here, his money serves aas credentials into the social whirl and he soon neglects his faithful wife for a fascinating woman of Bohemian circles. A divorce is the outcome, and a marriage with the charmer follows. Reverses occur and this young woman casts him off. Poor in pocket and crushed in spirit, he wanders back to the modest little cottage, realizing that he would now be happy had he never left it.

Length, 988 feet.

A MIDNIGHT ADVENTURE

This is a Biograph comedy, showing how a novel-reading sweetheart set a task for her lover, such as is only found in the story book. He must do something daring, so she suggests he go to her girl friend's house and steal a photograph and bring it to her. This he does, but while stealing the picture, the girl friend, whom he had never seen before, stole his heart, so the climax comes when she with the novel habit finds herself "stung."

Length, 519 feet.

SWEET REVENGE

A young woman jilted by her lover wishes to wreak revenge, or rather thinks she does, so dispatches a messenger boy to his new fiancee with his love letters. The boy on his way, she gloats over her deed, until suddenly she softens and is sorry. What would she not do to intercept him, hence you may imagine her joy at learning that the careless boy allowed the instrument of her vengeance to fall from his hand into the river and float away.

Length, 471 feet.

his desire to reach a secluded spot with his ill-gotten treasure, he finishes by falling into a sewer which is connected with the Seine.

Two policemen standing on the bank of the river hear all at once the most heartrending shrieks, and seeing the man (none other than our friend with the banknote) floundering around helpless in the water, they hasten to throw him a rope and drag him to the shore. But on seeing himself between two officers the unfortunate hastens to break loose and does not stop running until he reaches his room, where he locks himself in and proceeds to examine his treasure which has caused him so much trouble.

Horrors! Could anything be more terrible? On looking at the other side of the hill, our friend reads the words printed in large letter "Nonpareil Safe Deposit Vaults, Fireproof and Burglarproof."

GOOD LESSON IN CHARITY.—It is Easter Sunday, and little Mima, an only child of wealthy parents and therefore spoilt and inclined to be a little selfish, starts out with her mother to buy some Easter presents. On leaving a fine big shop where her mother had purchased her a big chocolate Easter egg, they are stopped by a poor beggarwoman bearing a thin, sickly looking child in her arms. Minna casts a look of disgust at the poor, shabby creature and her unattractive offspring, and tries to drag her mother away by the skirt when the latter opens her purse to give the unfortunates some money. But the mother pays little heed to her daughter for the moment; but asking the woman her address enters it in her note book. She then turns her attention to the pouting child and takes her severely to task for her uncharitable behavior. On reaching their house little Minna approaches her mother and tries to caress her, but the latter refuses to have anything to do with the naughty little girl, hoping in this way to make her realize how very unworthily she has acted. The little one pleads and begs, but all to no avail, until with the tears streaming down her face—because in her little selfish heart she loves her mother dearly—she is just about to leave the room when an idea comes to her. Going stealthily over to the table, she picks up her mother's purse and reads the poor beggar woman's address. Flying off to find her nurse she drags her upstairs and tells her of her plan, which is to give her big new Easter egg filled with the savings from her own bank to the poor woman she treated so badly. She must have her mother's permission first, so begs her nurse to intercede for her with her parent. The mother of course is only too delighted when she hears that her daughter has profited by the lesson she tried to teach her and follows the nurse and child as they go to the humble home in Goodwin Alley. On entering they find the poor woman seated beside an improvised cradle (an old dry goods box) which holds her ailing child. On seeing her distinguished guests, she looks up in wonder, but when the proud little Minna approaches her smiling and pours the contents of the big chocolate egg into her lap, she fairly gasps at the sight of so much wealth. Minna's mother is then seen to peep in at the door and notes with a heart full of joy what happiness her daughter's sacrifice has brought to the poverty stricken home.

SAM'S ARTISTIC BEARD.—Papa having summarily discharged the butler, his daughter May thinks of a good plan by which she can see a little of her adored Sam, for whom her father has always shown a great aversion. So she writes Sam a letter and proposes that he apply for the position of butler in their house. Sam jumps at his love's scheme and is soon engaged by May's father. Now, Sam is the possessor of a wonderfully long, silky beard, which causes the different maids in the house to lose their hearts to him immediately. Sam, in spite of the humble station of his female admirers, greatly enjoys their admiration, being a vain man, and encourages them not a little. One day, May's father catches him having a pleasant little chat with one of the maids, and thinking to make his butler less attractive to the feminine eye, orders him to cut off his beautiful silky beard immediately. The poor fellow reluctantly makes the sacrifice, but as Samson's strength rested in his hair, so it was with our friend Sam, who once his beard has been cut loses his power to attract the gentler sex. When May sees him she bursts into a fit of uncontrollable laughter and sends him down to the kitchen where the maids all make merry at his expense.

RIGOLETTO.—The picture opens with the court of Francis I. of France, that weak and pleasure-loving monarch, whose fondness for a pretty face has become a joke among his courtiers. The latter are now dancing attendance upon their lord and master, each anxious to receive a glance or nod of approval.

Rigoletto, the court jester, though himself the toy and plaything of the King, entertains nothing but contempt for these royal men and women of the court who fawn upon their sovereign and stoop to all sorts of folly in order to maintain their place in his good graces.

The courtiers themselves have long had a grudge against Rigoletto—and besides are quite well aware of the fact that he is no friend of theirs; so one day putting their heads together they decide upon a plan to get even with him for the many mean little tricks he has played them.

Rigoletto on different occasions has been seen by some members of the royal household in the company of a very beautiful girl, and of course it is immediately taken for granted that this lovely maiden is the old jester's sweetheart, when in reality she is his own daughter, Gilda, to whom he is devotedly attached and of whom he is immensely proud.

The revenge planned by the courtiers is therefore to present the beautiful Gilda to the King, believing that she will be flattered by the admiration of one of such exalted rank and will therefore forget all about the poor old jester, Rigoletto.

They carry out their plan successfully and when Rigoletto hears that his daughter, the dearest thing to him on earth, is actually present in the palace, he becomes like a madman, knowing as he does what an unscrupulous person his sovereign is, and begs and implores the mocking courtiers to help him save his child. Finally he meets Gilda leaving the royal apartments, and the scene between father and daughter is one of the most pathetic ever witnessed. The jester upon whom everyone is accustomed to look as a joke, assumes a dignity as he clasps his child in his arms and weeps tears of outraged pride upon her beautiful head.

In order to protect his daughter, Rigoletto decides to flee with her from Paris and the court, but before leaving determines to punish the King for the wrong he has done him, and therefore loses no time in securing the services of a desperate fellow, Sparafucile by name, who is ready to commit any crime, no matter how heinous, if assured of a large reward.

It is decided therefore between the cut-throat and Rigoletto that the former is to invite Francis to his house, where the ruffian's beautiful sister Maddalena is to be the attraction. They know the King loves to go on these larks disguised as a student and will no doubt jump at the idea. During the course of the evening Sparafucile is to deal the King a death blow and once the breath has left his body, the latter is to be securely tied up in a sack and delivered to Rigoletto who will see to its disposal.

The plan works famously, for Sparafucile's sister is very beautiful and the King seems to be completely carried away with her.

Now Gilda though willing to obey her father in regard to leaving Paris for good, cannot hide the fact that she is very sad at the thought of being separated from her royal lover, because with his fascinating ways and highbred airs Francis has made the lowly girl love him. This fact worries Rigoletto not a little, so he decides to prove to Gilda that the King was only amusing himself with her and would show the same attentions to any other pretty maiden he might chance to meet. Therefore on their way out of Paris the father and daughter (the latter disguised as a boy) stop at Sparafucile's house, as Rigoletto knows this is the night for the King to pay his visit. We see Gilda as she peeps through the window and witness her emotion as she beholds the one she loves showering attentions on the pretty sister of Sparafucile. All at once, her curiosity is aroused by hearing voices and as her father has gone to see to their horses she puts her ear to the door and listens, and to her horror learns of her father's plan to assassinate the King. For Parafucile, taking his sister aside, is telling Maddalena that he is to be paid for the job and must carry out his part of the agreement. Maddalena begs him to spare the life of their royal guest and suggests to him that he can murder the first one that knocks at the door instead and deliver his body to Rigoletto when he comes for his prey. The ruffian consents and it is then that Gilda makes up her mind to sacrifice herself for the one she loves.

Begging her father to delay their journey they retrace their steps, but Gilda returns to Sparafucile's home and knocking at the door, immediately receives a blow on the head and we next see the ruffian and his sister hauling out the sack for the jester when he calls for his victim. Hurriedly Rigoletto drags his burden away, but just as he stops to gloat over his prey he hears the voice of the King, who having heard the plan to kill him, when he leaves the house breaks into song at the thought that he has gotten away with his head still on his shoulders. Horrified to hear that voice Rigoletto with his eyes starting from his head exclaims, "Then what is in this sack!" and hastily unfastening the cord that keeps it together, his heart almost stops beating as he recognizes none other than his child, his beautiful Gilda, whom he breathlessly tries to revive and who, a tiny spark still burning in her poor broken frame, raises herself on her arm and with her last breath begs her father to forgive the King.

AN INDIAN'S BRIDE.—This Bison film tells of a young Western girl and her love for an Indian. A Mexican, who attempts to caress her, is driven away by the Indian lover. Little Bear is sitting alone in his camp when his sweetheart enters. He gives her many gifts in exchange for her photograph, and she leaves him gazing at it in rapt admiration. The girl, upon returning home, displays her presents, and acknowledges her love for Little Bear, who at that minute comes upon the scene. The father orders him away. The girl awaits an opportunity to slip from the house, and as she enters the woods she sees Little Bear's sister fall from a rock, and goes to her aid. By this time the girl's flight is discovered and the father goes in pursuit. He passes the spot where the Mexican and his band are sitting. After he goes by, orders are given and the band mount their horses and ride off. The Western girl has in the meantime returned home with the squaw, whom she places on the sofa. She shows much distress when she discovers the Mexican and his men outside the door. The squaw sees the situation, and by the time the Mexicans break into the house she has managed to send a note by climbing to the roof and shooting an arrow, to which the note is tied, high into the air. They take the girl prisoner and ride away with her. The father searches for his daughter in the Indian camp, and while there the arrow bearing the note falls to the ground. After learning its contents, he and the Indian return home, hear particulars, and the Indian promises to bring the girl back. After a hard struggle, Little Bear releases her and they ride off, pursued by the Mexicans. The girl reaches her home in safety and the father gives her to Little Bear, who, to please the father, adopts civilian clothes.

THE CURSED CAGE (Aquila).—Returning from the battlefield, a small band of defeated warriors receive a welcome home, and one of the number is anxiously questioned by Ruth as to the fate of her father, whom she misses from their number. William, her lover, informs her that her parent had failed to escape with them, and his safety is a matter of considerable doubt.

Ruth is greatly distressed, and upon the advice of a friend she seeks assistance from a witch. By some mysterious power the witch brings a vision before the view of Ruth and her lover, revealing her father imprisoned in an iron cage at the top of a lonely tower. Confiding their troubles to the witch, Ruth and William act upon her instructions and disguise themselves as strolling players. Under this disguise they gain entrance to the castle wherein the father of Ruth is confined, and are commanded to entertain the owner, Baron Wilfred de Lautarge.

The Baron, pleased with the comeliness of Ruth, attempts to become too familiar, and William, coming to her aid, is recognized by the Baron as his cloak falls from him and discloses his identity. Angered at thus being deceived, the Baron draws his sword. William, defending himself, eventually disables his adversary, and secures his bunch of keys in the hope of their being useful in releasing the prisoner in the iron cage.

After wandering through many passages and stairways, Ruth and William finally discover the entrance to the tower. To the joy of the prisoner, they effect his release.

Through the aid of a good monk, the old man and his rescuers are handed over to the care of some peasants, who conceal them beneath a hay-covered cart and convey them toward a haven of safety. The castle guards, however, eventually follow and overtake the cart. A fight ensues and the guards are in the end put to flight as the result of additional forces siding with Ruth and William. The father returns home, and all are congratulated on the satisfactory outcome.

THE MYSTERIOUS LUGGAGE (Eclair).—Continual thefts from the luggage bureau of the railway station puzzle the superintendent completely, and he calls in the services of a clever detective. With a view to trapping the thieves he has a specially contrived case placed among the baggage and conceals himself within. His patience is rewarded during the night when he observes a suspicious-looking individual emerge from one of the trunks lying around. Fully equipped with a burglar's outfit, the ingenious thief is about to commence operations when the detective and his man pounce upon the astonished robber and fasten him up in the case they had been hiding in. Awaiting further developments, the detective takes his place in the trunk from which the thief had appeared. Then next morning, when the thief's accomplices make their appearance to claim their luggage, the detective adds two more culprits to his collection.

A MOTHER'S HEART (Ambrosio).—In the form of an elegantly dressed gentleman, Mephistopheles appears with the intention of working havoc in the heart of a woman, whose devotion to her little daughter embodies all that true affection which only a mother can express for her first-born. Although endeavoring to resist the temptations of the persuasive lover, the woman becomes aware of her weakness against this designing person, who tells her that if she will not give him her love voluntarily, he will steal her heart by force. Then the man's form is mysteriously replaced with that of the Devil, who abstracts the heart of his victim and departs.

The little daughter, returning from school, greets her mother with much show of affection, but her parent gives back but a cold response. The Devil has transformed her into a different person. Her affections have been stolen. All the warmth of her soul, all motherly instinct and love have departed. The child is much distressed at the sudden change in her mother, and after many tears, prays to the Holy Virgin for help. Her pleadings are answered by the appearance of a fairy, who comforts the child and explains how she can help to restore the lost bond of love. "Your mother's heart has been stolen," she says, "and this veil I give to you will help you to overcome all obstacles in your search for the person who has taken possession of your mother's love. Go to the Devil's Castle, and there you will regain your mother's heart."

Little Elsie sets out upon her mission, and her progress being stopped by a river, the magic veil is brought into use, with the result that a bridge is immediately brought into existence for the help of the little wayfarer. Next threatened by two ill-looking witches, she again employs the fairy's veil, and raises up a barrier of fire and smoke to the defeat of her pursuers. Eventually reaching the Devil's Castle, she wields her wonderful power in overcoming the castle guards, and gains entrance to the sanctum of his satanic majesty. But here she is rudely treated and cast into a dungeon. One of the devil's minions, however, taking compassion upon her, guides her to the Devil's throne, where the great tempter and heart robber is slumbering.

Now is the moment of her triumph. Never was a heart sought with greater fervor and desire than little Elsie evinces in her anxiety to regain this lost love of her mother. With a supreme effort she casts the veil over the sleeping demon, and in an instant he is secured in bonds of cord from which he cannot escape. Courageously approaching the Devil, the little girl, by a mysterious power, is able to gain possession of the stolen heart, and in ecstasies of delight returns home with her priceless treasure. With her former affections reinstated, the mother is able to respond with nature's promptings to the caresses and love of her child. The bond of unity being once again firmly established, the machinations of the Devil are defeated.

LOVE OF LITTLE FLORA (Itala).—A little circus dancer is rescued by a well-to-do young man from the cruel treatment of her master, and placed by her benefactor under the guardianship of his fiancee. The kindness she receives touches a tender chord in her young heart, and not realizing the existence of affections between her protector and the lady who has undertaken to care for her, she secretly treasures up a love for the man who had taken such kind interest in her welfare. But one day she is rudely awakened to the fact that she can be nothing to him, and in a letter explains that she loves him too well to be able to remain under his guardianship.

Fearing to endanger his progress with the lady of his heart, she leaves the home in which she has enjoyed such happiness, and eventually returns to the old life of the circus. As "Flora, the Queen of the Air," she makes her appearance to the plaudits of an appreciative audience one night, and ascends to the trapeze to perform her startling feats. While suspended in the air, her attention is diverted to a couple of spectators in a love-making attitude in one of the boxes below, whom she recognizes as her former kind-hearted guardians. Unnerved by the sight of the man she had secretly loved, she loses her balance and falls with great force to the ground beneath her. Carried to the dressing room, she is found to be seriously injured, and expires in the arms of her old-time protector, who had come forward among the number of willing helpers.

GODDESS OF THE SEA (Le Lion).—Escaping from her home of coral and the pearl-studded paths in the dominion of Father Neptune, an adventurous young goddess finds herself in the land of mortals, and like ordinary beings, dreams of love begin to take possession of her. In her loneliness, Cupid comes to her assistance, and taking a random shot, he flings from his bow the arrow to which some sensitive youth must fall a prey. Under Cupid's guidance, the goddess is taken to where a comely young shepherd has fallen under the influence of the love-dealing arrow, and forthwith the goddess gains a devoted lover in the person of the shepherd. Leaving his herd of goats, he spends his hours in companionship with this fascinating denizen of the mighty deep, pouring into her thirsting ear praises and flattery with all the fervor of his newly generated passion. Father Neptune assembles his merry band of sea-nymphs to serenade the lovers, and the course of love proceeds with delight to the heart of the goddess. But suddenly the shepherd is rudely awakened to a sense of worldly things and he realizes that his herd is straying away. With the music of the shepherd's pipe ringing, as if it were a warning note through the air, he attempts to break away from the bonds into which the fascination of the goddess has drawn him. The goddess herself will not allow her sturdy lover to depart so easily. The cup of ecstatic pleasure from which she has been allowed to take a sip cannot be rudely taken away. She clings as only a sea-nymph should, to the lover who has awakened new emotions in her young heart. With a determined effort, however, the shepherd breaks away from her hold and in so doing falls into the sea, thus ending the dream of love. Weeping over the form of her lover, brought to the shore by Neptune's followers, the goddess is left to mourn her loss, and pour forth the wailings of a broken heart.

JULIUS CAESAR (Itala).—The story shows Julius Caesar, who, after returning from his victories, is offered a crown, which he refuses to accept. Cassius, Casca and other Romans of great standing in the state are jealous of the success of Caesar and turn to Brutus, who second to Caesar is the most influential citizen in Rome, and use him as a tool by playing upon his conceit. They praise him, and make him an accomplice in the work they have planned; namely, to assassinate Caesar. While they are engaged in asking a favor, which Caesar refuses, the conspirators rush up and stab him.

THE POWERS COMPANY.

A RED MAN'S LOVE.—Goodheart, a young Indian chief, is affianced to Birdwing by her father, Lone Wolf, chief of the tribe, previous to the tribe going on the warpath.

The Indian uprising leads to the capture of numerous people, among whom is Eva Ward, after a desperate encounter and struggle on the part of her father, a settler.

During the absence of the Indian braves on another raid, Eva assists in the escape of the prisoners, while guarded by squaws of the tribe.

Eva is recaptured, tied to a tree and about to be executed, when Goodheart intercedes.

At night Goodheart effects the escape of Eva, and, pursued by the Indian band, Eva is wounded by an arrow.

Goodheart, wild with rage at the wounding of Eva, plants the arrow on the bank of the lake and calls upon the Great Spirit to witness his renunciation of his people.

Goodheart brings help to Eva, and the settler, aware that Goodheart can never return to his tribe, says, "Our home shall be your home."

Birdwing trails Goodheart to his new home and pleads for his love and the return to the tribe, but he bids her to leave, as he loves Eva.

Eva overhears them, and when Goodheart declares his love, Eva, in affright, calls her parents.

Goodheart pleads his cause to the settler and his wife, but they bid him leave.

Goodheart, returning to the bank of the stream, sees the arrow still upright in the earth, makes his peace with the Great Spirit, and plunges the white arrow into his heart.

THE FOREST RANGER'S DAUGHTER.—The old game warden in this picture is swearing in a deputy—a bright-faced, athletic young chap, and he is equipped with placards announcing the hunters' game limit. Among the penalties it reads that for killing a doe (young deer) the fine is $200. The old man has a most winsome daughter, and soon we see her going out for a lark in the woods, gun in hand, riding at the side of the new deputy. In the course of their rambles, he tries to talk love to her but she evades the issue, dashes away on her horse, and he just cannot catch up with her.

Away, out in a thicket, she sights some game, raises her rifle, and puff! she has brought down a doe! Running to the spot, she is just bending over the animal, when the deputy appears. Now, of course, he loves her dearly, but then isn't he a deputy, and mustn't he do his duty? The ranger's daughter cannot help him out, and when she finally extends her hands to be handcuffed by him, he loses his nerve and lets her go. Here is a puzzle fit for Solomon, for he simply must do his duty as a deputy game warden. But while he stands there thinking the girl's father, his chief, appears on the scene. He discovers the dead doe, and wants to know about it; but the young man takes all the blame on himself, shielding the girl. "You're a fine deputy," says the forest ranger, "and I'm going to make you pay the $200 fine for killing this doe."

He strips him of his recently acquired badge of authority, and marches him back to headquarters. Here he is just upbraiding him for his negligence and contempt of the rules, when the daughter catches on to the sacrifice about to be made. And very promptly and sweetly she interferes, telling her father that she shot the doe herself.

The old man is now in a predicament. He surely wants to be law abiding, and what can he do but let it cost him a $200 fine on his daughter's account? That's tough. But he gets an idea. Handcuffing them together (and handcuffs easily allow of their holding hands) he marches them off to a pretty spot in the woods and leaves them sitting on a tree stump. While he is gone they fall asleep. The father soon returns—with a minister! The couple is gently awakened, and in confusion prepare for their last rites.

But no, the father is not going to execute them; he is going to marry them. The shackles are removed, the young man's own ring serves the purpose, the clergyman's hands are raised, and they are made one. Now, explains papa, the law says that a husband is responsible for his wife's debts, and she certainly owes the State $200 for shooting the doe. The new husband promptly pays up, and papa and the clergyman leave him as he is taking back $200 from his little wife—in kisses.

A Message to Napoleon or an Episode in the Life of the Great Prisoner at Elba

After the united powers of Europe had been successful in defeating Napoleon's vast armies, the great Emperor himself was taken prisoner, and sent into exile to the Island of Elba, on the coast of Corsica. His loyal friends in France, however, would not rest, and were untiring in their efforts to liberate the Emperor from his prison. The first part of this film depicts a meeting of a few of these friends and supporters, who formulate a plan. A letter is written to Napoleon, explaining that a messenger will bring him all particulars and plans of a plot to liberate him. A young officer is elected to take the dangerous journey to Elba, to carry to Napoleon the message from his friends. But these friends did not count on the enemies which every great man has, and did not observe that one of them attended their eventful meeting. The traitor informs the police, whose assistance he obtains, and together they go in pursuit of the messenger. Tired and exhausted, the messenger finds rest for a night at a small inn on the road, but not long after his arrival there, his two pursuers arrive also, and over a glass of wine discuss how they can best capture the messenger. The daughter of the innkeeper, a great admirer of Napoleon, overhears the discussion of the two men, and immediately warns the messenger, who has just sufficient time to ride away, hotly pursued by the enemies. Fortunately, he soon reaches a farm house on his way, and induces the farmer to give him other clothes. Hastily changing his dress, and with the assistance of the farmer, who shows the pursuers the wrong way, he manages to get to the frontier. He arrives safely at the coast, from which he is to take the boat to Elba. Before he lands on the coast of the island, his small craft is demolished by the waves, and he is compelled to swim through the foaming sea to his destination. But even here, on this lonely island, he is discovered by a sentry, who uses his rifle effectively, and with a bullet wound in his shoulder, the poor messenger turns back into the water, pretending to be killed. Swimming to a more secluded spot along the coast, he sees the figure of his beloved Emperor, standing by the water, looking sadly in the direction of his country. Trembling with excitement, the brave messenger approaches Napoleon and delivers him the message. Napoleon, deeply moved by the loyalty of his friends, thanks the messenger in kind words, and embraces him, to show his deep and sincere gratitude. This beautiful subject is sure to be a winner. Photographic quality of the very highest order.

Advance Film Descriptions

Week of November 14th to 20th 1909

Nov. 16th "A Convict's Heroism" (Gaumont). Drama. 638 feet. A cleverly acted drama of the Middle Ages, showing that a convict can sometimes be a truly noble character. This is indeed a triumph of Motion Picture Production.

Nov. 16th "A Set of Teeth" (Gaumont). Comedy. 354 feet. A set of false teeth, which, being operated by spring mechanism, attach themselves to tender portions of the anatomy of those who handle them. If you enjoy a good laugh, don't miss this.

Nov. 17th "Workhouse to Mansion" (Urban-Eclipse). Drama. 610 feet. A woman's noble and heroic character most cleverly presented in a film that is a masterpiece of the photographic and histrionic art. It pleases everybody.

Nov. 17th "Fighting Suffragettes" (Urban-Eclipse). Comedy-Drama. 380 feet. Just the right picture to show in these stirring times, as it shows the woman how much better it is to stay at home. Teach your audience this lesson.

Nov. 20th "Moon for Your Love" (Gaumont). Magic Drama. 424 feet. An exquisite fairy pantomime in beautiful colors, telling how a beautiful girl promises her love to a poor youth if he can bring her the moon. Thanks to the friendly assistance of a good fairy, he is enabled to grant her wish, and thereby wins her love.

Nov. 20th "Visions of a Nag" (Gaumont). Equine Traggedy. 517 feet. A pathetic yet pleasing story of the dreams of a poor old broken-down cabhorse, who sees in a vision the pleasant events of his past life, when he was young and vigorous.

We shall never deal in platitudes—but in moving picture films ONLY. While our goods are such as set the standard—yet always we cry EXCELSIOR.

Now you that have been longest in the moving picture business, either exchange or exhibitor—you are the ones who know best that NEVER before has there been offered such a list of FEATURES, not once in a while, but week after week.

They are pace makers.
They are record breakers.
They are money makers.
They not only get the business, but hold it.

You've heard of the town fool who stuck his finger in a pail of water and, after taking it out, looked for the hole?

Don't that remind you of the exchange man and the exhibitor who buys junk and rents junk and expects to find a profit?

Our programs appeal to anyone who is alive to the opportunity they afford. They appeal to the public taste and temper—the fountain head of the success of everyone in the picture business. The public is the judge and it demands our programs.

Here is an unsolicited letter from one of the many who realizes it:

A Roaring, Laugh Producing, Slap Bang, Farce Comedy

Something doing every foot of film except the titles, and they speak for themselves

Our hero creates laughter without an automobile blowing up or houses falling down upon him.

The story does not deal with the time-houored excuse some husbands offer their wives, as the title would suggest.

Pressing business is our hero's motive for haste, and the tailor's means of livlihood.

This is one of those films that the audience will look at more than once, and of which exhibitors will not complain of repeating.

Yes, our pictures are good, but we are not stopping at that Constant improvement all along the line is our watchword, and we promise that every additional release will contain better stories, better acting, better photography if it is possible.

IMP

And the sixth IMP release will be a serio comic about 950 feet long, called

HER OWN WAY

(Monday, November 29th)

This subject is the kind of picture the exhibitors and exchanges have been clamoring for, so I know it will make an immediate hit. The theme is simple, involving a clever wife, her husband, a hat and money—something that everybody will appreciate. It is thoroughly human and leaves a good taste in the mouth. "Her Own Way" will make money for YOU!

"THIS IS IMP NIGHT"

Several exhibitors are making a hit by having a regular "Imp night" at their theaters and advertising it with a sign in front. They tell me it helps like everything, puts the crowd in a good humor and creates a more personal interest in the pictures. Try it. The simple little schemes like this are the things that count the most in the end.

WHY THEY MARRIED

One married for money—but her husband lost his money and his life in the struggle of Wall Street and she was reduced to penury. A second married to escape the necessity of working—her husband proved to be a follower of the horses and she was compelled to take in washing to supply him with money for his pikiug bets. The third wanted to reform the convivial sweetheart—to her own sorrow. An old maid wanted a man—but she didn't get a real one. The last didn't know just how it happened—but she thought it might he love—it was, and of the lasting sort, as the eliuax proves. A dainty and original idea with a blendiug of dramatic and comedy in just the right proportion.

JEAN VALJEAN

The fourth—and last—of the notable releases derived from Victor Hugo's Les Miserables. With a few slight changes to heighten the dramatic interest and advance the action more rapidly the story of Maurius' love for Cosette, his distrust of Jean and the final elearanee of doubt is told. The sensational scenes of the barricades, the flight through the sewers of Paris and the torture scene in the home of the Thenardiers serve to keep the dramatic action keyed up to the highest pitch. The last of a most notable series de luxe.

Editorial.

A Note of Warning.

In the licensed releases for the week ending November 20, there are no less than seven subjects of about 1,000 feet in length. To be strictly accurate, they vary from 930 to 1,030, so that we might average them at 1,000 feet. Now a thousand feet of film when passing through the machine at a normal speed takes up from fifteen to twenty minutes of the audience's time. In that fifteen or twenty minutes many things may be told, as experience proves. You can illustrate the progress of a war, as has been done; you can condense a three-volume novel, which has also been done; you can run up and down the entire gamut of comedy and tragedy, which has also been done; you can present a Shakespearean production or one of Scott's romances or one of Hugo's or one of Tennyson's poems—in fact, there is hardly a subject, except, perhaps, the Wagner unaccompanied opera, which cannot be, or has not been, shown on the moving picture screen by means of a thousand feet of film. In other words, into that thousand feet of film you can condense all the dramatic action that, ordinarily, on the talking stage, takes up about eight to ten times the same amount of time. For when we go to a theater we generally take our seats round about 8 o'clock and quit at about 11 o'clock, with a consciousness of having had a full evening's entertainment.

It will therefore be seen from this that a thousand-foot subject is, from the public point of view, a very important item, supplying as it does for five or ten cents in twenty minutes what at an ordinary theater it would be called upon to pay 75 cents or $1 plus two or three hours' time. That being so, the public have got to look upon these thousand-foot subjects as eggs that are full to the shell with meat. But are they? Are they always full? We are forced to admit that they are not, and also that the public is occasionally showing signs of disappointment thereat.

From the film manufacturing point of view, a thousand feet of film is a great undertaking, usually costing a large amount of money in the production and passing into the domain of the feature film. Your Pathe thousand-footer, with such a subject as the "Prodigal Son," "Rigoletto" or "Drink" has demanded a wide stage, for it is not to be done justice to in maybe three or four hundred feet. And herein lies a fallacy into which we think some of the other manufacturers are falling. They are sending out thousand-foot subjects with not enough subject, that is, not enough action in them. We referred to this matter somewhat generally last week; now we come closer to it because observation that we have made since our last article on "Linked Sweetness Long Drawn Out," has convinced us that many of these thousand-foot films are not satisfying the public. The public at large does not quite know why, but there is a feeling of disappointment and dissatisfaction. In other words, they have been asked to attend a subject for twenty minutes without getting in return the requisite number of thrills, excitement, or whatever other emotion an audience goes to a moving picture theater to have aroused. They have not been interested.

On the other hand, we have noticed that the shorter subjects, what we might call the 600-footer, the 530-footer, to strike an average, usually goes better with the public. We noticed this fact only one day this week where the success of the afternoon was won by a 700-foot subject, whereas a subject of considerably greater length seemed to weary the audience. In the latter case the interest was not maintained at the highest tension throughout.

We think this point is deserving of the serious notice of film producers. Whenever a thousand feet of film is taken, it is desirable to insure that it has plenty of action and, moreover, that the dramatic interest is sustained and cumulative. Then a powerful motive should be visible all through the story, otherwise the interest of moving picture audiences will relax—a very dangerous thing just now. Nothing kills public entertainment so much as flatness. A week or two's flatness in the moving picture theaters of the United States will kill the business as dead as a door nail, and we, who are daily, almost hourly, in touch with moving picture audiences, warn manufacturers as we have warned them before, that they must keep up a very high level indeed of dramatic quality if they want the business to last.

Frankly, during the last few weeks a certain indefinable dullness has stolen over the picture theaters which is having its effect upon the public. A public, by the way, one of the most fickle in the world, easy to attract, easy to repel and always difficult to recall to a form of entertainment which it has once rejected. For that is the American public, and this is its attitude towards the moving picture.

Moving Pictures in Public Schools.

There seems some ground for the belief, or rather the rumor, that the public school authorities of New York City will adopt the moving picture at the evening lectures which are such agreeable features of the Winter months. We hope that this is the case. From time to time announcements appear in the newspapers (and we quote one this week from the New York "World") relative to the highly educational value of motion pictures, but too much importance need not be attached to these deliverances. The fact of the matter is that the advantages of the moving picture for educational, scientific, and industrial purposes are not yet appreciated to the extent of their worth. This form of illustration is, roughly speaking, only some thirteen years old. We know that in the life of an invention, or any advance, this is a very short span of time, indeed. It took many years before steam, electricity, the telephone, and other scientific marvels received their full meed of appreciation from the public.

So it is with the moving picture, which, in many minds at present, is merely an interesting trick of the camera for entertaining and amusing the idle. You do not realize that the moving picture, as it is popularly called, is the scientific synthesis of motion. Motion, as we know by observation and teaching, is life itself, of which heat, light, sound, electricity are just so many manifestations. People, as we say, are accustomed to look upon the moving picture as a trick. Few realize or understand that it has far nobler uses than this. It is just as useful in human progress as the lancet of the surgeon, the pestle and mortar of the chemist, the theodolite of the engineer or the compass of the mariner—it adds to the sum of human knowledge that progress and achievement. If, as Shakespeare puts it, "all the world is a stage," then the moving picture camera is the recording agent of what takes place on that stage.

So we read with feelings of extreme pleasure the statement that the moving picture camera is to figure this Winter in the public schools. Of course, we know that in colleges and universities, and scientific institutions generally, the moving picture camera, or rather the moving picture projector, is no stranger; and—here we write under correction—that it has been adopted by State authorities for the purpose of elementary education, which is what we most desire to see. We want to see the child of the State, as every child is, taught his lessons as far as possible by means of moving pictures, so that the infantile mind can more readily grasp the fundamental facts of geography, physiology, history, and maybe other subjects which can be illustrated by means of films. We all know, of course, that the ordinary picture or illustration occupies a conspicuous place on the walls of every schoolroom. We have all sat and suffered under it. These diagrammatic instructions, however, have served their purpose. The age demands more rapid methods of teaching, and in those methods we include illustration by motion. There is an enormous field open for educational uses in the moving picture, and the extent of that field is hardly realized by the people in the business, who are just now simply content to make subjects to please the amusement seeking public.

The Poster End.

The poster is or has been the Ishmael of the moving picture business. Until recently nobody seemed to care for him. Any old thing in the way of a crude design and crude printing suited your indifferent moving picture theater exhibitor—any old thing with some idea of the dramatic situation and plenty of crude color was considered good enough to put outside the moving picture theater.

But a little while ago it occurred to some alert minds that better things than these could be done, and so the manufacturers and others have been sending out especially made posters illustrating the particular pictures shown. One or two of the manufacturers have had pieces of their film subjects suitably enlarged, and these when surrounded with striking borders make very effective posters. This is symptomatic of the progressive instinct. The moving picture theater is progressing all along the line, in the quality of the pictures, the house, the audience, the music, and so it is only reasonable to expect progress in the matter of such an important item as the poster.

The poster to an ordinary theater is of vital importance. You have only to look on the billboard of any large advertising station to realize it. Money without stint is spent on these posters. The best work of the color press is put into them; the brain of the designer or the artist, as he may choose to call himself, is utilized to the utmost to make pictures for some striking scene in the play advertised which shall arrest the attention of the passer-by and cause him to visit the theater. And this is true of both small and large posters. It is a fundamental axiom of theatrical management that money must never be stinted in respect of posters.

Is the moving picture theater coming to the same state of things? Are we near the time when the billboard will contain 24-sheet posters illustrating some scene in a Pathe or Biograph film? Shall we see fine specimens of color printing, good designs and all the rest of it, advertising the films all over the country? Are we, in short, to witness the theatricalization of the moving picture at the poster end of matters? It certainly looks as if we were, judging by the trend and the tendency of the moving picture at this very moment. For, as we have pointed out over and over again, it is rapidly becoming theatricalized at all ends of the game. There seems, indeed, no reason why as much money should not be spent in advertising the film representation of "Rigoletto," as in advertising the opera. One is simply a manifestation of a series of light waves; the other merely the expression of a number of sound waves. One primarily appeals to the eye, the other primarily appeals to the ear. And this is all the difference between a moving picture, the play, or an opera.

If we are on the eve of a reform in the poster end of matters, and if we should get an artistic and commercial development of the moving picture poster, the mind is staggered by the possible extent of the business, which is bound, in the nature of things, to multiply so enormously that the existing manufacturers in the field will hardly be able to cope with the demand likely to be thus created. Of course, the moving picture poster is bound, in our opinion, to come, and to come very quickly, as anybody with eyes in his head can see for himself in New York City and other large cities. It already exists in a somewhat mild and apologetic form. Let the moving picture poster be produced on the same scale of size and quality as the ordinary theater poster, and no man can tell how much money exhibitors, renters and manufacturers will make. They will all be multi-millionaires in the Carnegie or Rockefeller class.

To be serious, however, we are aware that efforts are being made to put the quality of the moving picture theater poster on a high artistic and productional plane, and all this is, therefore, bound to favorably influence the business.

Exhibitors in certain sections of the State of New Jersey already have their associations for purposes of mutual help and co-operation, notably those of Newark, Jersey City, West Hoboken and Union Hill. Then there is the Hudson County Proprietors of Entertainment Association, which looks after the interest of moving picture exhibitors. The policy of the State Legislature with regard to the moving picture is such that it is highly desirable all moving picture theater exhibitors in the State should unite for the purpose of watching that legislation and if necessary defeating it whenever the interests of exhibitors are threatened. We request all exhibitors in their respective cities to get together and form associations with a view of federating into a State association. There must be many hundreds of moving picture theaters in New Jersey. The question of the age limit of children, Sunday licenses and others, are continually cropping up, and it would be well, therefore, if the Jersey exhibitors united.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

CHAPTER XXVI.

EMPLOYEES.

A cheap or poor operator is dear at any money. Get a good operator and see to it that he produces the results. Remember, however, that the people of old could not make brick without straw. Neither can an operator produce results unless he has the equipment to produce them with. No matter how small the house, there should be at least one usher, and he should be well and neatly dressed at all times. The ticket taker should also be neatly dressed, in a uniform, if possible. The writer has in hundreds of instances seen a ticket taker in his shirt-sleeves, unkempt, and even with a cigar or cigarette in his mouth. Such a spectacle would convey the impression to my mind that the show was likely to be as sloppy as the man in the door. Others, I think, would have the same idea and pass the house by. The ticket seller should preferably be a young lady of good appearance, minus the usual wad of gum. She must know how to make change accurately and quickly, of course.

ADVERTISING.

It pays to advertise. But the best methods of advertising a moving picture show is a subject on which there is wide diversity of opinion. The neat colored posters which may now be had with nearly all films at low cost are excellent for the arcade. Neat showcards announcing the program are also excellent arcade advertisements. In small towns it is more than likely that the papers can be induced to give space to some film synopsis matter, especially if an advertisement be carried by the house. A common arrangement is to contract for a given space by the month or week, the publisher agreeing to give an equal amount of space to notes of the show in his reading matter. Giving of souvenirs is not, as a rule, good practice. It savors too much of hiring people to come to your show, paying them with some comparatively worthless trinket that is more than likely thrown away. Spend the souvenir money in improving your program, is my advice. If you have a competitor and you start giving "souvenirs," he will follow suit immediately, and neither of you are the gainer, but both lose just that much.

One good, and perhaps the best, advertising scheme is to have a genuine feature film occasionally and advertise it to the limit. The people your advertising draws to see that film will have their attention effectively drawn to the house, and if they see a good show they will return to see other films. Another excellent scheme is to secure some good patriotic film and have a children's day on Saturday. Secure the school principal to lecture on the subject, if possible, and admit the youngsters at two or three cents on that occasion. Have a good comedy film, being careful that it is strictly "clean." The children will tell their parents all about it and the talk will advertise your house, of course. To do this properly, however, the school teachers should be interested. In fact, there are many forms of advertising possible to the man who uses his brains and thinks. You must be a schemer to make the best success in the show business. The man who goes into the moving picture business thinking it is play, that the money will just roll in without effort on his part, had better try something else. The show business, moving picture or otherwise, requires hard work, and lots of it. Of course, in its infancy, while moving pictures were a curiosity, almost anyone could make big money with almost any old show at all, and without much effort. But, take it from me, those days are past and gone —and they aren't coming back, either. There is still money in the business, and good money, too, for the man of ability, energy and eternal push.

FILM SERVICE.

In the matter of service you must remember that a flowery advertisement, full of promises, does not necessarily imply the best service. It rather indicates that the advertiser has in his employ an excellent ad.-writer. There is just one really business-like, intelligent way of buying film service. By subscribing to the Moving Picture World and keeping its copies all on file you will be enabled to not only see at a glance just what each new film is—a synopsis of its action —but also see its exact date of release. Now decide just what limit you wish to place on the age of films sent you and then write to several exchanges, asking for quotations on that service. To illustrate: Suppose you decide you want no films older than fifteen days. You write, asking for quotations on the number of reels you want per week. changed so often, no subject to be more than fifteen days old. You are now in position to check up and get exactly what you pay for. If you think some subject is older than your contract calls for, all you have to do is glance at its date of release in the files of the paper. If you use two reels you can contract for one reel with ten or fifteen-day limit, and one twenty, thirty, forty or sixty-day limit. The point, is, you place yourself in position to absolutely demand and get what you pay for. You should demand a clause in the agreement that any subject over age shall be paid for at half price or be not paid for at all. This is the sensible, business-like way of purchasing film service. It absolutely eliminates all disputes. The terms "first run," "second run" and "third run," as now used, depend largely on the elasticity of the exchange manager's conscience. "Commercial run" means nothing at all—or, rather, it means anything the exchange thinks it can work off on you. Of course, exchanges will ridicule this, but it is cold, hard facts, nevertheless, as they well know. Keep all film release dates carefully on file, buy your service with age limit, and you can't be buncoed. In the matter of carbons, nearly one-half may be saved by purchasing in 1,000 lots.

EDUCATION BY MOTION PICTURES.

(From the New York World.)

Upon the white screen is shown a stalk pushing its way up from the ground; leaves developing; bolls swelling, then bursting to reveal the white substance within; and in a few moments the whole life of a cotton plant has been in review of a hall full of people who never saw one growing.

Next may come a factory wherein some industry of national importance is carried on; every process appears in exact detail. Then a film taken by Chinese photographers, imported by way of San Francisco, showing how tea is grown, harvested and prepared. A Russian or Australian film may follow. Then a mountain climbing scene, with rope and ice-axe in use; a battle, Wright's aeroplane in flight, a camel caravan.

The whole world is not only seeing but making motion pictures. The phonograph and the vitagraph have penetrated every continent and are pleasing or instructing all manner of man from the Zulu to the Berlin doctor of philosophy. Purely on the theatrical side the industry has become so great as to require subdivision. A distinct specialty has thus grown up in the making of "chasers," as those series are called wherein policemen, nurse girls, grocers and other characters go through obstacle races at great speed.

Most recent and most marvelous are some of the scientific uses of motion pictures. Thus, the Merchants' Association of New York, convinced of the ravages the house-fly is doing, has arranged for educational motion films showing the enormous loss the nation incurs by it. More wonderful still, the most delicate and dangerous surgical operations are studied by camera and film. The operation itself, if serious, can have no spectators, or few at the most. The surgeons rehearse with a dummy to get "in the picture," the operation is performed before the camera, quickly, deftly; later the film may be explained to a thousand students. The pictures can be run slowly so that the exact manner of using the implements may be seen. They can be repeated a thousand times and made in duplicate for many schools.

The formation of a voluntary commission for censoring motion pictures in the interest of public morality has received much attention. Quite as important as this praiseworthy effort of the manufacturers to prune entertainment of any objectionable features is the daily discovery of some new educational or business use to which pictures can be put, and educators the country over are actively aiding in suggesting new films. Trade, advertisement, surgery, commerce, the training of soldiers—what work will not the motion pictures yet be set to do?

One of the most recent engagements made by the Vitagraph Company of America for its stock company is the addition of Signor Lugi Alberteri as one of the directors. Sig. Alberteri is a ballet master of note, having been connected with both the Metropolitan and Manhattan Opera Houses in New York, and more recently he was the director of the production of Italian grand opera at the Academy of Music. Although he is best known as a master of ballet in this country, in Italy he gained fame as a general stage director. With the Italian cast recently added to the Vitagraph permanent company some remarkable films are anticipated, for it is generally conceded that the Latin races are far in advance of those of northern climes in the art of silent expression. Sig. Alberteri does not replace any of the other directors. but is an addition to the present staff.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

The trouble-makers for the moving picture people seem to have, at least temporarily, turned their attention from the exhibitors to the film exchanges. Pittsburg, Pa., seems to be a favorite haunt for them. Either the news gleaners on the daily newspapers of that city are most liberally subsidized or the writers are the biggest fat-heads that ever pushed a pen. Some of the stuff they are stringing out in their columns at the present time about moving picture films and theaters is the finest example of what a semi-idiotic mind can conceive. Many weeks ago an explosion took place in a building of that city in which a large film exchange was located. Of course the exchange was saddled with the responsibility for the unfortunate affair because there were a large number of reels of film in the place. According to the reports published by those who are supposed to give all the news that is fit to print, each reel of film was to all intents and purposes a Whitehead torpedo. In other words, the reporters endeavored to convince the people that every film exchange is nothing less than a powder magazine. Subsequent development of facts have in no way changed or modified the opinions of these newspaper people. The best any of them have done has been the publication of so-called claims by the film exchange people that the explosion was not caused by moving picture films. They have not had the fairness to concede that there was a possibility of mistake in their original conclusions as to the cause of the explosion, but for some reason best known to themselves have persisted in pounding the film exchanges, the films, and everybody connected with and handling them, for being dynamiters.

The attacks by the daily press upon moving pictures and the places and people handling them, too frequently savor of a lack of good faith. The reports and comments too frequently reflect too much ignorance of the real facts to warrant a belief that the newspapers are sincere in what they say on such matters. They would have the public believe that they are stirring the public officials to a better protection of the people against loss of life and property, but their radical methods disclose the true purpose. The dramatic critics of the daily and weekly newspapers never contribute notices on the moving pictures, except to condemn them. In criticizing vaudeville programs the writers comment upon every act except the pictures, unless it is to say the pictures are bad. This may be accounted for by the statement that the picture houses do not carry advertisements in the papers referred to. The various dramatic papers maintained a similar attitude for some time, but they are falling into line and giving the pictures the attention legitimate amusements deserve.

Why all this hue and cry about the great danger attending moving picture films? Do the facts warrant it? There are in existence to-day, and have been for at least three years, more picture houses by an enormous percentage than there have been theaters at any given period during the same time, and not one event resembling a calamity has been recorded against them. Take the history of the theaters of the world and count the scores of catastrophes involving great loss of life and property that stand recorded against them. The facts show clearly that the daily press have by exaggeration, neglect to seek and publish details as they existed, and a manifest desire to prejudice public opinion, maintained a most unreasonable and unjust attitude against thousands of people who have millions of dollars invested in a perfectly legitimate business.

The latest idiotic writer announces through the press of Pittsburg that the United States Government has taken up an investigation of the explosion in that city. He says the Government proposes driving every moving picture exchange out of the city; that it has found that when subjected to great heat the films generate powerful explosive gases. No one has denied that ignited films in confined quarters will do this, but there is not a case on record where an explosion of that character has taken place. This writer is evidently one of those fellows who used to come out with such scare lines as "Moving Picture Machine Explodes," "Several Hundred Lives in Jeopardy," "Presence of Mind of the Police Prevails and the Performance Proceeds," and a lot of such tommy-rot that did great harm to the picture people by scaring the public, until confidence was restored by the people themselves learning that such reports had for foundation only the recklessness of sensational space writers.

The reckless knockers may as well reconcile themselves now to the thought that the moving picture business is a legitimate one and it is here to stay; that none more carefully guard against loss of life and property than the people who are engaged in it. Every moving picture theater represents the investment of so much capital, and every foot of film is likewise the representation of so much money invested. No business man more jealously and diligently guards his property than the owner of a film exchange, for the reason that its destruction in almost any case means ruination. The growth of the business and the demands of the public make it absolutely necessary for the film exchange owner to procure a new supply of pictures daily. It takes weeks to get out of a new picture its actual cost, and that picture must be carefully guarded after that to give the exchange man a chance to get his profit. These pictures, or films, are procured upon cash payments—not spot cash always—but cash, as the term is known in all trade circles. It is easy to see, therefore, that every exchange is constantly carrying an enormous stock which has been paid for, but will not become profit-earning for some time, and therefore no one is more anxious to protect it against loss than the holder. To this end they have co-operated with every municipal body in the perfection of regulations as to the handling and exhibiting of the films, and no expense has been spared for this purpose. Their sincerity in this direction has been demonstrated time and time again. They have refused to rent films to places that have not complied with the municipal regulations guarding against loss and have insisted that only competent employees shall be allowed to handle the films and operate the machines. In no instance have they allowed selfishness to stand in the way. While, perhaps, primarily active in guarding against personal loss, they have stopped supplying customers whom they found were neglecting to observe, or attempting to evade, the municipal regulations enacted for the safety of the public. These picture people have known for a long time that various agencies have been diligently at work to annihilate their business if possible. The subject has been publicly discussed and commented upon quite frequently. Persecution has been engineered from various sources for as many purposes against exhibitors and all others engaged in the business. The press, pulpit and public departments all over the country have been pressed into the service, but the pictures have survived the ordeal and are receiving better support from the amusement seeking public than ever before.

It will not be long before the daily press will condescend to give the moving picture business the consideration it deserves and abandon the attitude of the present day. Public opinion will force this. The daily newspaper is a great power, but the people form a greater one, and they can either make or break a newspaper. The latter frequently swerves the people, but when the issue becomes one of fair play the people act for themselves.

HIGH-CLASS POSTERS FOR MOVING PICTURE THEATERS.

Thomas H. Quill Inaugurates a New and Promising Scheme.

Coincidently, we might accurately say, contemporaneously with the publication in this issue of The Moving Picture World of our article entitled "The Poster End," and another article by a contributor on the same subject, comes an announcement that will interest manufacturers, renters and exhibitors alike all over the United States, as to the manner in which the commercial end of the moving picture is in future to be handled. It is this: That Thomas H. Quill, until recently publicity manager of the Selig Polyscope Company, has resigned his position with that firm in order to take up an appointment with the United States Lithographing Company, who, in conjunction with Mr. Quill, and we will say ourselves, perceive not only a great future for the production of posters for advertising moving pictures, but also realize that the time is ripe for supplying the demand that already exists for them.

We might here say that Mr. Quill's severance from his friends, the Selig Polyscope Company, is a perfectly amicable one. It is all to the credit of Mr. Quill, and in this we applaud him, that he has the greatest admiration and respect for Mr. Selig, whose enterprise in the production of moving pictures on a great spectacular scale earns the applause of us all. Both Selig and Quill, we know, are sorry to lose each other, but we are confident that Quill's entry into the poster end of matters commands his former chief's sympathy and that all around the popular Thomas H. Quill is assured of a large volume of good wishes for his success.

And we are convinced that he will be successful. He is just the man to handle this proposition. Months back, in the pages of The Moving Picture World we foreshadowed the time when the poster would play a large part in popularizing the moving picture, and this week in our editorial article we give expression to the thoughts that arise in us after a careful further survey of the possibilities in the moving picture poster. It needs a man with Quill's conviction to bring home to manufacturers, renters, and exhibitors, the urgent importance of putting out well designed, well printed posters illustrating the salient points of pictures which are to appeal to 86,000,000 of people. It needs a company with the enterprise and extensive plant of the United States Lithographing Company to handle the work, to prepare good designs, to turn out good printing, and deliver the posters promptly and simultaneously all over the country. It is, in short, a very fine field of work in which a very great deal can be done, artistically, technically and commercially.

A NEW BOOKING EXCHANGE.

W. H. Protzman, familiarly known as "Bill" to his numerous friends, and for some years identified with the moving picture business in this and other cities, has recently established a booking exchange, and is making a specialty of supplying all wants for employees, pianists, vocalists, and vaudeville for moving picture houses. "Bill's" experience, both as owner and manager, and his vast acquaintance with artists and managers in general, qualifies him to not only furnish the best people and acts, but to insure promptness and reliability in his dealings. He is also proprietor of the Peerless Slide Company, whose business has grown to large proportions. Their announcement and special advertising slides are second to none in workmanship and art, and the special prize and baby show contests conducted by them have proven very popular and have been money makers for the houses running them.

SCENE FROM "CUSTER'S LAST STAND." (Selig Polyscope Co.)

We see enormous possibilties in the poster end of the moving picture; we see the best artistic brains; the finest technique of the printer; the finest organizing ability of the commercial men united to familiarize the great American public with the moving picture poster, as completely as they are with the ordinary theatrical poster. It is said that opportunity brings forth the man; and here is the man in the person of Tom H. Quill to handle this vital branch of the moving picture business. With the support and co-operation of the United States Lithographing Company, there should be a great business done throughout the trade in high-class posters for moving pictures.

NEW INCORPORATIONS.

New York City.—The Columbia Moving Picture and Theater Company; capital, $5,000. Directors: Max C. Garcis, Joseph Stoehr and H. Moerchen.

Washington, D. C.—The Capital Amusement Company; capital, $50,000. Directors: Ezra Gould, William Blum, R. H. Bagby.

New York City.—The Erbograph Company; capital, $5,000. Directors: Ludwig G. B. Erb, Emma Erb and Joseph A. Golden.

Columbia, Ohio.—The Cineograph Company; capital, $1,200. Director: Mary M. Brice.

CUSTER'S LAST STAND (Selig Polyscope Co.).

About four months ago we paid a visit to the Selig studio and saw the preparations for the making of the great film, "On the Little Big Horn; or Custer's Last Stand," Selig's Thanksgiving Day release. At that time we were duly impressed with the facilities of the Selig plant for the production of such magnificent spectacles, and with the desired touch of realism. The accompanying enlargement from one of the small pictures out of the 16,000 that make up this film will give an idea of the number of people employed. The scene is an Indian dance. Besides this group of Indian braves there were the troops of United States soldiers, altogether several hundred. No exhibitor should fail to show this magnificent historic military spectacle, which adds another mark to the fame of the Selig Company for doing big things. Our own criticism of the film will come after we have seen it on the screen, but those on the inside say it is simply immense.

STATE RIGHTS FOR THE JOHNSON-KETCHEL FIGHT FILMS.

The Yale Film Exchange, Kansas City, are supplying the State of Missouri; Chas. A. Calehuff, of Philadelphia, the State of Pennsylvania, and the Kleine Optical Company, 41 East Twenty-first street, New York, the States of New Jersey and New York.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

Once or twice lately when I have been looking at the Melies pictures on the screen, the recent re-entry of this renowned maker into the field has started me in a reminiscinatory mood. (Big word, reminiscinatory. I don't think it figures in Webster or any other dictionary, any more than does theatricalization. But it expresses my meaning, I think.) I have fallen to thinking of the earlier days of the moving picture across the Atlantic, and being inclined to reminiscinate upon them, it clearly follows that my particular mood must be of a reminiscinatory character. I hope all this is clear—as clear to you as it is to me, dear reader.

Melies, of Paris, made a great reputation in London for his trick films. At the Alhambra Theater of Varieties in that city I often saw such subjects as "A Voyage to the Moon" and other pictures which called for the expenditure of an enormous amount of ingenuity in arranging them. I wonder why the trick film has not acquired a greater hold than it has upon the American moving picture public. I suppose the reason is that there are so few of them made. But now that Melies is once more to the fore in New York, it is to be hoped that the old love of the house will re-assert itself.

Before Melies went to London one of the sensations was the Biograph picture, which was something like three inches wide instead of one inch wide and three-quarter inch deep. The Biograph picture, if I remember aright, was shown at the Palace Theater, London, and it created a great sensation in virtue of the very fine photographic quality of the results. The projector was motor-driven, and I believe that the machine which was then used in London is still doing work of a kind in New York City. The Biograph pictures were the sensation of one or two seasons, and early lovers of the moving picture still speak of them in terms of admiration.

But perhaps the most momentous event of all was the Lumiere invasion of London in the early part of 1896, more than thirteen years ago, I regret to say, and my mirror tells that I am not yet growing gray. Thirteen years, however, is a long time in the moving picture business, and I can recall the enormous sensation which the Lumiere pictures made in London. They were remarkably steady and of good photographic quality. Undoubtedly those pictures gave an impetus to the world's interest in moving pictures.

Lumiere was followed by Paul, Acres and others. Paul is still in the game, but Acres, who had a great chance of making money at it, has dropped out. In those days Pathe had not come to the front; probably he was quietly laying the foundation of the present enormous business. It was somewhat later than this that Melies acquired his great reputation in London for his trick pictures—a reputation which still survives.

About 1898 or 1899 the British moving picture drifted into the popular topical state of affairs from which it seems unable to extricate itself. Unquestionably, however, Pathe and Lumiere took the lead, and Pathe, it will be observed from contemporary records, is still to the fore in the work; but I, for one, at any rate, am pleased to see the name of Melies once more identified with it.

I suppose I am one of the few people in America who have seen the first moving pictures that were ever made on rollable celluloid. These, also, are roughly about the size of a lantern picture and they were made over twenty years ago. Moreover, it is ten years since I myself figured in a moving picture, the operator being Prestwich, a name identified in Britain with the mechanical end of things. Prestwich is still in the business. So, too, is Cecil Hepworth, the son of an old personal friend of mine who was one of the best lecturers that Britain has produced.

Ladies and gentlemen, please pardon this reminiscinatory mood. I do not often indulge in such a thing, because I have little or no veneration for the past because it is past. But now and again it is necessary to remind some of the crop of "know-it-alls" which the events of the expiring year have produced that there are in existence some people whose experience is longer and greater than theirs. A peculiar characteristic of the moving picture game is that so soon as a man gets possession of a camera, licensed or non-licensed, and makes something of a developable exposure he instantly, in his own eyes, becomes an authority. I suppose the explanation is that moving picture photography in a general way is so very new. It is new to the public, it is new to those who supply the public, and so an all round fallacy arises about this novelty. But new as it is, there were good photographs made in a moving picture camera ten or twelve years ago which it is doubtful if they are qualitatively surpassed at the present time. Whatever advance has been made has been along the lines of public appreciation and the dramatic end of matters.

Again, some advance has been made in the mechanical end because the generality of pictures do not jump and flicker about the screen as they used to do. Then, of course, there has been a tremendous improvement in the sumptuary conditions governing the exhibitions of the moving pictures—to-day there are picture palaces all over the world; ten years ago there were none. Still, as I have said, there were very good pictures then, and the men who have made them had devoted years and years of study to the work.

I hope Melies will prosper in his re-entry into the moving picture field, and I hope he can be induced to give the American public some of the ingenious trick pictures which I remember with such pleasure. The French mind is essentially a mind full of fantasy and invention, as the French pictures show; therefore, it should be easy for Melies to strike out an original path for himself in this field. That is what is called for in the production of moving pictures—originality of subject and treatment. We have plenty and to spare of mediocrity, and little enough of the quality which endures in the mind, just as the Melies tricks have endured in mine.

UNFAIR ADVERTISING.

We are sorry to see in the advertising pages of our contemporary, The Kinematograph, the following advertisement:

> Kinemacolor. Urban-Smith patents. Beware of deception. A prominent firm of film makers who are reputed borrowers of "other people's thunder and ideas," are, by their cunningly worded advertisements, endeavoring to pass off on the unwary their mechanical stencil colored films, thus leading the likely buyer and exhibitor, as well as the public, to believe that such films embody the marvelous results only possible to procure by "Kinemacolor," the only existing process of reproducing the actual tones, tints and hues of nature. "Color Kinematography" (so-called) consisting of the ordinary films painted by hand or colored by mechanical means have been known to the trade from its infancy, 15 years ago, and are crude compared to "Kinemacolor" which is "the triumph of the period and the wonder of the animated picture world." Allowance must be made, under the circumstances, for borrowing the above quotation. Do not be deceived!

English publications, we know by experience, are somewhat chary of printing advertisements which reflect on other films, as the above announcement unquestionably does on Messrs. Pathe. Seated in a moving picture theater the other day, we were lost in admiration of the excellence in color effect of a Pathe subject illustrating tea plant culture, and more recently when we carefully examined that very fine picture "The Prodigal Son" we were also struck by the amazingly beautiful coloring of the film. Indeed, both in this country and America, the exceedingly artistic nature of the colors on the Pathe films win unlimited admiration. Precisely how this process is carried out we do not know, but we have the best grounds for believing that it is a stencil process. We have examined specimens of these color films and have found ourselves appreciating the delicate way in which the colors are applied and also the beauty of the effects when the pictures are shown on the screen. The foregoing advertisement, which we have quoted, would appear to imply that Messrs. Pathe, of London, are guilty of some misrepresentation about their color films. This is not true and therefore we are all the more surprised, first of all that the Urban-Smith people should draw up such an ill-natured advertisement, and secondly that our contemporary, the Kinematograph, no doubt by an oversight, should print that advertisement. We have said over and over again in these pages that the Urban-Smith two-color process which is referred to in the foregoing advertisement, will either succeed or fall on its intrinsic merits. Just as, of course, the Pathe pictures do. Indeed, it is notorious throughout the moving picture world that a Pathe production has got where it has simply and solely on account of its qualitative merit. Kinemacolor, as we have said before, is an experimental process, the success of which is not likely to be increased by the foolish nonsense about "deception" and all the rest of it which the Kinemacolor patentees allow themselves to throw at a reputable firm like Messrs. Pathe.

Comments on the Week's Films.

INDIAN BASKET MAKING (Vitagraph).

In the list of this week's releases there are two industrial subjects of which the Vitagraph Company is credited with one, the subject of this review. To our taste and, we believe, to the taste of the public at large, the percentage of industrial subjects released by the manufacturers might be more numerous. We observe that whenever an industrial subject is put on the screen it arrests the attention and, what is more, holds it almost as markedly as does a feature film. This short film on Indian basket making shows a little industry in progress in the hands of the Pasamaquoddy Indians, who still live in Maine. The photographer posed a number of women making these baskets and a domestic touch is given to the picture by the inclusion of some Indian infants. Finally a person entitled to the rank of chief and wearing a nondescript tribal dress is shown contributing his quota to the work of making the baskets. The picture is interesting in virtue of the fact that it shows traces of the aboriginal element of the population and, moreover, it shows them at work. Romantic Indian subjects are popular with other manufacturers and the public just now, so that the Vitagraph Company in releasing this little picture are timely. We would like to see the very great resources of this company more frequently utilized in industrial subjects for, as we have already remarked, the public invariably show great appreciation of them. This was the reception given to "Indian Basket Making."

BENEDICT ARNOLD (Vitagraph).

The dramatic episode in the history of this country in the concluding quarter of the eighteenth century forms the subject of a highly successful Vitagraph picture. Successful we mean in many respects. In the first place it is not too long, being under 700 feet; in the next place every inch of the film seems crowded with action, and in the third place the picture is uniformly good in photographic quality throughout; three features which always make for success in moving picture films. On this little point as to the desirable length of films, we have something to say elsewhere in this week's number. Meanwhile "Benedict Arnold," in our opinion, stands out as one of the successes of the week for the reasons given. Everyone of course is familiar with the story, which it is unnecessary to repeat. But we would like to say that the acting of the performers fully rises to the occasion. Arnold takes his reproof at the hands of Washington as we imagine an officer would. His subsequent conduct in attempting to betray his country is only explicable on grounds of personal hatred. But the producers of this film wisely avoided any examination into subtlety of motive. They deal alone with the facts of history, and history records how Andre, the British spy, is caught by the Americans, stripped and discovered with the goods on him. So he goes to his fate. Arnold, meanwhile escape, flees to London and dies in a garret, alone and friendless, as a vision of the American flag greets his closing eyes, an emblematic touch which perhaps might have been dispensed with, as the story is so clearly, convincingly and well told. Of course, as we have pointed out, everybody is familiar with this episode in American history, and it therefore needs no explanation. All the same, the Vitagraph Company deserve every praise for the dignified way in which the picture was mounted, dressed, acted and photographed. Short military subjects of this nature are bound to be popular, especially where the canvas is not overcrowded with supernumeraries. In this subject there are not too many actors or mobs marching and counter marching, which, however pretty to look at, often obscures the action of the piece. And, as we have said over and over again, the modern moving picture audience wants in its films action, action, action.

THE LIGHT THAT CAME (Biograph).

A certain delicious and soothing tenderness pervades this film, which casts a hallowed influence over the audience and holds them in an impressive silence which lasts as long as the picture remains with them. It is a tender story. A young girl, disfigured for life by an accident, her beauty gone, must needs be overlooked, even neglected, when her handsome sisters are about. A blind violinist, shut out from all enjoyment which appeals to the sense of sight. Surely the two are pathetic enough to rouse the sympathies of the most callous individual. They meet at a reception, their hands touch, and in that touch each recognizes the affinity of the other. But the girl must undergo a supreme test before she is permitted to enjoy to the full her new found happiness. It is discovered that sight may be restored to the blind eyes, and in supplying the money from her own savings to remove the curtains from the eyes which may loathe her when they see her, the young woman rises to the standard of great dramatic interpretation. The operation is successful. The girl waits with fear the verdict; but the young man knows her soul. He sees not the disfiguring mark, and the happiness of both is assured. The development of character in this picture is so natural and is accomplished with so little effort that one seems to feel the story as it is illustrated. Living characters could not make it plainer and in places the silent drama seems even more impressive than spoken lines could make it. The imagination is stimulated and enables one to appreciate more fully the dramatic situations which are inherent in the picture. In some respects this is the greatest film of the week. Its suggestiveness is so strong that one does not forget it easily and it will serve as a basis of comparison for many days to come.

HER DRAMATIC CAREER (Pathe).

This picture is, or should be, an object lesson to the amateur producers and self-constituted authorities on moving picture production who are found in the American moving picture field to-day. It is as good a piece of drama well acted and photographed as any other picture being shown on the current moving picture screen. One peculiarity of the picture instantly struck us, as it has struck us before, when looking at Pathe photographs in a moving picture theater. The five or six films that preceded it were of a certain standard of quality, having a few photographic defects not worth speaking about; some amount of flicker and movement, but not of a fatal quantity; generally speaking, they were high-class modern motion pictures. But the instant the Pathe appeared, what a change! We, and the entire audience with us, felt that we were looking at a photograph qualitatively far the superior of those that had preceded it. The picture was dead still on the screen, the photographic quality of the film was perfect, and so soon as the picture started the shadowy figures commenced to act—act naturally—and they acted naturally right throughout the thousand and thirty feet of it. It was just for all the world as if we ourselves sat in the old Porte St. Martin Theater in Paris, the chosen home of French melodrama, and were looking at one of those plays of passion so dear to the heart of the Parisian populace. Your low-bred bully attacks his wife, flings her out of a cabaret into the snow, whence she is rescued by a chivalrous man, taken to his home, put into silk attire and given the opportunity of being a theatrical star. At this stage the girl in her new-found beauty and elegance is confronted by her brute of a husband, who, however, is ejected from the house. So it goes to the girl's debut, when, elegantly gowned and bejeweled, she is once more approached by the husband, who tears the jewels from her neck and arms, flings her down and is about to throttle her, when she is released by a crowd of her admirers and the brute is given in charge of the police. Not, perhaps, the most uplifting of stories, and characteristically French, but how splendidly acted and photographed it is impossible for us to tell! As we have said last week, quoting a companion in the theater, "These French people can act." We are a little in doubt as to whether "Her Dramatic Career" will be uniformly popular on the American moving picture stage, but there is no doubt it will be appreciated for its fine acting qualities. This week's palm assuredly goes to Pathe for this picture.

THE COUNT'S WOOING (Melies).

A careful study of the pictures that Mr. Melies has released in the last few weeks shows us a practised mind at work in the productions, which, however, are not handled with that sureness of touch which makes for instant success in the American moving picture theater to-day. In the Melies pictures you have the subject right enough, and the material. All that is required is an eliminating and codifying process, as it were, to make the Melies pictures as a whole attractive to the audience. Generally speaking, there is too much confusing detail of action put in the Melies productions, so that the main thread of the story is obscured. We felt this the other day when looking at "A Tumultuous Elopement," which, however well it read on paper, was somewhat sketchy in presentation to the public, many of whom, however, to be just to the actors, laughed heartily at the picture. Much the same sort of criticism applies to "Mr. and Mrs. Duff," one of this week's releases. An amusing thing in its way, but so scattered and indefinite as regards plot that the effect made upon the minds of the audience, while amusing enough, is the reverse of convincing; in fact, though the people laughed, we heard them asking what this picture was all about, and we ourselves, frankly, were in the same state of mind. So, too, with the film, the title of which heads this review. As the story is told in the story part of last week's World, it is good and plausible enough. A French nobleman comes a-wooing a pretty American girl, the daughter of a millionaire. Some friends of the girl, masquerading in fancy dress, determine to give the count a rough time in order to pave the way for the success of an American boy in the affections of the girl. Having regard to the present state of the American mind on the subject of foreign marriages, here is a theme which offers excellent scope for dramatic treatment on the moving picture stage; and certainly the picture turns out to be a very amusing one. The French count suffers pretty badly at the hands of the mummers, and some highly comical situations develop, to which the actors do such thorough justice that the audience is kept in a ripple of merriment all the time. Yet for all this the motive of it was somewhat obscure. It did not appear to us that the count had gone a-wooing; that he had an American rival; that the American rival was ultimately successful. Precisely why the count should fail or be buffeted about was not made clear, for he seemed quite a nice sort of a count. In other words, in this Melies picture there was a lack of dramatic suggestion and grip, a very common failing with the moving picture film just now, which leaves the audience in doubt, or at any rate does not make the motive of the picture so clear as it should be made. But, for the rest of it, we desire to congratulate Melies upon a very fine piece of work, well staged, well acted and almost well photographed. By the word "almost" we do not wish to be hypercritical at Mr. Melies, because we know that the photographic end of a moving picture plant is not got in apple-pie order in a few days. There are many light and dark splashes on his films which a little more experience on the chemical end will get rid of. Moreover, in a little while we are convinced that the Melies films will approach nearer to the truly pantomimic, and therefore will take a large place in the American moving picture field.

NEW ROADS THROUGH MONT BLANC (Pathe).

Subjects such as this make us regret, to some extent, a policy which limits the life of the licensed moving picture to three months. For amongst these pictures are some that the world will not willingly let die. We do not say that this picture is one of these, but it is a subject the interest of which is not likely to die out. The scenery of the Swiss and Italian Alps is always fresh to look upon, even in a photograph, chiefly on account of its wild diversity of peaks, galciers, snow drifts, valleys, etc. Again the European Alps are amongst the most noted health and pleasure resorts in the world, and are visited every year by many thousands of Americans, so that a picture of this sort is in some sense a reminder to them of their Summer trip as well as a representation of some of the wonders of nature. The film has all the characteristics of a fine panorama showing spacious valleys and lofty hills traversed by the railroads. There are some wonderful stereoscopic-like effects, too, in parts of it. Subjects taken from the front of a locomotive or, indeed, from the rear of a train, showing the country either approaching or receding, are always popular with an audience. It is the one touch of nature which makes the little world of the theater kin. We single this film out for mention for two reasons: first of all, on account of its intrinsic good photographic and other qualities; and, secondly, because we want the film manufacturers to realize that there is always a large public interest in other things besides drama and comedy. In a previous review we lay emphasis on the value of industrial subjects, and now in this notice we point to the popularity of the purely topographical or picturesque. Assuredly in illustrating the wonders of nature the film makers have a limitless field to draw upon.

"Dora" (Kalem).—Steady improvement characterizes the work of the Kalem Company, and when they arrive at the stage in their career where they establish a studio for the production of their pictures they will release as good films as the best. This latest release is a free rendering of Tennyson's well known poem and affords a wealth of dramatic opportunities which are carefully worked up. The acting interprets with more than ordinary clearness the author's thought, and brings the poem before one in a way to make it attractive and interesting. The climax, when the grandfather takes the babe, but orders Dora away, followed so quickly by his relenting and taking them all home, forms a fitting ending to a drama in which sentiment is strongly developed and the sympathies of the audience are stirred by conflicting emotions. While the death of William is a source of sadness, the acceptance of his babe and its mother by his father forms a happy conclusion which modifies the influence and makes a pleasant ending.

"His Masterpiece" (Edison).—A drama of strength and beauty, depicting the struggles of a musician who composes a masterpiece, only to have it refused and then accepted, winning him fame and fortune. These subtle dramas from the Edison studio cannot be described. The actors' interpretation of the author's thought cannot be reproduced in type, and in addition there are numerous artistic lighting effects which assist materially in the story, adding to the picture's effect. One of the scenes is a reproduction of the famous painting, Beethoven, and is a great addition to the film's attractions.

"The Blue Garter" (Lubin).—A comedy of rather broad suggestiveness, based upon the finding of a blue garter, or something that looked like a garter. The finder is confronted with trouble when his wife discovers it in his pocket. In his attempt to dispose of it the innocent article starts on a series of wanderings which ends in the discovery that it is an armlet and not a garter at all.

"Found in a Taxi" (Lubin).—This picture reverses the order of procedure in the other, and because of some articles of man's apparel which a husband finds in a taxicab in which his wife has been riding, a man immediately assumes her to be faithless, but when she shows him that the articles are from his own wardrobe his countenance is a study in facial expression. But they make up and peace reigns once more in the household where a dangerous upheaval was threatened.

"Bertha's Birthday" (Raleigh & Robert).—When a girl has too many admirers complications are sure to follow, and this picture represents a complication of difficulties depending upon the love affairs of a tomboy. The greatest excitement occurs in the school, to which she has been unceremoniously bundled, when she opens her trunk and a choice collection of her admirers tumble out. A jolly party follows, during which cakes and pop are consumed in liberal quantities, but during the festivities the head of the school appears and sends Bertha and her admirers home again. The film is lively, though, owing to the nature of the subject, it scarcely comes up to a dramatic standard. It creates a good deal of amusement, however, and adds variety to a program.

"Two Men and a Woman" (Biograph).—A touching drama, staged with skill, acted with intelligence and photographed with clearness. Like many pictures from this house it carries with it a lesson which may well come home forcibly to any man who is drifting away from the wife of his youth under the spell of some later siren who is attracted by his money, or some other form of success. Here is a strong man who deliberately leaves his wife and lavishes affection and money upon a show girl. Then comes the separation, the settlement, the divorce, the marriage to the show girl—and lo, a sudden shift of scene, so sudden as to be almost a shock, and one sees the former wife entering the gate of their old home, as forlorn as the long deserted house itself. Ruin quickly follows through some manipulation of the stock market, and after a frenzied appeal to the men around him the man goes home, tells the story to his show girl wife and asks her to let him have the jewels he has lavished upon her to begin life anew. She refuses and haughtily departs, leaving him alone, ruined, disappointed, harassed. The scene changes and he, too, has gone back to the old home, seats himself in the old-fashioned rocker and falls asleep. The door swings open, the first wife appears, discovers him sleeping, draws her chair close beside him, takes his hand, and the picture ends with her soothing him that he may sleep. Further comment is unnecessary. The simple life story, strong in its simplicity and startling in its vivid presentation, has been told. Its lesson is obvious.

"Children of the Sea" (Lubin).—Speaking as one individual, the writer likes some scenes in this film, the story is interesting enough and it has been worked out with the usual Lubin flourish, yet lacks some details to make it convincing. That a young husband should sail away and never return is plausible enough. That his young widow should remain faithful to her original vows for five years may be equally plausible; but that a certain officer, clad in exactly the same uniform, should force his attentions upon her and insist upon marriage at the end of five years is not so convincing. And then her flight. It is much too long. At least one-half the rocks between her home and the point where she plunges into the sea might be eliminated with benefit to the picture, and that portion in which a three-strand barbed wire fence extends across the face of the picture can be dispensed with at once with advantage. It might be that the fact that the young widow encouraged the attentions of this officer before she finally refused him and committed suicide because he pursued her supplies the false note in the piece. At any rate it is there, and until it is eliminated by changing the acting to do away with that scene, the picture will never be wholly satisfactory. In some scenes the picture is not in focus. In one only the window in the extreme upper left corner is in focus, the rest is blurred and dim. Lubin has done better many times and undoubtedly can again.

"Two Chums Looking for Wives" (Pathe).—A rather indifferent comedy which owes its principal interest to a species of chase which represents two men following two girls who have turned to other men. Some of the complications are amusing, but the film and its working out are somewhat commonplace. Nevertheless, ripples of laughter went through the audience while this chase was in progress. The picture is pleasant, though not particularly strong in any part.

"In India" (Pathe).—One of those beautifully colored films of places that come from the Pathe studio and afford one a clear comprehension of a land and its people. This one represents the festival and ceremonies at the wedding of the nephew of an Indian potentate. The interest centers, not in the wedding, nor in the individuals most concerned, but in the kaleidoscopic glimpses of life in that marvelous country where human beings apparently swarm, judging from this picture. The staging is calculated to emphasize the contrasts of life and depict clearly the difference in classes which is such an important feature of Indian social life.

"The Rhymester's Ruse" (Gaumont).—A lively and well photographed comedy based upon the superstition that it is dangerous to have thirteen at table. The poet schemes to have thirteen accept invitations to dinner. The hostess invites him to make the fourteenth. A lively enough comedy, but without much point.

"Harlequin's Nightmare" (Gaumont).—A series of horrors for the unfortunate dreamer which includes a murder, the arrest, conviction and execution of the criminal. Harlequin is overjoyed to wake up and discover that it is after all only a dream. The novelty in this lies in one dreaming of his own execution.

"Good Lesson in Charity" (Pathe).—An elaborately staged picture, varied in its tones and altogether a sumptuous production. The principal actors are supposed to be wealthy and the staging is done with a view to strengthen that impression. The interiors are admirably arranged and contain only such accessories as are required in a well appointed home. The object is to give a child a lesson in charity, and it is admirably accomplished. Turning from the house of the wealthy to the hovel of the poor woman who asked alms, the contrast is sufficient to make a deep impression. Altogether it is an admirable production with every detail carefully worked out and without a flaw in the photography.

"Sam's Artistic Beard" (Pathe).—The experience of an unfortunate young man who took a position as butler to be near his inamorata, but who was forced by his employer to cut off his beard, and thereby lost his pull with everyone, even the girl who induced him to get into such a scrape. Staging, acting and photography are alike good and clearly in harmony with the subject.

"Launcelot and Elaine" (Vitagraph).—A film de luxe, one of the most ambitious products of this progressive house. It is a free rendering of Tennyson's poem of the same name in the "Idyls of the King," and clearly illustrates its main features. It is a simple story, though one's imagination is fired by the glamor of the romance of chivalry which pervades it. The staging has been done with care and so far as may be judged in these times, fairly represents costuming and customs in vogue during the period represented. The photographer did some daring things in placing his apparatus so close to the moving figures; but each one comes out clear and distinct with no suspicion of blurring. The piece affords few opportunities for dramatic climaxes. It is a story of the love of a simple country girl which the bold and bombastic knight, already in love with the queen, cannot return, and the maiden pines and dies, asking with her dying breath that her body be taken to King Arthur's court, where over her bier occurs the most dramatic of all the scenes, when the king asks Sir Launcelot if the charge contained in the scroll is true. It is not too much to say that the players have succeeded admirably in reproducing the spirit of the poem, and the working out of the details, even to the darkness in the cave, where the wounded knight lies, adds materially to the attractiveness of the picture. The tournament, as may be conceived, a difficult scene for a motion picture, is reasonably well represented. Obviously it would be exceedingly dangerous for actors to undertake more than a semblance of a joust, and the sudden change in the film before the combatants meet is sufficient to save picturing a deficiency which could not be helped, while the imagination supplies missing details. Really the weakest scene in the joust is where the knight is hurled from his horse and falls to the ground. As a whole the picture is a triumph of the producer's art and deserves only the highest praise for its excellence.

"A Convict's Heroism" (Gaumont).—With a strong appeal to the sense of justice, this story possesses more than ordinary interest. Wherever there is a display of nobility, wherever a great character suddenly appears there is centered interest; and the appeal is to everyone regardless of his station in life. The reproduction of a prison scene of the XVII. century engages the attention. Then comes the escape of one prisoner, his flight and refuge in a peasant's cottage. The dramatic climax is reached when he voluntarily tells who he is and induces them to deliver him to the governor and use the reward offered for his capture in saving their home from seizure. The remorse shown afterward is cleverly acted, and the picture's influence is markedly in favor of appreciation of the nobility of character which transforms any man into an example well worth copying.

"A Set of Teeth" (Gaumont).—A rather novel comedy, representing what occurred when mother-in-law lost her teeth. They operated much like a rat trap, nipping a number of unfortunate individuals in unexpected places, until finally thrown out of the window by the police. The man who sits on them has much the most trying experience, though others are only less seriously damaged.

"The Imp of the Bottle" (Edison).—Many years ago the writer read a story by some now forgotten author in which a bottle imp was made an important factor. He succeeded in getting people into all kinds of trouble, but the bottle itself had no magic properties like those so graphically pictured in this film. The novelty of steadily reducing the price until it gets so low that it could not be placed lower is a good piece of work. The wishes which were granted are well managed and the magic develops so naturally that it scarcely seems like magic. The dramatic quality is not high, but there is plenty of action, which always pleases. The costuming, the staging and the scenic environments all combine to make an especially attractive picture. So far as these qualities are concerned, few from this studio have ever surpassed it.

"A Winter's Tale" (Edison).—A comedy based upon a bit of work by Jack Frost that seriously upset the Smith household, and developed a long train of damages which could not be described. Many funny situations develop as the picture runs, and when at last the shivering and hungry family have overcome all their woes, the audience is ready to extend hearty congratulations.

"The Cursed Cage" (Aquila).—A rather picturesque film, showing a novel way of rescuing a man imprisoned in a cage on a high tower. There is a sword battle in which a baron is disabled, and then a lively contest with the castle guards. But eventually everybody escapes and the film closes with a happy family reunion.

"The Mysterious Luggage" (Eclair).—A well acted representation of some clever detective work. Perhaps the principal criticism is that there is scarcely tussle enough for a film of this character. A detective story requires a good bit of fighting and a few hairbreadth escapes to hold the interest.

"Now Keep Smiling" (Raleigh & Robert).—A clever farce based upon the scheme of two impecunious artists to raise money by assuming to make photographs of people. They succeed in victimizing several, but are captured by the police eventually. The action is lively and there is plenty to keep the audience in good humor, but the photographic quality is badly marred by under-exposure in some places and halation in others. If these faults can be corrected this will make an attractive film.

"The Substitute" (Raleigh & Robert).—The story of a nurse girl who leaves her charge to wander away with a soldier. Some boys substitute a pig and hide the baby. The complications which arise from this combination of circumstances are more than amusing. The last scene shows the nursemaid crying over the pig which she holds in her lap.

"A Very Attractive Gentleman" (No mark).—A rough house picture, containing a long chase in which a number of girls take part, and the way they tumble around is not wholly to one's liking. The photography is fair, considering the rapid movement of the figures, and excepting where halation has marred the outdoor scenes, the picture is clear. It is rather rough farce, but is not displeasing on that account.

"A Brave Policeman" (Imp).—Here is a clever piece of work. If ever a pompous policeman was hit off to the life it is here. All through the picture he is so frightened he makes no arrest, but he manages to take advantage of what others do. The fun is in the acting, in the facial expression and in the very pompous way in which he receives the plaudits of the multitude. The story has no plot. It is a series of incidents strung together in a sort of story form, but really having no connection, excepting as the personality of the policeman is carried from scene to scene. The photography is an improvement over some other films from the same house, giving abundant evidence of an attempt to make it perfectly clear. The action is alive and the figures move like actual flesh and blood. In photography and printing there is room for improvement, but in staging and acting nothing further need be wished.

"The Ranchman's Wife" (Bison).—A thrilling Western drama, holding the closest attention of the audience and causing rounds of applause. There is plenty of blood-tingling action, with rushing horses and just enough gun play to punctuate the picture. A woman is stolen and in a cabin alone with her captor struggles fiercely to escape from his clutches. Just as he has nearly overcome her, the door is broken in by a huge stone and her husband fells the half-breed and saves her. Then follows a fierce struggle between the two men, which ends when others appear and tie the half-breed and lead him away. There is no counterfeiting in these struggles. Clothing is torn off and there is every evidence of reality. The holdup in the woods is realistic. A striking novelty is the punishment. Instead of hanging the half-breed the cowboys tar and feather and ride him away on a rail to the accompaniment of rattling volleys from revolvers. The picture is clearly photographed and represents a satisfactory development in the output of this firm.

"Dream of a Fisherman" (No mark).—A story which has many elements of dramatic strength, but which is acted in a somewhat amateurish way. The dream is well enough managed, but more might be made of the unexpected appearance of the wealthy benefactors, following the dream of wealth, with money and clothing. The recipients appear now as though they expected this bounty, though the story would indicate that this was wholly unexpected. The photographer might have done his work better. There is halation in some places which could have been prevented. Where the writer saw it the picture suffered because the operator ran his machine too fast. The figures jumped so quickly that it was extremely difficult to follow their movements. A little correction of these minor faults here and there would make a good film of this.

"The Magnetizer" (Eclair).—Not a new subject. In fact, the writer has an indistinct remembrance of either this film, or a part of one singularly like it, some months ago. Perhaps it is one of those unconscious duplications which sometimes mar all creations of this sort. The story is told well enough and the audience extracts a good deal of humor from the situations. Perhaps this is sufficient for the purpose and no great degree of artistic or dramatic excellence is needed or expected.

"Orange Growing in Palestine" (No mark).—An industrial picture giving a good idea of the appearance of the orange groves of Palestine, how the fruit looks growing, how it is picked, assorted, wrapped, packed in boxes and transported on camels, eight or ten boxes on each beast, and down to the docks where they are placed on the vessels which take them away. A pretty feature is the faces of the children who are eating the oranges from the trees. The photography is not sharp and clear. The tones are somewhat disposed to flatness, with insufficient contrast, and here and there a figure is enough out of focus to blur. These minor defects do not detract from the main interest of the picture, however, and it makes a valuable addition to the list of industrial films.

"Pirates of the Sea" (Ambrosio).—This house is undertaking some ambitious work for which it deserves commendation. In this film an attempt has been made to illustrate some of the phases of a pirate's life, and with success. The film seems more like a series of views depicting disconnected incidents in such a life, rather than any continuous story. The action seems natural, though the movements of the figures are very quick, perhaps the fault of the operator, and the photography is clear, with correct tonal qualities. One of the sea views will rank with the best of that class of work and the rock scenery conveys an adequate impression of mass and solidity. The setting, which is all outdoors, is picturesque and admirably chosen. The picture pleases, even though it tells no well connected story.

"The Haunted Castle" (Theo. Pathe).—This pretty and altogether delightful picture was seen in an Independent theater. The story is based upon the fact that a girl, who is caretaker for a picturesque castle, has three persistent suitors. While they are rambling looking for her they each discover a ghost. Two are seriously frightened, but the third doesn't appear much disturbed, and even shows a disposition to investigate the ghost. The girl next causes to be published the fact that she will marry the man who is sufficiently courageous to take a certain bouquet wherever he may find it about the castle. The ghost is guarding it, and once again the two suitors show their fright by leaving the place about as rapidly as possible. The third determines to get the bouquet anyway, even taking it from the ghost's hands. The unearthly garments fall away and the girl herself falls into his arms. This is a simple story, but it is well told, with plenty of lively action to hold interest. The picture is worth while, since the photographer made the most of his opportunities and gave a series of picturesque views that beautifully illustrate the castle. Altogether it is as pretty a motion picture as one would care to see. The excellence of the photography, supplemented by the work of a careful printer, are potent factors in the film's attractiveness.

"A Serious Error" (Theo. Pathe).—A comedy based upon a mistake in hair lotions, one to remove hair from the face and the other to make it grow on a bald head. Through the blundering of servants they were exchanged, and the result is a full beard upon a woman's face and a head as bald and shiny as an ivory ball. The action is very lively and the part of the testy old major, who lost his hair and almost his wits, is laughable. The photography is not up to the best standard, however, the chief fault being more or less dimness due, no doubt, to under exposure of the film in the interiors.

"The Poacher" (Le Lion).—The game laws of Europe have been productive of a good many interesting and picturesque films. Apparently the poacher is an ever present menace to the peace and dignity of the game wardens, affording more trouble than most other influences combined. In this story the poacher loves the warden's daughter, but is driven from the house by her irate parent. When the poacher saves a younger daughter from the hands of a child stealer, the father gives him the elder daughter as a reward, and the former poacher becomes his assistant. Improvement marks the acting. In this picture it appears natural and without attempts at melodramatic work. The photography of the interiors is beautifully clear, with correct tones, but the outdoor scenes are seriously marred by halation. Some of the features of the actors are scarcely distinguishable. The rest of the film is so good the producers would do well to make the outdoor scenes over again. The picture seems to be well worth this additional work.

Schenectady, N. Y.—Mr. Galaise, who is a former member of the theatrical profession, has managed the Dorp Theater at Schenectady for the past four years. His theater is a cozy and artistically designed place and, as the writer can testify, is run on progressive business principles. He caters to an unusually high class trade and at no time has any trouble in filling his house. He runs four shows daily, consisting of three vaudeville acts, changed three times a week, and three reels of films, changed every day. The prosperous condition of his affairs is proved by the fact that on November 1 he threw open the doors of a new theater in Amsterdam called The New Lyceum, an imposing and elaborate structure. It has a seating capacity of 850 and is equipped with all the conveniences of a modern, up-to-date theater. The stage has a 60-foot width and 25-foot depth, the opening being 16 feet. The lobby is 50 feet deep. There are two boxes on either side of the proscenium finished in green and gold, which are also the predominating colors in the interior scheme. Mr. Galaise is running three shows daily, with four on Saturday, the program consisting of three vaudeville acts, changed twice a week, and three reels of films, changed three times a week. His attendants are all uniformed, and every courtesy shown and extreme care taken to provide for the comfort of his patrons. The orchestra consists of four pieces and the management of the stage is intrusted to Mr. A. J. Cramer, of Local 139, Schenectady. The booking is looked after by W. S. Cleveland. The following acts were on the first week: November 1: Three—Deronas, The Blinkleys and Theo. Camille and La Jesse. November 4: Six—Four English Belles, O'Neil Trio and Johnny Field.

Mr. Galaise quite naturally feels a pardonable pride in the success that has attended his career in the motion picture enterprise, and is a constant reader of The Moving Picture World.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ABOUT PLAGIARISM.

November 13, 1909.

Editor The Moving Picture World, New York City.

Dear Sir—May I voice a protest from the writers' part against a statement made by your "Man About Town" on page 679 of your 20th issue?

"Oliver" states, referring to two like subjects being issued by different manufacturers: "It was found to be due to unscrupulous writers imposing on the makers of the pictures, and the failure of the latter to censor the ideas submitted." There are no persons who better realize the utter folly of submitting "used" ideas than the writers. Yet, time after time, a manuscript will be returned as not original. The reason is that with so many brains working along the same lines it is impossible that the ideas do not sometimes overlap.

This possibly sounds absurd to the uninformed. But if anyone doubts that two minds can independently produce the same thoughts, I would refer them to the Patent Office, where hundreds of patents are applied for which cannot be granted because they are already covered. And the patent application costs the petitioner no small sum of money, which is therefore expended with no returns.

In the same way the ideas of the motion picture scenario writers coincide. I know for myself that there are many authors who would have been willing to put up a bond on the originality of subjects afterwards rejected because they conflicted with past productions. For my part, I would have been glad to have done so when I sent a Chicago firm a scenario entitled "The Coward." Yet it was rejected with the statement that: "Two weeks ago the Edison Company released . . . 'A Coward,' which is so closely similar to the one we have on hand, that we must decline to accept your story." One Independent firm in New York has rejected so many subjects as being copied that, fearing having the reputation to them of plagiarizing and therefore their unwillingness to accept any of my work, I positively do not dare to send them another subject. A few weeks ago I sent a sketch, "Fly Paper," to a Philadelphia firm, who rejected it because the Vitagraph Company were preparing their "A Sticky Proposition," which was too similar. On the former cases my word only can be taken; but the latter subject was submitted before the Vitagraph's production had been released, making it impossible that I should have plagiarized.

Therefore, patient readers of scenarios, I ask you not to say in returning a manuscript, "This is not original," as it has a sarcastic sting in it; but rather, "This idea has been used before." Remember that some of the writers are also business men of very high standing in their own community. And most of all, remember that men are paying daily fat sums of money to obtain patents on ideas "which are not original!"

Yours very truly,

A READER.

THE "NERO" INJUNCTION SUIT.

Kauffman, Herzberg & Finkler,
Attorneys-at-Law,
Number Two Rector Street,
New York, Nov. 12, 1909.

The Moving Picture World,
125 East Twenty-third street, New York.

Gentlemen—Our attention has been called to an article in your issue dated November 20, 1909, entitled "'Nero' Injunction Denied and Case Dismissed."

We note particularly the last paragraph, which reads as follows:

"Taking this as a precedent, the position of the film importer is certainly not an enviable one, as it appears that no contract or international agreement can prevent any exchange in this country from purchasing copies abroad and issuing to the trade here before the American regular release date of the film. There is only one course open for the importer and that is to refuse to place orders for any film that has been released in Europe more than a few days before the date set for the American release. The European manufacturers who are now in this country are willing to enter into such an agreement."

We desire to point out that the only effect of the decision to which the article refers was to deny the motion to continue the temporary injunction. The case has not been dismissed, and there has been absolutely no adjudication of the rights of film importers, purchasers or agents in general, or of the parties to this particular action. The merits of the action will be determined by trial in due course, and the rights of the parties will then be adjudicated.

Personally, we do not question that the validity and binding effect of contracts relating to moving picture film will be recognized and enforced in the same way as that of contracts relating to any other class of merchandise. It may be of interest to the trade, however, to note that the primary purpose of his proceeding, namely, to prevent the use of a film subject before the regular release date, has been accomplished by the proceedings to date.

The matter of a permanent injunction has not in any manner been passed upon and can come up only upon the trial of the issues.

We would ask you to publish this letter in your next issue.

Very truly yours,

KAUFFMAN, HERZBERG & FINKLER.

New York City.—The new moving picture theater at 2097 Third avenue, owned by Pascarolla, is being enlarged and entirely remodeled.

"The Governor's Daughter," a true story, issued by the Kalem Company this week, is one of the best things they have yet tackled.

The Fistiana Film Exchange is the latest of the film companies to step into the field. Joseph P. Geiger, for over a year and a half identified as the manager of the fight picture branch of the Chicago Film Exchange, is at the head of the concern. Jimmy Coffroth, the dean of fight promoters, is affiliated with Geiger and his partner and there is every indication that the new exchange will prosper. Mr. Geiger already has in his possession films of the first championship fight in which Battling Nelson engaged, the fight that won him the white lightweight championship, the Britt-Summers fight in England, the Attell-Moran featherweight battle, films that have never been shown here, the Nelson-Hyland fight and a few copies of the Ketchel-Papke fight. He is negotiating with England for the Welsh-Summers battle. Coffroth, who probably has had more fight pictures than any one man or company, will turn all films over to Geiger and fights which are of less importance than a title affair will be secured by Geiger. Geiger, who for years was prominently identified with newspaper work, took up work for the Chicago Film Exchange when that corporation secured the Gans-Nelson films, and Geiger earned over $60,000 for that firm through his untiring efforts. He is shipping his films all over the country. He has opened offices at 1338 South Troy street, Chicago, Ill.

A NEW INDEPENDENT EXCHANGE THAT DELIVERS THE GOODS.

The United Film Renting Company, of 121 East Twenty-third street, New York City, report the completion of their offices and business in full running order. They are buying from twelve to fourteen reels of high-class Independent subjects per week and have already secured the support of a great number of appreciative exhibitors who were seeking a good film service. The United Film Renting Company express themselves as more than satisfied with the result of the first week's efforts. All the pictures they handle are of the best type, as nothing of an inferior or second rate character finds its way into the United Film Renting Company's hands. Independent exhibitors who desire a prompt service of good subjects should get in touch with the United Film Renting Company, where they will find exery possible consideration given to their needs. One thing more. Heretofore Independent exchanges have tried to build up a trade on old films so as to enable them to buy new goods as their business increased. Here we have a new concern that does things different. They start in with a full service of new film, buying everything American or foreign that appeals to them. Such enterprise should be encouraged by Independent exhibitors. They will get better houses with this kind of service and for it they can afford to pay more money.

FILMS

WHEN WOMEN WIN

Things in general are going to be vastly different "When Women Win." But happy to say we have not come to this as yet. The film, however, is exceedingly funny and will be a big hit from start to finish. Length, 550 feet.

THE RUBBER MAN

A ruber automaton gets its wires crossed and passes out of the control of the inventor. It causes untold troubles until it is ducked in a horse-trough and the water disarranges the machinery. There is not a dull second in the whole film. Length, 270 feet.

RELEASED NOVEMBER 25

MARTYR OR CRANK

A rich man, to disprove the dependence on circumstantial evidence, commits suicide. Everything points to the trusted servant and he is arrested for murder; until a letter is found in which the true circumstances are explained. Length, 580 feet.

FINNIGAN'S INITIATION

Mike Finnigan is delighted when he is elected to membership in the Midnight Knights of Erin. His initiation is certainly the most unique of secret societydom, and the film is a scream from start to finish. Length, 420 feet.

AN INTERVIEW WITH CARL LAEMMLE.

Film Manufacturer and Member of National Independent Alliance.

In an interesting interview secured by The Moving Picture World, Mr. Carl Laemmle, president of the Laemmle Film Service and president of the Independent Moving Pictures Company of America ("Imp"), makes statements and predictions which, if verified by future events, will affect the moving picture trade of the entire world. In his talk, Mr. Laemmle dealt with topics of interest to everybody concerned in one way or another with the business of motion photography and projection. For the convenience of our readers, we epitomize his remarks as follows:

1. He declares he sees breakers ahead for the Patents Company, asserting that one of the licensed manufacturers is selling film to three Independent exchanges at cut prices. This information he claims to have from authority which is unimpeachable, his informant stating that the cut prices are made without the knowledge of the other licensed manufacturers.

2. He confirms the rumor that he has sold out the New York office of the Laemmle Film Service to the Empire Film Company through a deal just closed with Mr. Kessel. The arrangement is such that Mr. Laemmle will be able to reopen the New York office later on.

3. He denies the rumor that he is intending to bring action in criminal libel against what he calls "the trust's fireside companion."

4. He declares the future hope of the moving picture business lies in "driving out the crooks, dupers and fakers," and asserts his willingness to co-operate with anybody, "even the Patents Company," to achieve that object.

5. He predicts that at an early date, moving picture outfits will be sold by the thousand in private homes, on the instalment plan, just as phonographs are now a common household pleasure. This, he says, will open an amazing new era for the whole trade.

6. He predicts moving pictures in natural colors at a much earlier date than is commonly anticipated. Experiments by his own inventors are making astonishing progress, he adds.

"This," said Mr. Laemmle, after his first thorough inspection of his new Imp factory, "is the happiest day of my life. Considering the strain we have been under in order to get our first few releases on the market, we are gratified at the progress we have made and more than gratified with the reception given us by the Independent exchanges and exhibitors. On my flying trip through New York when I returned from Europe, I didn't have things in such shape that I could tell you much of interest, but now you can fire away with all the questions you may have on your mind."

"First and foremost, then, is it true that you have sold out the New York office? I mean the rental office."

"Yes," was Mr. Laemmle's reply, "that is true. I have sold it to the Empire Film Company, making my deal with Mr. Kessel, who made his proposition to me at what you might call the psychological moment. If I had never started my film factory, I would not have let the rental office go. True, it was not making any profits, but I knew it would not make any the first few months, or even the first year of its existence. But the details of getting the factory ready have been something frightful. They involved three or four times as much work and planning as I anticipated, and a good deal more cash. We are gradually getting things in shape, but there are still countless little things that must be attended to. We have had rotten luck about our posters to go with the films, for instance, and in many other ways have had disappointments which have all had to be overcome.

"My deal with Mr. Kessel leaves things in such shape that I can reopen my New York rental office later on without being guilty of any breach of faith.

"It didn't take long to discover that there is something of infinitely more immediate importance than the New York rental office, and that is to get out good, live American films for the whole trade in America. This is what the exhibitors everywhere are yelling for and they need it a whole lot more than the New York Independents need my rental office."

"What have you learned about the film situation since you returned from abroad?"

"The thing that struck me as being a straw showing the direction of the wind is the trouble brewing in the ranks of the licensed film manufacturers. I have it from the highest possible authority—an authority which is absolutely unimpeachable—that one of the licensed manufacturers has been selling goods at cut prices to three different Independent exchanges, each of the three exchanges thinking it is the only one that is able to get the bargain counter prices. The other licensed manufacturers are onto this—at least some of them are—and I have been told it probably means the breaking up of any and all agreements with the Patents Company after the first of January. This all indicates that the licensed manufacturer is unable to dispose of all of his goods to the licensed exchanges and finds that its agreement with the Patents Company is becoming entirely too burdensome.

Seeks to Eliminate the Film Duper.

"Another thing that has become strikingly prominent in the American field is the growing number of fakers, dupers and crooks in the game. Before the business, as a whole, can hope for any future, it must drive these people either out of the field altogether or else force them into the paths of square dealing. I have had some pretty bitter doses from the Patents Company and others in my time, but I will be willing to co-operate even with them whenever they force themselves to see the necessity of cleaning up the film business and driving out the crooks.

"This business is an infant compared with what is in store for it. Every new business has to go through a period of chaos before a regular order of procedure can be established. Once we get rid of the chaos, you will see wonderful progress in the whole world of motion photography and projection.

"I know for a positive fact that it is only a question of a short time when moving picture outfits will be sold to private homes just as phonographs are sold now. Imagine the revolution this will bring about. I even hesitate to prophesy the ramifications of this tremendous thing.

Experimenting with Color Photography.

"And that's not all. Marvelous progress is being made in natural color photography for moving pictures. I discovered in Germany one obscure inventor who has mastered the essentials of this vast improvement, and I also have a man in this country working along the same lines. Have you enough imagination to grasp the enormous possibilities of this? Don't think for a minute that I am being jollied up by some scatter-brained lunatic. I have listened to the dream talk of many and many an inventor and I have seen but few of their dreams come true. But in this case I have seen actual demonstrations in color photography. It is still in an uncommercial condition, but it seems to be only a question of months, not of years, before the world will be astounded with the dream of decades.

"Other manufacturers are experimenting along the same line. It is an open secret. The one that wins in the race will be the big man. But at that there will be room for a good many more than one.

"On still another matter: Lately I have been getting a fine and handsome damning for exposing the 'ten per cent. penalty' exacted by certain groups of licensed film exchanges whenever their customers switch their business from one exchange to another. But as yet not a single exchange in the scheme has had the nerve to deny it, because they know I've got the goods and can prove every statement I have made. This sort of thing hurts all exchanges in the eyes of the exhibitor, and that's why I exposed it and placed the blame where it belongs. Readers of your paper have written, thanking me for keeping them posted on the inside facts of the film business. In every case they were exhibitors. I promised them a long time ago that I would turn the searchlight on every rotten spot I could find in the film business, and I am keeping that promise to the very letter."

"Is there any truth in the story that you intend to bring criminal libel proceedings against the moving picture paper which misstated facts about your business affairs?"

"Bless your heart, no!" was the laughing response. "The people who read the Patents Company's fireside companion read it because they know it will never say anything nice about the Independent cause, and most of them hate the Independent movement as a bull hates a red rag. That publication spoke of the 'passing of Laemmle' when I turned Independent. And the 'passing of Laemmle' was one time when they used a true phrase, for everybody in the business knows I have passed into a greater and stronger position than ever before. Since then I have achieved my great ambition, by becoming a manufacturer. No, I'm not going to bring action against the paper. Such a thing would hurt no one but the editor, and he is but a tool in the hands of brainier men. Besides, that's not the way to reach the vulnerable spot of the film trust."

THE GOVERNOR'S DAUGHTER

An absorbing pictorial drama of Colonial days, adapted from the memoirs of one James Montague Munroe, a young minister of the gospel, and relating the romantic story of his courtship of Lady Betty, the daughter of Virginia's Tory Governor. Beginning shortly before the opening of the Revolutionary War, it carries them along in a series of beautiful historical scenes, until the final happy reconciliation, after the surrender of Cornwallis.

It is with great satisfaction we make the announcement of this film, for it more than fulfills our promise of the superiority of our future output. We feel it is justly entitled to be called an issue de luxe. It is a remarkable film in all respects. The photography is the best, the costumes are historically correct, the scenic settings and localities that actually figured in the Revolutionary War, and the actors, even to the humblest of the scores used, seem to have caught the spirit of the Colonial times.

THE OPEN GATE.—The two dominant features of the character of a true woman are love and duty, and no two elements are more belligerent than these, for love is often beset by duty, in which struggle duty, in the honest, invariably prevails. Such an occasion forms the theme of this Biograph subject. Hetty and George were old-time sweethearts, and as years went by George could never muster up courage to "pop the question." Finally, he bought an engagement ring, and calling Hetty out to the garden gate, with extreme effort, declared his love and put the ring on her finger, before he realized the great extent of his daring. What a sigh of relief he breathed when it was over and she had accepted. Well, the earth contained no two happier souls than George and Hetty on that day. But, alas, the sunshine soon turned to shade, for on the evening of the same day, Hetty receives a letter telling her of the sudden death of her sister, who, leaving a little daughter three years old, made a last request, that as she had cared for Hetty through her childhood, Hetty would care for her little one, Mary. This was, indeed, a blow, and after a mental struggle, her plain duty to her sister's child forces her to break off her engagement with George. Sending for him, she meets him at the gate, and expressing her determination, gives him back the ring. The poor fellow is stunned at first, crushed in the extreme. Then he tries to reason, but in vain. Finally, dashing through the gate, he throws it open with such force, that it flies back against the fence, and sticks, with a broken hinge. Off he goes and is soon out of sight, never, he declares, to return. Years roll on, and often does Hetty stand at the gate and dream of the one who threw it open, and open it remains, for he has gone apparently forever. It is now fifteen years later and Mary has grown to young womanhood. Jack, the nephew of George, and Mary are now sweethearts and meet at the open gate, where the old, old story is again told. Aunt Hetty must be consulted, and she, of course, gives hearty consent. Jack has received a letter from his Uncle George, stating that he is tired of his wandering and may return any moment. So the boy has much to be happy for. However, the course of true love never runs smooth, and the young lovers quarrel. Mary returns the ring, and Jack also goes through the gate determined never to return. Aunt Hetty, learning of this, takes Mary to the gate and tells how a hasty tiff blighted her life and begs her to be reasonable and go after him. Meanwhile, Uncle George has arrived and meets Jack, who tells him his tale of woe. Uncle George volunteers to intercede with the girl, not knowing who she really is, and takes the boy's ring to heal the wound. Arriving at the gate, he is surprised to find it leads to Hetty's old home. Aunt Hetty hears the old call, and hastening out, finds her old sweetheart standing where he stood fifteen years before. Hetty then tells him the gate has remained open since his departure. George then closes the gate, renews his suit and is accepted. In lieu of a ring, Uncle George appropriates the boy's, so when Mary, who has gone to bring back Jack, arrives with him and asks, "Where is my ring?" Aunt Hetty shows her hand adorned with it. There is now a double wedding.

THE MOUNTAINEER'S HONOR.—In the hills of old Kentucky death was always preferable to dishonor, and once there occurred a blot on the family's good name it was never effaced. Such, whose fate it befell to incur the tarnish, were shunned as moral lepers. This was the awful anticipation of the mother when she did the deed that terminates our story. The family, comprising mother, father, son and a harum-scarum daughter, knew nothing of the world outside the old blue hills where they lived. Their ways were simple and honest. The harum-scarum was loved by a humble mountain poet, but she, hare-brained, could not appreciate his candor. One evening a belated traveler from the valley calls and asks food and shelter for the night, and although they are at first inclined to turn him away, Harum-Scarum, no doubt struck with his manly appearance, induces them to accommodate him. The valley man at first is amused by the antics of the harum-scarum, and as he leaves in the morning is impressed by the fact that the little rattle-brained girl is in love with him. The consent to meet him is easily obtained, and during the husking dance she steals away to the spot selected. These clandestine meetings become regular occasions, until at last the brother's suspicion is aroused. He follows her on one of her journeys, and arrives just in time to see her cruelly deserted by her lover of the valleys. He questions her, but an answer is unnecessary, and drives her home, just as the old father comes into view over the rocks. The boy, unarmed, borrows the old man's revolver, and bolts off, leaving the father standing perplexed, for he is unaware of his motive. Following the valley man, he catches up with him as he enters the village. Here he demands that the man go back and right the wrong. His demand is refused and the valley man pays the penalty. The vigilance party are soon on the boy's trail and surround his home. They are met by the old mother, who fights ferociously with them at the door. She is overpowered, however, and the sheriff finds the boy hidden in the fireplace. Taking him outside, the mother, who has revived, asks what they intend doing with him. He is to be hanged at once. Hanged! Oh, the ignominy of such an end. What a smirch to the family honor. Cunningly she contrives to avert this awful end. Begging the officer to be allowed to get her son a drink, she goes, and returns with a dipper of water. As he drinks, she shows him a pistol concealed beneath her apron. He nods assent, and it meant but a touch of the trigger to cheat the gibbet. The party, seeing their work anticipated, depart. At this point, the girl realizing that she is the cause of it all rushes out and falls prostrate on her dead brother, but the mother hurls her aside and, with an invective, casts her adrift. The humble mountain poet, still deeply in love with her, is more charitable, and blaming the stranger, and not the unsophisticated mountain girl, takes her in his arms and leads her away. We last see them making their way over the hills with the shades of night slowly shutting them from view.

EDISON MFG. CO.

THREE THANKSGIVINGS (Special).—This film tells the story of an ambitious young countryman who is the oldest son of his widowed mother, and is the chief worker on the farm. The principal business of the farm is raising poultry and shipping it dressed to the New York market. We are introduced to the family circle at a Thanksgiving dinner where all is peace and happiness. Mrs. Jones sits at the head of the table, and John carves the turkey at the other end; while on the right sits his younger brother, and on his left the two children of his widowed sister. Also seated at the table is Aunt Jane. Eliza Wilton, a beautiful girl, the daugther of a neighbor, calls toward the end of the dinner with some dainties for the children. John and she are sweethearts.

From this picture of happiness the story takes us to the great metropolis, where John has gone to improve his fortune, after a pathetic parting from his mother and the old home. In the city he falls into evil ways, but is suddenly recalled to his better self when, in a cafe where turkeys are being raffled on Thanksgiving Eve, he sees on one of the birds a tag, which shows that it came from his mother's home. As his gaze rests upon the tag, the vision of home without him on that day rises before his eyes and he goes to his lodgings in a remorseful mood.

A notice of the discovery of gold in the West catches his eye, as he glances at the newspaper. He determines to go to the gold fields. There he prospects and finally "strikes pay dirt." Returning to his Eastern home on Thanksgiving day, he persuades his Aunt Jane to help him disguise himself, and, pretending to be a friend of his from the West, he meets the family and is seated at the table. He becomes so familiar that his mother and sweetheart are about to resent his intrusion, but when he removes his disguise joy fills the home that for two years has not known his presence.

Comedy, pathos and the atmosphere of rural, city and Western life are beautifully blended in the picture, while the theme of Thanksgiving prevails throughout. It is a picture whose good qualities will commend it at any time, but at this particular season it will appeal to the public more forcefully than ever.

A ROSE OF THE TENDERLOIN.—In "A Rose of the Tenderloin" Mr. Townsend has given us a new phase of New York life, one which, while dealing with its darkest shadows, draws aside the curtain and reveals to our gaze lights of nobility and love where we least expect to find them. He has selected from out of that famous district called "The Tenderloin" characters that are well known in its daily life—men whose exterior appearance tell no story of a hidden sorrow, and little suggest the spark of nobility that lies dormant within their breasts awaiting only the cry of anguish or distress to fan it into flame; and a woman whose cheeks are scarlet with the rouge of shame, while her mother's heart is torn with agony between dread of separation from her offspring and the certain knowledge that the child's life in her present environment will be but a repetition of her own.

The story is simple and briefly told. It deals with the attempt of a woman who is living outside the social pale, to keep her child from being taken away from her by its rich and highly respectable aunt and uncle, with the mother's anguish when confronted with the terrible realization that she is unworthy of her own child, and eventually with the sad and tragic ending.

A notorious gambler, "Tenderloin Harry," has taken a great fancy to little Rose, whom he takes once a week for a day's outing; and it is while Rose is in his care that the sad news comes of her mother's tragic end. "Tenderloin Harry" resolves that he will take care of Rose, will have her educated and will make a lady out of her. A room in his house is at once turned into a nursery, a governess is employed and Rose's education begins. Everything possible is done by him for the waif's comfort and happiness, and it makes a pleasing picture to see this man of the world and his boon companion under the spell of a little child.

But their enjoyment is short lived. In a few days the aunt and uncle appear to claim Rose, bringing with them a letter left by the mother, which reads: "To you who have Rose in your care to-day, do what is best for her future, and God will bless you. Helen." At first Harry will not, cannot give up the child who has so completely crept into his affections. He stubbornly refuses to part with her until they point out to him that phrase in the mother's letter, "do what is best for her future"; then the gambler shows his innate nobility of character, as with a breaking heart he resigns her to the care of her relations and deprives himself of the one ray of comfort that had brightened his desolate life. The parting of the child of the Tenderloin and the notorious gamester is beautiful and touching because of its simplicity and pathos.

BLUEBEARD.—From time immemorial Bluebeard has been one of the most fascinating stories of childhood days. Children of all climes have listened breathlessly to every word of its recital, until the characters have assumed the guise of reality and every word of its narration has sunk deep into lasting memory. Fatima and sister Anne have seemed like living people to their minds, from the time that Fatima, in her mother's lonely hut, accepts the invitation to visit Blueheard's castle until, after marrying him, he is about to behead her for entering the room where he keeps the heads of his former wives. Time after time, too, they have cheered when Fatima's two brothers rush in, and inwardly rejoice when they dispatch the wicked Blueheard, just in time to save poor Fatima's life.

All this has been pictured by the Edison Company in a manner that will amuse the little ones, and give the older generation many happy thoughts and pleasant memories of their own childhood days when fairy tales held undisputed sway.

THEN AND NOW.—We are wont to consider that we have cause to be thankful that we live in these days of civilization and are not beset by the perils that environed our ancestors. This little comedy picture opens the subject for discussion, for it shows us one of our great, great grandfathers with his little family setting out to enjoy a Thanksgiving dinner at his grandfather's house, and the dangers encountered on the way. There are bears and Indians and flights of arrows, which pierce their hats and clothing and which are very much in evidence when they arrive at the end of their tramp.

And the scene shifts to this year, 1909, and we see how much more comfortably the young New Yorker of to-day makes the same trip when he goes to dine out with his grandfather. He meets no bears and there are no Indians. He has only to dodge automobiles and wagons, etc., and to carry his family through a crush on the elevated; and when he arrives at his grandfather's there are no arrows through his clothes—the family toilets show only the effects of being torn and damaged by civilized people in the 20th century. The extent to which their clothes are damaged, however, proves conclusively that travel in these days is attended with considerably more wear and tear upon one's personal attire than it was in the days when a person's raiment was distinguished more for its picturesqueness and wearing qualities than for its elaborateness or strict adherence to fashion's rules.

ANNUAL CELEBRATION OF SCHOOL CHILDREN, NEWARK, N. J., OPEN AIR EXERCISES, AUGUST 19, 1909.—This picture is one of great charm. It was especially arranged for us by the Board of Education of Newark, N. J., and we consider it a privilege to be able to offer it to the trade. It depicts the annual outdoor exercises of the school children of Newark, which are among the largest held in the country. There are about four thousand children engaged in a series of most pleasing dances and exercises, and all these have been artistically reproduced by our camera operator. We were given the best possible position to see the various exercises so that the results as shown on the screen are really better than the average spectator could possibly have enjoyed.

The exercises represent a great variety of dances, drills and marches, including several very charming May-pole dances. A large quantity of film was taken, but only enough selected for the picture to make it interesting and to prevent it from becoming in the least degree tiresome. We are sure the trade and public generally will recognize in this film not only a subject of great interest, as showing the healthy development of school children, but also a most attractive picture in itself because of the fidelity with which the camera has reproduced this scene of youthful grace and animation.

A LADY'S PURSE.—Since man was first pressed into buttoning the waist up behind, or sweated in the torture of finding the eye for the hook, he has looked down on things feminne with a sort of tolerant kindly humor, poking fun in his mannish way. In this jolly little comedy, our comedy producer touches on the tender topic—"What do women carry in those immense handbags?"

Resolved, therefore, to find out, two thieves "spot" a handsomely dressed woman leaving a bank with a bulging handbag and follow her covetously into a department store. Watching their every chance to get away with the "swag" they follow her from the drug department to the ribbon counter and from the ribbon counter to that ultimate destination of every woman who shops—the bargain counter.

A lovely chase follows. One of the most exciting, hair-raising chases you ever could wish for. The miraculous escape of the two thieves from a hundred and one perilous situations finally ends in their dingy back room. They have evaded the police and have obtained the trophy! They bring it forth, place it on the table and gloat over it a moment before they remove "the swag."

Now for the contents of the purse. They watch each other suspiciously as both dive their fingers into it. An itemized description of what the purse contains is given below: Powder puff, hair pins, sample of cloth, safety pins, back curls, clippings of "How to Be Beautiful," stick of gum, lace handkerchief, rabbit's foot, theater seat coupons, button hook, an old letter, twelve cents.

Our heroes drop back in their chairs with mingling feelings of disgust and despair, while up from the street below, ground out relentlessly by the handorgan man, come the delicious strains of that popular song: "Stung."

ON THE WRONG SCENT.—Fate will frolic at times and in this hilarious little comedy Smith is again chosen the toy of her freakish ways.

Smith, and a party of men friends, are enjoying a stein or two at a bar closely adjacent to Smith's office, when a vender of perfumes and toilet water enters the place. The vender is a practical joker and carries, as part of his equipment, a syphon spray to sprinkle prospective customers with the fragrant liquid. Smith gets his, of course, a thorough ducking, and is started home.

When he arrives home Mrs. Smith immediately detects the odoriferous atmosphere about him and, being none too trustful of her spouse, suspects an affair. A woman in the case, no doubt!

Things come to a crisis in a restaurant at dinner when Mrs. Smith detects the same odor, clinging to a woman at a nearby table. The woman, however, is another victim of the annoying perfume vender.

Mrs. Smith jumps to a conclusion immediately and without any explanation whatsoever starts a row with the entirely innocent young lady. Feminine apparel, rats and other makeup soon litter the place while the two claw each other with all the vigor of the Kilkenny cats.

The affair finally ends in a police court, after explanations and corroborations by the perfume vender, already run in. Mrs. Smith is profuse in her apologies, promising tearfully to be so hasty—never, never again!

JUDGMENT.—In this second Western release, "Judgment," we draw a remarkable contrast from the one preceding it, "The Best Man Wins," a sparkling little comedy of Western ranch life. "Judgment" is pure tragedy, not a horror picture, but a vivid, fascinating study of the way of the transgressor and his ultimate destruction.

The scene takes place on a Western ranch in Wyoming. Jim Flanders, a wealthy ranchman, has a beautiful daughter, Alice, who is loved by Tom Ripley, the foreman of the ranch. The match is objected to by Flanders, who desires his daughter to wed a more cultured and refined man. Ripley is so persistent, however, that Flanders discharges him from his services and orders him to leave the ranch.

Robert Gray, an Easterner, and the type of a man, presumably, that Flanders prefers for a son-in-law, is sojourning at the ranch and appears to be desperately in love with Alice. Alice, however, sees through the veneer and Eastern polish of his makeup, and will have nothing to do with him.

A climax comes one day shortly after when Ripley again visits the girl and is ordered away by Flanders. A bitter quarrel ensues in which Ripley draws his gun, but he is saved from shooting the ranchman by the timely interference of the other cowboys. Ripley leaves quietly but makes threats which Flanders and a number of cowboys overhear.

In a quarrel with one of his employees, Pete, a half-breed, Flanders is shot in the back and Gray, arriving on the scene threatens to expose the Mexican, unless he complies to a certain plan, by which he thinks he can dispose of Ripley and win Alice.

The revolver which the half-breed used in shooting his employer is slipped into Ripley's holster and his own removed therefrom. Then an alarm is turned in and a few minutes later Ripley is dragged from his shack and accused of the murder.

Evidence is only too strong and speedy Western Justice is soon served. Ripley is lynched and Gray finds an open road to the girl's hand.

There is a stronger law sometimes than that which is meted out by human hands. "Remorse," that haunting, phantom thing that drives the criminal inevitably to his death, no matter how innocent he may appear in the eyes of the world.

Gray wins Alice's consent to marry him, but as he slips on the engagement ring the girl's form melts and in his deluded mind he imagines Ripley is standing in front of him, an accusing finger pointed at him. Gray, uttering a shriek, staggers back, and flees, leaving the astonished girl staring after him.

He seeks the solitude of the wilds of a rocky canyon, but the form of Ripley continues to haunt him. A circling eagle high up on the cliff, screams mockingly at him, while the roaring mountain torrent hurls accusations at him. He wends his way with difficulty up the face of the cliff and drops in a heap on the top.

Pete, the half-breed, finds him there an hour later. Gray rises and grapples with him. The astonished half-breed struggles, but the superhuman strength of the deluded man crushes all resistance, and a moment later the two totter over the brink to their death on the rocks a thousand feet below.

The picture ends here. Judgment, swift and sure, meted out by the hand of unrelenting fate, has balanced the debt.

GAUMONT.
(George Kleine.)

TULIPS.—The title gives only a hint of the beauty of this film, for at the mention, or sight of the word "Tulips," our mind pictures the full blossoms so often seen as beautiful, bright color studies against the green of foliage and grass in well cared for parks. In the film here presented for your very certain approval we are enabled to observe not only the perfect blossoms in all their various tints and shades, but also the gradual unfolding of the buds through all their processes of development up to the full blown flowers, and thence on past their climax of beauty until they become wilted blossoms and dry stems.

Because of the endless succession of pictures taken with infinite care and patience throughout the life of these blossoms we are enabled to see them come to full maturity in the course of a few moments.

Hours of the flower's growth are perfectly shown to us in all the beauty of natural colors and all the phases of the change from bud to wilted flower.

THE MIXUP AT COURT.—Back in the Middle Ages there lived a nobleman of a very irritable temperament. Although he stood high in the favor of the King, possessed a splendid palace and had a lovely daughter, yet his peevish disposition manifested itself on every possible occasion.

It happened that a wandering minstrel came playing his violin beneath the windows of the castle, soliciting compensation.

The irate noble, hearing the music, flew into a passion and had the musician ejected from the grounds. The strolling violinist, indignant at such treatment, vowed he would get revenge.

Climbing through an open window into the castle, he notices his own exact resemblance to a portrait of the nobleman which hung upon the wall. In a costume belonging to the noble his resemblance to his lordship is perfect.

So excellent is the likeness that the musician decides to go to the King's court, posing as the nobleman.

He acts the part very cleverly, so that the King and his courtiers are completely deceived. His amiable demeanor, however, impresses everybody, as the change from the customary fretfulness is very marked. Meantime the real nobleman hurries to the court.

There a ludicrous scene is presented, the indignant noble denouncing the pretender and demanding the royal recognition. To prove his own identity he sends for his old nurse, who calls attention to a birthmark on his knee. To the amazement of all the disguised musician also has the same birthmark.

The King then takes the law into his own hands and decides that he prefers the one with the gentle and amiable disposition. The real nobleman of the irritable temperament is then thrown out of the royal presence as an impostor.

A HEART'S DEVOTION.—Love stories always appeal to an audience anywhere, but here is a story of tragic love that will linger long in the memory of all. Jack is a handsome young fellow, "well fixed" financially and passionately devoted to two beautiful sisters, Maud and Mable. So great are the charms of each that the poor fellow does not know which to choose.

To make matters still worse, both the girls are in love with Jack.

Time, however, brings matters to a crisis, so it happens that one day Jack and Maud being alone, he proposes to her and is accepted.

Mabel does not know this. Soon after she develops consumption and becomes very ill indeed.

Jack and Maud, their parents and relatives, decide for this reason to keep the engagement secret from the sick sister, fearing the effect the news might have upon her. It is also determined to celebrate the wedding without her knowledge.

Woman's intuition, however, is a remarkable thing and Mabel feels that something is being kept from her. So at the very moment that the wedding party is returning from church and entering the garden of her home, she gets up and meets them.

In an instant the truth flashes upon her in all its awful reality, and with her heart full of bitterness she rushes at her sister; then, completely overcome, she falls dead at her feet.

THE VILLAGE SCARE.—In a beautiful, antiquated little rural hamlet peace reigns supreme. The inhabitants in their picturesque costumes make interesting studies of the "simple life," as they happily move about their labors.

Following this idyll of quaint, calm life, we see the entire population in an awful uproar, for a terrible, indescribable beast has been seen in the streets, a beast with the form of a wolf, but covered with bird-like feathers.

While a few stand guard over their homes and fields, others consult a learned man, who, after deep research, finds the beast is the prehistoric ornitholupus, an animal half bird and half wolf.

The entire populace, the police, and soldiery now organize a hunt to rid the dear town of the monster. The search covers the entire country-side, furnishing many amusing incidents. Particularly pleasing are the frantic efforts of the police to find enough courage to attack the beast.

Consternation and pleasure reign hand in hand when the cause of this great flurry is found to be the mayor's dog, which his children have covered with feathers.

CHILDREN OF THE SEA.—An absorbing story of the Breton coast. One of the coast guardsmen loves pretty Felice, but she loves Jean, a sailor, whose ability promises presently to advance him to a mate's berth. The guardsman is persistent, but Felice will have nothing to do with him and is a trifle afraid of his importunities. But the guardsman is not to be discouraged by repeated rebuffs. He watches his opportunity, and five years later he is still as eager as ever. Five years have made some difference in Felice. She finds the long periods when her husband is away more dreary than she had supposed they would be, and she is not averse to a mild flirtation with the handsome guardsman in his showy uniform.

She yields her lips to his kisses, and he follows her home to press his advantage; when she realizes what she is doing, the thought of her husband oppresses her and she dashes from the house, followed by the alarmed guardsman, who cannot overtake her before she reaches the top of the cliff and throws herself down its precipitous sides.

A SERVANT'S REVENGE.—Bridget resents the dictation of her mistress, whose temper is a trifle more acid than usual because she is preparing the house for a dinner party. Bridget is dismissed and vows to be revenged. She bribes the grocer's assistant to change clothes with her, and in this disguise she visits the scene of her late employment, armed with a package of cascarets. These she places in the various pots and pans simmering on the stove and then disconnects the hose of the gas lamp in the dining room, connecting it with the garden hose outside the window. The dinner party starts off in an auspicious fashion, but presently the guests become uneasy, and a geyser of water from the gas jets completes their discomfiture. The butler rushes wildly after a physician, who administers wholesale treatment with miraculous effect, and the mistress, who has gone upstairs to powder her nose, comes back with her face liberally coated with burnt cork. Bridget discloses her identity and gloats over her very complete revenge.

FOILED.—An aged negro is dismissed from his place for clumsiness, but does not tell that it was because the small son of the family for which he worked was annoying him with a bean blower. Slowly he takes himself to his home, and the boy is a trifle frightened at the unexpected ending to his joke. A little later the boy is abducted by kidnappers and held for ransom. Suspicion is directed against the negro, but his protestations of innocence are at last believed and he joins in the chase. The boy's elder brother has encountered the kidnappers and is shot by them. Badly wounded, he is not able to make his way home, but the negro finds him beside the road and he gives information of the whereabouts of the kidnappers. An attack is made upon their hut and the boy rescued, badly frightened, but unharmed by his thrilling experiences, while the old negro is relieved of the last vestige of suspicion.

WHEN WOMEN WIN.—Things in general are going to be vastly different when women win the right to vote and do other mannish things. In one little town the women come into control of the street railway system and as a first step dismiss the entire staff of male clerks. Directors' meetings are turned into afternoon teas and Friday is bargain day with the fare marked down. Women postmen use their own judgment in the delivery of the mails and show themselves to be no more averse to flirtations than their men confreres, and the kid-gloved lady street cleaners are even more autocratic than the humble whitewings. But this is not the end of progress. In the last scene an anxious wife paces the floor, unable to conceal her doubts and fears, while the grave-faced physician and an attentive nurse go silently about. At last

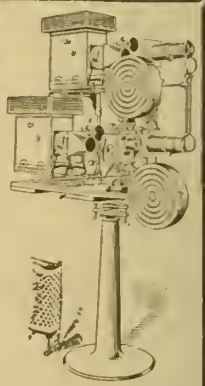
HALLBERG ECONOMIZER



MR. J. H. HALLBERG, ARCHIBALD, PA., OCTOBER 21, 1909

Dear Sir:

Since installing the "HALLBERG" Automatic Electric Economizer the illumination is 100% brighter on the screen. Last evening an exhibitor from a neighboring town visited our theater, and almost his first question was "where do you get all the light?" He is using an economy coil of another make, but confessed that we are getting far better results with your machine.

I regard the purchase of your Economizer as the very best investment we have made, as our patrons continually comment upon the brightness of our pictures compared with those shown in other places. Yours truly, LYRIC AMUSEMENT CO. RICHARD F. FOOTE, Manager.

Hallberg's Economizer

Dear Sir: FRANKLIN, N. H., June 8

I write to you in regard to the Motiograph machine. Will say that I have run the Motiograph since October 20, 1908, and it has run perfectly in every way and shows a perfect picture, steady and clear. I have seen all of the moving picture machines run, but I have never seen any that can compare with the Motiograph, and will say further would use no other machine.

Yours respectfully, C. H. BEAN, Pastime Theatre.

THE RUBBER MAN.—A rubber automaton gets its wires crossed and passes out of the control of its inventor. In its rampage it throws the inventor and his family out of the window, and when they call in the police the rubber man proves himself more than a match for three of them and makes his escape to the street. Here he continues his devastating way and all who cross his path are made to suffer. An old maid, whose home he enters, is unceremoniously shoved up a chimney, to be rescued by the pursuers, and in a dry goods store both place and shoppers are wrecked before the rubber man can be chased out.

Now the pursuit leads to the country, and there is a lively game of fox and hounds, but the rubber man doubles and returns to the city, where a dive through a bass drum adds a German hand to the number of his victims. At last they catch up with him and duck him in a horse trough. The water disarranges the delicate machinery and the rubber man is again a mere automaton robbed of possibilities for destruction.

MARTYR OR CRANK?—William Baker, a retired banker, was a man of great positiveness of ideas. Engaged in a controversy with a friend over a murder trial in which circumstantial evidence decided the fate of the accused, he proved the danger of inference at the sacrifice of his own life. Planning carefully to throw every suspicion upon a body servant, he commits suicide. The servant is arrested, tried and convicted on circumstantial evidence, but upon his conviction Baker's ante-mortem statement is handed the judge and the faithful servant is freed, with the Baker fortune to pay him for the mental torture he endured.

FINNIGAN'S INITIATION.—Mike Finnigan is delighted when he is elected to membership in The Midnight Knights of Erin, and so is Nora, but when a committee from Skidoo Lodge, No. 23, call for their prospective victim and weep as Mike kisses Nora what may be his good-bye, she begins to have her doubts. Mike is too much elated to think of anything until he arrives at the hall and the members thoughtfully measure him for his coffin. Then he begins to wonder, but not for long, for he is put through a series of most remarkable experiences, each one funnier than the last—unless you happen to be the person undergoing the initiation—until poor Finnigan makes his escape, and in the absurd garb of a candidate makes his way down the streets to his home.

There his courage returns and he starts to show Nora how it all happened. It does not suit Nora's fancy at all, and instead of taking the initiation she takes the skillet and gives Finnigan a second initiation that lacks the fancy trimmings of the first but which is very much more in earnest.

PATHE FRERES.

TWO CHUMS LOOKING FOR WIVES.—Jim and Harry are anxious to become benedicts, so insert an advertisement in one of the leading journals, saying that they would like to meet two pretty and worthy girls. Object, matrimony.

Martha and Mignon read the advertisement as they sit in the park one day, and being anxious to revenge themselves on their present admirers, whom they have discovered flirting with two other girls, decide to answer Jim and Harry. They write, therefore, making an appointment.

In the next scene we see the meeting. Jim and Harry are completely carried away with their new acquaintances, and decide to show them a good time. After an hour's acquaintance, however, the girls do not find Jim and Harry as interesting as they expected, and they think with longing of their old admirers.

Well, it all ends up as it should. The girls' little trick has had effect, and their old admirers return to their old loves and insist upon an immediate marriage; while Jim and Harry console themselves with the daughters of a poor clergyman, who, having a great many daughters of a marriageable age on his hands, only wishes there were a few more Harrys and Jims around in search of wives.

IN INDIA—MARRIAGE OF THE NEPHEW OF MAHARAJAH OF TAGORE.—The slowly moving craft, filled with natives in loose, gayly colored costumes, ply on the water waiting for the wedding procession to start. The sound of clarionets is soon heard in the distance, and before very long the procession is in view. We see the natives, with stolid, serious expressions on their dark faces, marching along to the strains of their own weird music. Finally, the groom, sitting alone in a carriage drawn by a span of splendid horses, comes into view. The little bride follows in a sedan chair, looking a very timid little creature, indeed. The bride and groom take their places on a sort of dais, and from their expression it would seem that they are not greatly enjoying all this fuss in their honor. Some Indian maidens then execute a peculiar Indian dance, making motions with their hands as if in imitation of snakes springing forward and then retreating.

HER DRAMATIC CAREER.—An unfortunate creature, who, when the story opens, has seen only the seamy side of life, and who has been brought up among the lowest surroundings, wanders one day into a tavern frequented by the roughest characters, in the hope of gathering together a few pennies with which to buy some food. Her appearance there, however, is the cause of strife between two of th "toughs," one of whom happens to be an old admirer of the woman, who, notwithstanding the life she has led, still retains her good looks. During the struggle between the two men, the woman is thrown out bodily into the snow, where she lies unconscious, and her body is almost covered with the fast-falling flakes when an automobile passes that way and the occupant, a wealthy youth, jumps out to see if he can be of assistance. He lifts the poor benumbed creature into his car and takes her to his home, where, during her convalescence, he learns to love her and finally offers her marriage. After their marriage they live like turtle doves together, although the woman often has moments of intense suffering for fear her husband might turn his back on her should he ever discover how low and undesirable were her associates before she was fortunate enough to meet him. Her fears are not groundless, either, as she has already been the recipient of threatening letters from her former lover, to whom she has been obliged to send "hush money" on several occasions.

Becoming attracted by the footlights, after having witnessed many performances by the best actors and actresses, our heroine finally induces her husband to assist her in securing an engagement with a well-known manager. The latter finds that the applicant has decided talent and has made her a splendid offer. On the evening of her debut, as she is alone in her dressing room, her former lover makes his appearance and, being down on his luck and therefore somewhat desperate, after an unsuccessful request for money, he tears the woman's necklace from her throat, and when she tries to call for help, strangles her. As he is rushing from the place with the jewels he meets the woman's husband, who hands him over to the police. The frightened woman then pours out her confession regarding her former life, while her noble husband listens with tears in his eyes and reassures her when she hints that his love for her must now be dead.

THE NOBLEMAN'S DOG.—Aubry de Montidier, a nobleman attached to the court of Charles V. of France, was assassinated by Richard Macaire, who was jealous of the favor the King showed the handsome courtier. During his lifetime, Sir Aubry owned a dog renowned for its devotion to its master. Macaire knew this and had the dog chained up, but the latter, breaking his leash, succeeded, after a long hunt, in locating the spot where the murderer had buried the body of his victim. On finding his master's body, the intelligent beast goes in search of one of his master's friends, and the latter, on witnessing the dog's unusual behavior, makes up his mind that something is wrong; so follows the faithful animal as he conducts him to the spot where the body has been interred. When Macaire is confronted by his dumb accuser, the latter exhibits such an animosity towards him that suspicion is immediately aroused. The King therefore orders that a sort of judiciary duel shall take place between the suspected man and the dog.

The man's weapon is an enormous stick and the dog is given a barrel with which to defend himself. The King and all the royal household witness the exciting encounter between the man and beast, and after a close contest the man is finally defeated and sentenced to be hanged.

HOW FRENCH PERFUMES ARE MADE.—Grasse, the beautiful city of flowers, situated in the southern part of France, is picturesquely laid out in the form of an ampitheater. The manufacture of perfumes is one of the chief industries of this town. In the first view we see women busily picking the pretty flowers. When the latter are taken to the factory they are dipped in hot grease, in order to extract the essence. This grease is then mixed with alcohol, which absorbs the fragrance. The preparation is then strained and bottled to be sold to the ladies of fashion, many of whom would not think their toilet complete without several bottles of the imprisoned sweetness of the humble little blossoms that once grew and thrived on the hillsides in the beautiful city of Grasse, France.

THE PATIENT FROM PUNKVILLE.—As he sits in his office one morning, Dr. Lank receives a telegram from one of his colleagues asking him to come to Chester at once, as he wishes to consult with him. After reading the message, the doctor snatches up his hat and coat, and with his satchel in his hand, hurries to catch the train for his friend's home. As soon as the doctor leaves, the servants, thinking that he will be gone for the day, decide to take a few hours off; so, locking up the house, start off for a good time. Two burglars, who have been hanging around the premises for some time, on seeing everybody leave, cross the street and are soon able to force an entrance into the house. They lose no time in gathering the valuables together; before they have finished collecting their spoil, however, the doorbell rings, and before opening it they quickly decide that one is to impersonate the doctor and the other the servant. As the latter opens the door he sees a countryfied looking fellow, who asks to see Dr. Lank. He is ushered into the waiting room, and soon the doctor makes his appearance, but refuses to examine the patient before he receives his fee. The patient from Punkville, therefore, dives down into his pocket and gladdens the make-believe physician by handing over the amount demanded. The doctor then proceeds to examine the patient's lungs, at the same time removing his watch and wallet, which he hands to his servant. He then writes out a prescription, the purport of which is (the patient having complained of pains in his foot) to give that member a strenuous rubbing for one hour every day.

In the meantime, Dr. Lank, while waiting on the station platform for his train, receives another wire from his friend in Chester, telling him that he need not bother to come, as "all is well; patient dead." The doctor therefore returns home, and when the burglars hear him coming they think the best way out of the predicament is to pretend that they are patients. When Dr. Lank enters, the biggest of the burglars wears a most mournful expression and begs the doctor to give him his attention at once. As the physician leans over to examine his heart, the burglar removes his watch with the same ease as he did that of the poor patient from Punkville. He also manages to get the doctor's money, and after the latter has written out a prescription, the second-story men bid the physician good-day. Hardly have they gone, however before Dr. Lank realizes that he has been robbed, and goes after the two fellows with a will. On his way he comes upon the poor patient from Punkville, who is conscientiously rubbing his afflicted member up and down on the carpet, in an adjoining room, and the doctor, thinking he is the burglar, hands him over to the police. In the end, however, the real culprits are apprehended and taken into custody.

ADONIS IS ROBBED OF HIS CLOTHES.—A romantic youth, strolling through the woods one day, is pounced upon by some unscrupulous marauders and divested of every stitch of clothes. Realizing that he must remain in the woods all night, unless he thinks of some way out of his predicament, he finally decides to make himself a garment of leaves, and after adjusting same, he cautiously goes about regaining his own fireside. As he tiptoes out of the woods, casting furtive glances from side to side, he suddenly comes upon a young ladies' seminary out for a promenade. A series of shrieks goes up from the bevy of blushing young girls on beholding our terrified friend, who, before many minutes have elapsed, finds himself in the custody of two officers of the law, who insist upon taking him to the station house, leaves and all. On their arrival, however, the prisoner regains his composure and after explaining his case to the satisfaction of the presiding officer, he is supplied with a wardrobe and allowed to go home.

THE FISHERMAN'S BRIDE.—In close proximity to the quickly improving little city of Astoria, Ore., noted for its fisheries, there lives old Skipper Stout and his daughter, Jennie. An old acquaintance, Jed Prouty, is anxious to form an alliance between his son, Hiram, and Jennie, the latter really being in love with John Todd, a fisher lad.

Skipper Stout favors Hiram's suit, because of the apparent prosperity his energies have yielded him and consents to the match. This is agreed upon and seeing his daughter talking to John down on the beach, he and the two Proutys join them, only to find Jennie in the arms of John, a willing subject to John's honest pleading that she become his wife.

With this condition of affairs confronting him, old Stout informs Todd of the betrothal he has just acquiesced in between his daughter and Hiram. Thereupon, Jennie, thus placed in a dilemma wherein she must choose, openly avows her love for Todd. The natural outcome is hasty words, bred of quickened tempers, and after a lively quarrel, and the wrenching of muscle against muscle, John hurries his sweetheart into a fishing-yawl nearby and pulls away.

A week later we find the young couple married, much to the chagrin of Hiram, whose father shares in his dismay. They then determine to revenge themselves on the unsuspecting young husband, and form a plot to entice him down to one of the wharf-landings.

Arriving at the wharf, he is engaged in conversation by the supposed buyer, and while thus engrossed, is beset by Hiram, his father and others. A coat is thrown deftly over his head, and after a fierce struggle for freedom, he is thrown aboard an awaiting tug boat, which immediately puts out into the sound.

The engines of the tug are scarcely in motion, when Jennie, frantic with what she has just seen, and despite her father's attempted intervention, rushes to a nearby revenue office. Once there, she startles the occupants with a hasty recital of what has taken place. With authority derived from Uncle Sam they at once board a faster vessel, and taking the girl with them, start in pursuit.

That a stern chase is a long one proves true in this instance. Yet they begin slowly but surely to overhaul the tug ahead, and just as John is about to be "shanghaied" aboard a large tramp steamer, the tug is boarded by the rescuing party, after an exchange of a few shots, and John is delivered to the welcome arms of his hysterical young wife. The absconders are made prisoners, and after alighting at the wharf left only a few hours before, the culprits are laced in stocks amid the hooting and jeering of the assembled throng of curious on-

The Edison Kinetoscope

Ten times as many people can afford to go to a moving picture show as can afford to go to a theater.

These same people will make a special effort to afford to go twice as often, if the pictures are especially good—clear and steady, with no long waits between while the machine is being repaired.

That's one reason why the exhibitors, who are using the Edison Kinetoscope, are making more money than any other motion picture operators in the field.

And another reason is, that when you use an Edison Kinetoscope your gross profit is your net profit—you don't throw your profits away on repairs. The Edison Kinetoscope will outlast any other motion picture machine made.

You play to a crowded house every night—and the crowd comes back for more.

Write to-day for booklet giving full details, and copy of the Edison Kinetogram.

UP SAN JUAN HILL.—Spanish oppression forever ended on the Western Hemisphere when President McKinley sent Garcia his famous message recognizing the insurgent forces in the field and declaring for American intervention and asking for a consultation of our officers with that leader for freedom's cause.

Lieut. Bowen, a young American officer of proven intelligence, was intrusted with the message, the Spanish secret service men stationed in Washington were able to learn of this and our opening scene shows Valdez and his wife, emissaries of Spain, making a copy of a cipher dispatch which orders them to stop the message at all hazards.

We see Bowen arrive at Tampa and meet his sweetheart in the beautiful grounds of the Bay View Hotel, the Spanish spies watch the meeting from their window with field glasses. Bowen is to row across the bay to a U. S. launch where the government vessel Wasp, with steam up, waits to run the gauntlet for the Cuban coast. Bowen's instructions are simple, "after landing on Cuban soil you are to find General Garcia and deliver the President's message." Somewhere in the field fastness of the interior, Garcia lurks, ready to pounce upon the Spanish oppressors of his people. A guerilla war is always conducted secretly. Bowen fully realizes the difficulties that confront him; several startling scenes occur at Tampa, before Bowen is seen to board the launch, bid good-bye to the woman he loves and leave the chagrined spies behind. They follow, however, and after two weeks we again meet Bowen searching for Garcia. He discovers that he is followed; then our shrewd young officer plays Valdez a Yankee trick. Coming to a deep, narrow stream where the shores are heavily hung with tropical foliage, he boldly plunges his horse into the stream and finds a natural pocket near the opposite shore, turns into it, dismounts and with his sabre soon builds a leafy wall that screens both man and horse from his pursuers. Valdez and a group of Spanish cavalry ride up, swim the stream and disappear. Our hero coolly mounts his horse, takes the back track and renews his quest. Then comes the finding of Garcia, the consultation of the generals, the Rough Riders going into action at El Caney, then four thrilling military scenes, depicting the capture of San Juan Hill.

"One week later." Valdez, realizing that the Spanish cause is lost and burning with a desire for vengeance, lures Bowen's sweetheart to an isolated mission in the interior, and coming with a band of hirelings to secure possession of the girl his enemy loves, is surprised by a passing band of American and Cuban soldiers, headed by Lieut. Bowen, and is ignominiously defeated, and coming face to face with our young Lieutenant, Valdez meets a soldier's death. Our closing scene depicts the fortune of war.

ON THE BORDER.—The class of humanity that flock to the borderland of civilization are always of an adventurous nature, the kind of people who dislike conventions and long for freedom, and very often we find the lawless element predominating. Our present story deals with life in the early sixties along the Mexican border. A motley mixture of gamblers, Mexican herders, ranchers and Texas cattle men have gathered for an evening's entertainment at Gabby's palace dance hall and thirst parlor. Gambler Joe, a magnificent specimen of manhood and a product peculiar to our borderland, saunters up to a table where Monte Pete, a wealthy Mexican ranch owner, is playing cards with a group of his countrymen. Monte and Joe are rivals for the favor of a pretty senorita, Papinta, and as Joe arrives he is favored with a shy recognition from Papinta, which angers Monte, and, to get Joe away from the girl, Monte proposes a game of draw. Joe, nothing loath, removes his coat and the game begins. At the very first deal Joe discovers the Mexican in the act of concealing a card, and in the mixup that follows Monte Pete is marked for life with a bullet from Joe's ready weapon. Monte's crowd are too strong for Joe, so he figures discretion the better part of valor, and smashing a window, leaps for life to the street below and makes his escape.

"Ten years later" we next meet Joe outside the sheriff's office in another border town, known as Border City. The sheriff has issued a notice to the gamblers and sure-thing men of his district to clear out. Joe takes exception to the invitation and his ready gun again comes into play. Then follows an exciting ride for the river and safety, for under the peculiar laws then existing between the United States and Mexico, our officers were not allowed to follow a culprit across the Rio Grande without certain legal formalities, which usually consumed time enough to allow a guilty man plenty of leisure to get out of the law's reach. We next see Joe ride up to a ranch on the Mexican side, and by a strange turn of Fate's wheel, he comes face to face with Monte Pete, the man he had marked for life in the brawl ten years before. Monte has wedded Papinta, but her heart is still tender for the handsome Americano, and Joe's good looks stand him in good stead, for Monte Pete has him in his power and condemns him to endure the Aqua Morte, or Water Death. Our closing scenes show clearly how Joe plays upon Papinta's regard to help him out of Monte's clutches. Joe realizes that it would be folly to leave the girl behind, so induces her to cast her lot with his. A thrilling dash for freedom closes this exciting story.

IN WRONG SIMMS.—You all know Simms, or at least you number among your acquaintances his prototype. Simms means well; he is always willing to help anything or anybody; but Fate, the jade, is forever getting him in wrong; his well-meant efforts forever go awry and trouble forever camps on poor Simms' trail. If he intends to caress his wife while reading a clever paragraph in the morning paper, and forgets to look up and locate that venerable lady, he is sure to find himself patting the servant girl's rosy cheek, and just so sure is his wife to also see this action and fail to realize poor Simms' original intentions. If he gives a boy a dollar (and his only convenient one) to change in payment for his paper, he is sure to have his attention attracted to the scare heads, and when he looks up the boy has gone home for the change and Simms goes to business broke.

ON THE LITTLE BIG HORN; or, Custer's Last Stand.—The order of disarmament, issued in the Winter of 1874, and the arrest of "Rain in the Face" by young Tom Custer, is shown in our first three scenes. Then, "two years later," we witness the arrival of General Custer at Post Fort Lincoln. An order superseding him in command of the expedition is received. Then follows a scene where the officers beg him not to trust "Reno" with an important command, as it was known in the army that had blood existed between these two officers. A bit of unwritten history is here introduced. The Commander of the Post, Col. Godfrey, had a pretty daughter, Dollie, who was in love with Lieut. Glenn, one of Custer's subalterns, and she, not relishing being separated from her sweetheart, inadvertently learned that there was to be an officer sent back to bring forward a supply train as soon as the General located the Indians. She makes a written request asking the General to send back Lieut. Glenn. The love interest hearing upon the lives of these two young people is, we hope, not intrusively blended into and made a part of the present historical subject. We then see General Custer and his officers watching the hostiles through their field glasses. Custer decides to attack. Reno is given command of the supporting column, in spite of the protests of the assembled officers. The General thinks of little Dollie Godfrey's letter, reads it, grants the request it contains by ordering young Lieut. Glenn back to the fort. Next we see the wily "Rain in the Face" and his band of naked, painted devils leading Custer's cavalry into a trap; riding up just out of gun shot, they tantalize Custer into making a charge. The "Gallant Command" answer the order with a yell and are off after the fleeing band of savages. A sudden dip in the prairie and the Indians disappear, then up a rise of ground perhaps thirty feet in height; then come the soldiers, every man urging his horse to his utmost in order to gain on the yelling red fiends in front—over the bluff they go, and the sight that meets their gaze freezes the blood, for stretched away as far as the eye can reach, upright and naked on their ponies they sit, three thousand Sioux warriors, waiting for the handful of white soldiers to be brought to the slaughter. Too late, Custer sees his error; nothing daunted, he gives the order, column half left, about face, retreat, steady, men, ride for your lives to higher ground; then two miles away Reno's officers hear the volley that greets Custer from that bronze line, and beg him, Reno, to go to Custer's assistance.

Then we see "The Last Stand"; horses sent to the rear to be later stampeded, thus leaving no escape for the brave little band, now reduced to forty-one men; the red circle of death closes in about them and "Rain in the Face" is avenged.

Two days later the news reaches Fort Lincoln. On the same day a young officer, dust covered, his uniform in shreds, rides into the Fort and delivers Custer's last message, sent a few hours before the massacre. Glenn had fallen into the hands of a roving band of Sioux, but makes his escape and reaches the Fort, to learn for the first time the fate of his comrades on the Little Big Horn.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

THE ROBBER DUKE.—Drama of the days of the "good King," Henry IV. of France. In this pictorial romance the costumes and scenery of the period have been carefully studied and reproduced, and the historical characters are accurately represented.

The fact of the audacious behavior of the Duke of Merigny towards his tenants and vassals is brought to the "good King," who takes immediate measures to repress the outrages. Oliver of Serres is commanded t assure the peasants of royal protection, but the Duke continues his oppressions in spite of the King's decree. Rebellion ensues, and the leaders are imprisoned by the Duke. Thereupon the King himself journeys to the castle and, in a scene of great charm, grants to the peasants their rights, and coldly dismisses the ducal oppressor. In the final episode the good King provides a hearty meal for the peasants, and endears himself by nursing for a moment some of the child victims of the Duke.

A HEAVY GALE AT BIARRITZ.—A perfect scenic series. Close views taken during the severe weather which recently prevailed on the southwest coast of France. Sublime effects of the mountainous waves as they dash with vain fury against the rocks and sea wall.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

LAUNCELOT AND ELAINE.—No poet is more popular than Tennyson and of his poems none more fully deserves appreciation than the charming tale of Launcelot, the doughty knight of King Arthur's round table and Elaine—"the Lily Maid of Astolot." Carefully preserving the artistic atmosphere of the poem, the Vitagraph producers have realized in picture the graceful story of the flowing rhyme with an appreciation of the charming story that makes this one of the most notable of the Vitagraph presentations. So plainly told is the story that familiarity with the poem is nonessential, a few captions and the letter of Elaine being the only needful aids to complete understanding. The scene opens as King Arthur declares the ninth of the tournaments, the prize of which is the last of nine diamonds. Queen Guinevere declares that illness will prevent her attendance and promptly Launcelot declares that he will not enter the lists, supposing that the Queen's indisposition is but the excuse for their meeting. His declaration is received with surprise, for he has won the other tournaments and wields the mightiest lance. The Queen quickly undeceives the sharer of her guilty love and bids him go to the tournament and win. Launcelot rides forth, attended only by his 'squire, and, coming to the castle of Astolot, demands of its lord a plain shield that his identity may be hidden. He is made welcome and given the shield of Sir Torre, whose shield is yet blank, for he was defeated by Launcelot at the last tournament and may not blazon his arms upon his shield until he has achieved a victory. Launcelot leaves his own shield, bearing his device, in the care of the lovely Elaine, who urges him to wear her broidered sleeve upon his helmet when he rides against the others in the lists. Though he never before has worn a lady's gage, he accepts the favor and rides forth, little thinking of the damage he is doing. At Camelot he again defeats all other knights, but in the last encounter he is himself sorely wounded and is carried off the field by the faithful Sir Lavaine. A dagger has been thrust beneath his shoulder and its removal is followed by so copious a flow of blood that Lavaine hurries him to a hermit's cave, where he is cared for. King Arthur has sent Sir Gawain in search of the stranger knight, whose prowess has roused comment, and it is Gawain who first brings to Astolot the news of Launcelot's victory and wound. Elaine goes to the hermit's cave, where she nurses him back to health, but Launcelot loves only the Queen, and at last he rides away without a farewell. He meant it in all kindness, but he has broken the tender heart of the gentle maid, and on the bed of death she writes him a farewell and "the dead, steered by the dumb," goes to Arthur's Court to bear the last adieu. Sadly the Queen places flowers upon the bier and Launcelot, oppressed by grief, keeps knightly vigil beside the fragile form, finding there the repentance that in time purged his soul from the crime of illicit love.

BENEDICT ARNOLD.—One of the most absorbing historical subjects ever presented by the Vitagraph and one worthy of place beside the notable "Washington" releases which made talk the country over and which enjoyed unusual favor in France and Italy. Arnold, reproved by General Washington, decides, with the bitter hatred of a small nature, to betray West Point into the hands of the British and to that end enters into negotiation with Major Andre, as the representative of the British General. In a secluded spot along the Hudson Arnold waits for Andre, who presently is seen to arrive from the opposite shore. He hurries into the woods to the waiting traitor and with his aversion to his mission none too well concealed, bargains for the plans, promising the money and position in the British army that are to be the price of Arnold's treachery. He starts to ride southward and by misehance he encounters an outpost of patriots. Provided with the pass which Arnold gave him, Andre does not fear the encounter and dismounts willingly enough, but the decision to search him in spite of the pass he carries puts another complexion upon the matter. Skilfully the Continentals search his clothing and come upon the incriminating papers and Andre is hustled off to prison. Arnold receives warning of the discovery and flees from the danger, leaving his wife and child behind. Andre, whose good humor and resignation to his fate have won the admiration of his jailers, is led out to be hanged, his request that he be permitted to die like a soldier facing the guns of a firing squad having been denied. Even his jailer is moved to tears as he bravely marches forth to an ignominious death and draws the curtains of the window that the last sad scene may not be witnessed. As a fitting climax there is shown Arnold's miserable death in a London garret, sick, penniless and despised by all, going forth to meet his Maker, unattended save by his own guilty fears and the vision of the flag to which he had been faithless

INDIAN BASKET MAKING.—Properly classed as an industrial film, this is something more, for it possesses unquestioned value as a scenic release, the scenes having been made in one of the most picturesque corners of Maine, where the Pasamaquoddy Indians still inhabit a portion of the land once owned by their aboriginal ancestors. Their basketry is vastly different from that of the reser-

THE OPEN GATE

A Beautiful Motion Picture Pastoral

The story told in this Biograph subject is one that is bound to touch the hearts of all. It beautifully depicts the extreme adherence to duty by the true woman. Though the sacrifice blighted her life, she bore up under its chafing burden for years, when her reward comes. On the day that George and Hetty plight their troth, Hetty's oldest sister dies, and as she had cared for Hetty in her childhood she requests that Hetty care for her child, Mary. Her duty to her sister's child causes her to break the engagement, and George, in a huff, dashes through the gate never to return. The gate ever remains open. Mary grows to young womanhood and is betrothed to Jack, the nephew of George. They quarrel, and the ring is returned. Hetty begs Mary to be reasonable and go after him, which she does. Meanwhile, George, tired of wandering, returns and meets Jack. He hears his story, and consents to be the peacemaker, not knowing who the girl is, taking the boy's ring to settle it. Imagine his surprise when he arrives at the still open gate and meets Hetty. He now forgets his mission for his own affairs, and when the young people come up they find that George has used the ring to bind his own bargain. Two weddings take place instead of one, and the gate is closed. Length, 988 feet.

THE MOUNTAINEER'S HONOR

A Story of the Kentucky Hills

In the hills of old Kentucky death was always preferable to dishonor, and once there occurred a blot on the family's good name, it was never effaced. This Biograph story has to do with a family consisting of mother, father, a son and a harum-scarum daughter. The daughter is loved by a young idealist of the mountains, but she loses her frivolous heart on a dashing young chap from the Valley, only to be cruelly deserted by him, when he grows tired of her. The brother follows him and demands he right the wrong. He refuses and pays with his life. The Vigilance party pursue the boy back to his own home, where his old mother is given to understand that he will hang. Hanged! What a smirch on the family honor. Cunningly she contrives to cheat the gibbet with a gun concealed beneath her apron. Their work anticipated, the party leave. The idealist takes the poor girl, charitably blaming the Valley man for her indiscretions. The scenic beauty of the subject places it among the best dramatic films ever produced. Length, 977 feet.

vation Indians of the West and Southwest, as all visitors to Bar Harbor know, and these examples of basket making cover all specimens from the tiny work basket to the bushel measure.

THE SINS OF THE FATHERS.—A vitally interesting story of the Tennessee feudists, told with a verve and dash that carry the spectator irresistibly along to an unexpected and happy finish. It is not to one of the very wildest parts of the turbulent mountain country that Dave Warrenton returns when he has finished his college course. The very fact that he is a college-bred man argues greater refinement than in the Breathitt County district, but the elemental passions run strong in hot-blooded veins and the veneer of culture peels off in the stress of great emotions. Dave obtains a position as teacher of the public school and his most unruly pupil is Jim Thurston, a hulking youth whose mind has not kept pace with his physical development. Dave is anxious to be friendly with Jim because of his love for Jim's sister, Audrey, but Jim is a bully and at last the teacher is compelled to order him to leave the room. Jim obeys, but outside the schoolhouse there is a sharp struggle and for the first time Jim learns that science counts for much in physical combat. He is worsted and, wild with rage, draws his knife. This Dave takes from him and Jim slinks away, vowing vengeance. Audrey remains behind after school hours and there is a dainty scene in which, by means of the blackboard exercises for the day, she bids the teacher hope to win her love. Jim, still seeking revenge, learns that Dave is the son of the man whose misfortune it was to blind the elder Thurston in a fight. The clansmen promise to come to his aid in carrying the feud to the second generation and Audrey is desperate. Dave comes to her house and is concealed in a closet when Jim unexpectedly appears on the scene. Her very eagerness to hide the man she loves causes Audrey to reveal his place of concealment and Jim forces her to leave the room. With drawn revolver Jim opens the door, but once again Dave is too quick for him. He disarms him and chokes him into insensibility. He makes his escape, but the feudists are on his track until sent in a wrong direction by quick-witted Audrey, who then points out to Dave a way to life and liberty. He turns and leaves with only a word of gratitude, but as he looks back and sees the girl huddled at the foot of the tree sobbing out her anguish, he knows that he will not have to go alone. Hurrying back he clasps her in his arms, and as the scene closes the prophecy of the blackboard has come true.

WHY THEY MARRIED.—Another delightful Vitagraph comedy in which originality of thought and sprightliness of action combine to produce the best effect. The first of our heroines married for money. Her suitor was elderly but affluent. She liked to ride in automobiles and dine at expensive restaurants. She despised her humble but happy home and she gladly permitted him to place upon her finger the ring that bound her life to his. A year later stock reverses wiped out his fortune in a day, and a heart made weak by dissipation and the excitement of the stock market could not stand the strain of the terrible day. His fortune gone, he sank back into his desk chair as the ticker made its last fateful announcement, and, widowed and impoverished in a day, the weeping wife realized that she had not chosen wisely. The second girl was tired of the monotony of her work in a milliner's and she threw up her place to marry a fascinating young fellow with a fondness for good horseflesh and good living. But a year later she is taking in washing, and the money she earns goes to the keeper of the poolroom, where the husband, now a dissolute loafer, almost invariably loses his dollar bets. The third matrimonial venture was the result of the feminine belief that marriage will reform a drunkard. The tipsy youth at a fashionable function is shunned by all save the woman who loves him and who lends willing ear to his promises of reformation, but within one year he has become a hopeless sot and their home the abode of misery none the less acute because of the evidences of wealth. The old maid married because she wanted a man; but the puny specimen she acquired was scarcely to be classed as such, yet, in a way, perhaps she was happy. The last girl couldn't tell just how it happened, but she had an idea that she was in love. When Jim found an extra five in his pay envelope, with the assurance that he would continue to find one every week, he sprinted to the factory where Polly worked and caught her just as she was leaving for the Saturday half holiday. The result was a ring and a kiss, and a year later there was a tiny Jim to make their happiness complete. Hers was the better choice, and the lesson is none the less a story with a moral because it is so well disguised with strong, tense tragedy, dainty comedy and just a touch of farce.

JEAN VALJEAN.—The fourth, and last, of the famous series de luxe derived from incidents from Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables." In this the story is followed from the love of Marius and Cosette to the death of Jean, which ends the volume. M. Marius, grandson of M. Gillenormand, sees Cosette. Jean Valjean's foster-daughter, now grown into a beautiful girl, in the Luxembourg, and falls madly in love with her. Valjean, apprised of the love affair, refuses to give his consent, and Marius induces Cosette to marry him without parental sanction. Meanwhile Thenardier, once the keeper of the inn of the Soldier of Waterloo at Montfermeil, but now reduced to dire straits in Paris, recognizes in a benevolent old man the visitor to the Inn who removed the child Cosette and who must be the escaped convict, Jean Valjean. Playing upon his sympathy, Thenardier induces Jean to visit his apartment, and Marius, who occupies the next room because a quarrel with his grandfather has reduced him to want, overhears a part of the plot and rescues Jean by warning the police. Jean makes his escape and next encounters Marius at the barricade, where he releases Javert, the human bloodhound, who, through a score of years, has remorselessly hunted Jean. Gavriche, the gamin, is there, eujoying the battle until his brave sortie to rifle the cartouche boxes of the dead soldiers brings to an end his gay life and finds for him a place beside his dead sister, Eponine, whose love for Marius has led her to assume a boy's dress and follow him to the barricade. Jean learns of Marius's relations with Cosette and when the regulars carry the barricade he makes his escape into the sewer with the unconscious man upon his back. In the sewer he encounters Thenardier, who permits him to escape from the locked gate by means of a false key, at the same time cutting from Marius's trousers a portion of one leg as a means of identification. Later Thenardier's attempt to blackmail Marius clears away the cloud of suspicion that has hovered over Jean in Marius's mind, and he and Cosette hurry to Jean, whom they find dying of starvation and heartbreak, but happy at the sight of Cosette once more. The story has been slightly altered to give greater dramatic value to the scenes and clarity to the narrative, and the result is a release in keeping with the earlier sections of the same story, though, like the others, this story is in itself an interesting tale apart from the earlier releases.

THE PARSON'S PRAYER.—Grace Darling, after bidding her father good-bye at the lighthouse, receives a note, which she supposes is from her sweetheart. It is, however, from a man she does not care for. When she goes to the place of meeting and Morgan tries to induce her to marry him, she is greatly disturbed. He sends one of his companions, a sailor, for a parson, who answers the call. After being appealed to by Grace, the clergyman refuses to perform the ceremony, much to Morgan's chagrin. The parson and Morgan then have a struggle, in which the former is the victor. He gives his long clerical coat, hat and prayer book to Grace, who leaves the place. The parson remains long enough to see Morgan resuscitate and give his blessing to the remorseful man.

DOOLEY'S THANKSGIVING TURKEY.—Thanksgiving implies good-cheer and generally a happy gathering. Dooley indulges in the former, and thereby gains the latter. He saunters into a saloon in time for a raffle and is the lucky one to win a turkey. His good fortune loosens his purse-strings and he generously imbibes, helped along by all who were less fortunate. When he finally starts for home, the turkey dragging along behind him, his companions follow after. Little by little, articles attach themselves to the turkey, until by the time he reaches his home he has in his train, boxes, tin cans, dogs and numerous other things. His wife resents his home-coming and severely punishes him, to the amusement of his followers.

PRESSING BUSINESS.—Willie Gether, a bashful youth, is to share in his uncle's estate, provided he is acceptable to and marries his uncle's niece, Alice Waite, otherwise the estate will revert to charitable institutions.

Willie has neglected to comply with the provisions of his uncle's will, his bashfulness keeping him away from the girl his uncle wishes him to marry.

He finally receives a peremptory notice from his uncle's lawyer to the effect that a final decision must be reached at not later than 12 o'clock noon of that day.

Upon receipt of this summons, Willie starts out, but has an encounter with a butcher washing down his sidewalk.

Willie's trousers are in a deplorable condition, and at the suggestion of his friend he visits a tailor who presses pants while you wait.

Willie doffs his trousers behind a screen, and while in that condition two of his girl friends come into the tailor's to have a skirt cleaned.

In his eagerness to hide himself, Willie backs into the tailor's stove, with disastrous results. Willie burns himself, knocks down the stovepipe and flees. His one idea is to keep the appointment, and in his efforts to find some suitable substitute for his trousers, he meets with many laughable misadventures.

He jumps into a passing auto and is thrown out; gets into a barrel, but it falls apart with the assistance of a baseball bat handled by a tough girl; takes a skirt from a washline, but the washlady interferes; pulls down an American flag hanging in front of a recruiting office, but is prevented by a G. A. R. veteran; enters a house and secures a pair of boys' trousers, pursued by the mob he collected, and escapes by way of the fire escape. He finally reaches the lawyer's home and tries to conceal his condition from the lawyer, Alice and her aunt, but without avail.

Explaining his predicament, Alice sympathizes and shows that it is the man she wants and not the trousers, so "All's Well That Ends Well."

THE COST OF FORGETFULNESS.—We all know too well what trouble one can get into for forgetting. In this little comedy is pictured the experiences of an office boy who was sent to get his boss's eyeglasses. The boy saunters to the home of his employer and knocks at the door, which is answered by the young lady of the house. The two stand and look at each other speechless. They are in love at first sight. She finally invites the youth into the house, and promptly serves him with father's cigars and wine. The glasses are forgotten, and the two sit and admire each other. The father, at his office, sits looking at his watch and chewing the end of an unlighted cigar, saying over and over again: "Why don't that d—— kid come with my glasses?" He can stand the strain no longer and dashes out of the office like a madman, to see what is keeping the brat so long. The loving pair are enjoying themselves, when the father dashes into the room to see the young knight proposing to the little Miss. Their dream of joy is ended as the indignant father leads the crestfallen boy out of the house by the ear.

AN HOUR OF TERROR.—A Union officer bids his wife and little daughter a fond good-bye, and rides away to rejoin his army. A Confederate captain comes to the house, mad with drink, forces his way into the home, demands whiskey, and makes free with the frightened wife and child. While the intruder is busily engaged in drinking, the wife sends the old colored servant to bring back her husband. The servant soon overtakes the husband, who turns back and rides to the rescue as fast as horseflesh can carry him, closely followed by the old servant. This mad ride of husband and servant is through the most beautiful scenery ever photographed in moving pictures, having in one scene a real forest fire for a background. The Union officer rides up to his home, dismounts, and rushes into the house just in time to stop the Confederate from harming his dear ones. They engage in a terrible combat with swords, but the husband is too much for him and the drunken man is soon overcome. The servant enters at this minute and happily marches the wretch out of the house at the point of his master's gun.

As the Operator Looks at it

As the Operator Looks at It

Just notice how easy this operator takes it. He doesn't have to work over a dangerous juice consuming rheostat at furnace heat anymore since the was installed.

He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely

Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it.

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2-3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

Gracious! Gracious!

My exposure of the rotten secret regarding what some of the licensed exchanges are doing to the exhibitors stirred up an awful mess last week. Some of the licensed exchange men said it was unsportsmanlike; others called it uglier names, but none of them had quite enough nerve to deny it. I told you a long time ago that I intend to keep things ripped wide open in this film business and put the exhibitors exactly wise to everything that is going on. Exhibitors who are using trust films are justly sore to learn of the "ten per cent penalty" exacted by licensed exchanges whenever an exhibitor gets tired of one exchange and wants to switch his patronage to another. I tell you, Mr. Man, you can not only avoid all this nonsense by coming into the Independent fold, but you can also get a film service that will amaze and delight you. Don't judge Independent goods by the stuff that has been sent to you by wildcat exchanges and fakers and dupers. Come to me and get the real thing. A whole lot of the latest subjects are good enough to charge double your extra price of admission—and dozens of my customers are doing that very thing.

Advance Film Descriptions

Week of November 21st to 27th 1909

Nov. 23rd "Belle of the Harvest" (Urban-Eclipse). Drama. 511 feet. Beautiful rural scenes and cleverly enacted story of a peasant couple, who, through their individual failings, almost wreck their peaceful and hitherto happy home. Love and marital duty are exquisitely interwoven in this splendid film.

Nov. 23rd "Marriage of Love" (Urban-Ecipse). Drama. 452 feet. The title of this beautiful film tells the story in three words and every audience enjoys seeing such subjects. It is a strong and touchingly pathetic story superbly photographed.

Nov. 24th "A Heart's Devotion" (Gaumont). Tragedy. 842 feet. A strong modern story of unrequited love. Two sisters love the same man. One develops consumption and the other makes arrangements to get married secretly without her dying sister's knowledge. The consumptive accidentally meets the wedding party and dies tragically upbraiding her sister. This is a subject of intense interest and pathos.

Nov. 24th "Tulips" (Gaumont). Educational. 105 feet. A perfect floral art study in exquisite natural colors, showing the budding, blooming and eventual shattering of a beautiful bunch of tulips. This will delight the ladies and children.

Nov. 27th "The Village Scare" (Gaumont). Comedy. 381 feet. An awful animal alarms an entire town and afterwards causes them great amusement. Here is a motion picture which will convulse your patrons. Be sure you get it.

Nov. 27th "Mix-Up at Court" (Gaumont). Farce Drama. 590 feet. A beautiful colored film depicting a most amusing series of events in the court of a merry monarch. A wandering musician who exactly resembles a powerful nobleman poses as the courtier and succeeds in convincing the king that he and not the real baron is entitled to royal recognition. A film full of fun and entertainment.

Seven is always a lucky number, and the seventh release of "IMP" films is no exception. It is entitled:

"HIS LAST GAME"

It's a drama that will appeal to the most calloused moving picture heart, mighty well enacted and a big improvement in photography. Bill Going, a Choctaw Indian, is scheduled to pitch in a baseball game against the Jimtown team. Gamblers try to bribe him to throw the game. A scrap results and one of the gamblers is killed. The Indian pitcher is arrested, but released long enough to pitch his team to victory. And then—well then comes the climax that will lift you right out of your seat. Watch for it. It's the kind of stuff you want. I KNOW because it's the kind I've wanted myself for lo, these many moons. Drop your film exchange a postal card for "His Last Game." It will be

Released Monday, Dec. 6

A Grand Biblical Representation of

THE LIFE OF MOSES

ARRANGED SPECIALLY FOR THE VITAGRAPH COMPANY OF AMERICA BY THE REV. MADISON C. PETERS, D.D.

With due appreciation of the demand for more subjects of an uplifting and educational character, the Vitagraph Company present the first of a series of Biblical pictures of the life of Moses. This great work has been carried on for months under the able supervision of the Rev. Madison C. Peters, who is well known for his writings and travels. No expense has been spared to make this series not only Biblical in character but interesting and instructive to the onlooker. Staged under the direction of one who has traveled in the Holy Land and Egypt, and who has been given free hand to make the series perfect in detail, this series of pictures of the life of Moses should be of lasting value.

Release Reform Wanted.

This week at one of the principal New York moving picture theaters we saw a licensed film originally released a month ago, and that therefore had lived a third of its allotted span under the system adopted by the licensed manufacturers of calling in their releases within three months of their production. The grounds upon which this picture was seen a second time are simple. It was so good a picture that the public wanted to see it again, and so the manufacturers were instrumental in obtaining its re-exhibition. And it was well that the picture was shown again, because it was given a most enthusiastic reception by the audience who witnessed it, as we did, on Monday last.

This incident, if not typical, is at least symptomatic of what is taking place with licensed films at licensed theaters Many of the pictures are so good—they hit the taste of the public in such a marked manner—that they bear repetition. It is inconceivable that a highly successful feature film can exhaust its public in a day, a week, or even a month. The same rule, of course, applies to the film as applies to the play or any other form of amusement. The public for it is a large one, and public interest in it may not be exhausted for weeks or even months.

This fact was probably lost sight of, or not taken account of, by the associated manufacturers, when formulating their plan of campaign in December of last year. No provision was made for exceptional circumstances that were certain to arise; we mean such circumstances as those we have indicated, namely, where a strikingly good picture is produced, its fame spreads, and hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people are desirous of seeing it and yet are debarred from doing so because they have no chance of doing so. Your first run house shows a day's program; the next day it has an entirely different program, and so on for each day of the week. The film filters through second, third and fourth run houses; but in neither the first nor the fourth does it exhaust its public. It is shown once and it can only be seen on that day and therefore only by a limited number of the public.

It seems to us that some reform in this matter is called for in the interests of manufacturers themselves. Indeed, we may say that several of them have said as much to us. They feel that their feature films are not securing a public appreciation, or, in other words, the public advertisement that they deserve. They secure only a transitory popularity, whereas, by being repeatedly shown, the best work of the manufacturers becomes better known and consequently the credit of the producers rises in the same ratio. Probably the manufacturers themselves can hit on some plan whereby the present system of releases is modified in such a manner as to meet this point. This much we may assure them: The public at large suffers and does not see the best pictures that are produced to the extent desirable, consequently something must be done to remove what is evidently a defect of the present system. In some of the theaters, pugilistic subjects run for several weeks. Why, then, should not a first-class Biograph, Pathe or Edison have the same chance of securing the suffrages of the public to the point of exhaustion? We shall probably recur to this matter, as we think it of cardinal importance to the interests of manufacturers, renters, exhibitors, and the public.

Pictures and Politics.

No more innocent, innocuous production of science than a simple moving picture in the concrete form could possibly be imagined. By the concrete form, we mean the little photograph about one inch wide, three-quarters of an inch deep, with four perforations on each side of it. This is the unit of a vast world of conflicting and inimical interests, just as in the world of chemistry you have a unit in the shape of the atom or molecule upon which the superstructure of chemical science is built.

But just consider what a maze of trouble and strife this little photographic positive on celluloid gives rise to, is giving rise to this moment, and has given rise to in the past year or two. Groups of manufacturers, groups of exchanges, groups of exhibitors are in conflict over this little picture. Vast sums of money are sunk in its exploitation, vast sums of money are being made out of it; millions of people look at the little picture every day and every night, not merely in the United States of America, but throughout the world.

"What great events from little causes spring!" And the unit of the moving picture is a little cause, is it not?—one inch across and three-quarters of an inch deep. Yet small as it is it seems to arouse passions of the deepest nature and exert the most far-reaching influences. In the United States it has split the trade into Trust and Independent. The business methods of marketing this little picture have in a few months been transformed almost beyond recognition. Hundreds of thousands of people are directly or indirectly engaged in its manufacture and distribution. Business people quarrel over it, friendships are broken through it, friendships are formed through it. The stupid Mayor of New York suddenly closes three or four hundred houses in which the picture is being shown. Stupid clergymen denounce the little picture from the pulpit; stupid writers in the newspapers misrepresent its effect and mission. And it is such a little picture, one inch across, three-quarters inch deep. Again we say, What great events from little causes spring!

The entire moving picture field of the United States has been in a ferment over this little picture for years past, and peace and unity seem as if they would never again re-enter the moving picture field. It is brother against brother, business man against business man, Trust versus Independent; strife, disunion, disagreement all the time.

Even our own pages reflect the enormous influence which this little picture is wielding in the world to-day. These pages reflect quite faithfully, we believe, the politics of the moving picture. Taking only the last eleven months, the number of articles we have written on the politics of the moving picture would fill a respectably sized volume. They are about as numerous as would be called for by a New York Mayoralty election or a Presidential campaign. Frankly, we would like to see the political influence of this little picture laid to rest once and for all, so that our pages were entirely devoted to the popularization of the picture, a discussion of the methods for its improvement, for promoting the business end of matters, and generally for helping to make manufacturers, renters, exhibitors prosperous, and the public satisfied with the picture.

But the political influence of this little picture, one inch across and three-quarters of an inch deep, is not, we fear, destined to be so readily interred and forgotten as we would like it to be. Like the poor, we expect they will be always with us. And as they ARE here, we thought the reader might like us to devote at least one short editorial to a recognition of their presence. It is indeed strange that so much of politics should cluster round the little moving picture.

Regulating the Speed of Pictures.

We have recently had occasion to subject a number of operators applying for positions to a little probationary observation. Good money and good positions have been offered them and yet it is surprising how few of them seem to be able to buckle to their work and give satisfaction without considerable supervision. We should take up too much space on this occasion in dilating at length on the idiosyncrasies of these men—we will, however, bear the subject in mind for future treatment. Meanwhile, we may say that it is more than ever borne in upon us that the operator is like the poet, born, not made—in other words intuition or rather natural aptitude seems to count for more than application.

There is one little point in particular that we want to emphasize just now and that is the so frequent lack of sympathy between the operator and his subject. In other words, he seldom takes the trouble to understand the timing of the picture. The result is, as we have witnessed with our own eyes, that the movement in the film is totally disregarded by the man at the crank, with distressing results to the audience. For example, we recently witnessed a military procession being shown at such a speed or rather want of speed that the soldiers seemed to be engaged in a slow race, instead of marching at a regular military rate. By the way, we wonder if any of our readers of an athletic turn of mind know what a slow race is? We do, for we have taken part in one. The particular slow race in which we engaged was a bicycle race. You got on your bike and the object in view was to be the last man home. Of course the contestants have the greatest difficulty in keeping their bicycles upright and just moving. And that was the fun of it all.

Operators not only sin at the slow end of matters, but also at the other extreme. Cases have been evident recently where the acting in pieces has been spoilt by the too rapid movement of the film. It is just as absurd in a tragic situation to see the figures move too quickly as in a comedy crisis to see them move too slowly. Yet these, we regret to say, are common faults of the thoughtless operator.

It should be the aim of the operator to understand his subject so as to be able to differentiate the speed of the picture when necessary. Of course this requires some degree of intelligence and it is unfortunate that so few operators seem to possess it. Nevertheless, we feel confident that by drawing attention to this matter thousands of operators throughout the country who read THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD will give it such attention in future that we shall not hear of any more complaints of the erratic running of films.

The Alliance.

Last week's meeting of the Alliance in New York City was notable for two reasons: the length of the session, which began on a Thursday and did not finally terminate until the following Monday morning, and the very large number of Independent manufacturers who had gathered together to confer with the Executive Committee on matters of interest affecting the Independent situation. The outlined report which we print in this week's number of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD shows that a great deal of useful business was done. Unquestionably a further step has been made in perfecting an Independent organization. Three weeks ago we complimented the Executive Committee, which met in Chicago, on the businesslike way in which they seemed to be going about the work. And now as the result of the New York meeting we desire further to encourage the businesslike spirit which clearly animates Independent deliberations. Moreover, on the former occasion we ventured to point out that there seemed to be little or no harmony amongst the manufacturing interest. The result of last week's meeting, however, demonstrates that there is a possibility of union, if not harmony. We also think that this spirit is one deserving of encouragement on the part of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, which, as we have pointed out during the past year, is not a factional publication, but exists for the advancement and support of the industry as a whole.

Although the information given in the N. I. M. P. A. report is not of a very momentous nature, yet it seems to show that the Independent manufacturers are in process of organizing on lines very much resembling those of the Associated manufacturers. They are talking about regulating their release days and the like. They are including desirables and excluding undesirables: they are working with their exchanges, etc. All this points towards the completion of a scheme which, if carried out, should exalt the Independent side of the moving picture business.

Unquestionably a better spirit seems to permeate the Independent side than was the case earlier in the year and even so recently as when the Alliance was formed. Some of our friends in the Alliance took exception to the severity of our strictures on the personnel of some sections of that body: on their peculiar business principles or lack of them; upon, in short, their absolute unfitness to belong to any reputable business organization. But that we were justified in those strictures is made apparent by the fact that the Alliance, as it progresses, is casting off the undesirable elements that were around it at its start, and that, to speak plainly, were a disgrace to the American film business in general, to the Associated side for a time and then to the Independent side for a while.

The fact of the matter is that if the N. I. M. P. A. is to be a ponderable factor in the American film game it must not be above borrowing a few hints from 80 Fifth avenue and completing the work of its organization along fixed, definite business lines. This, it appears, is being done. We hope we have heard the last of the absurd rubbish circulated by ignorant busybodies and prejudiced newspaper scribblers in the theatrical field that THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is opposed to the Alliance. Nothing of the sort. We are only opposed to the inclusion in the business of people who are a disgrace to the business and with whom we hope the Alliance will hold no intercourse in the future. As we have said over and over again, the Independent side shall always have our support and advocacy, if, in our opinion, its policy makes for the betterment of the business as a whole. And as the Alliance seems, by the result of its last week's meeting, to have a distinct tendency that way, THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD wishes it all success in its work.

Some Poor Posters.

BY HANS LEIGH.

There are great possibilities in posters. There are also a great many posters in which these possibilities are not realized.

The self-evident purpose of a motion picture poster is to tell the public what the film is about, and naturally enough it should draw the attention of the public to the most striking incident of the play. But this is exactly what most of the posters utterly fail to do.

A few days ago I received a consignment of about twenty posters purporting to illustrate the most recent films on the market. In nearly every case a man and a girl were looking at each other, but neither was doing anything in particular. At this moment I have five or six of them before me, and here are some of the thrilling spectacles they present:

A man looking over a girl's shoulder.

A girl looking at a man.

A man holding a girl's hand.

A man looking at a girl.

A girl giving a drink to a man.

An old man and a girl looking at each other with two plowhorses near by.

Now, wouldn't it be just as easy, and just as cheap, to make these people doing something that would make a passerby want to pay a nickel to see?

Do the manufacturers of posters imagine that a great and intelligent public can be lured into the nickelodeons by the spectacle of a young couple giving each other pleasant looks? or even drinks of water and picture post cards? If so, they should feel the public pulse a little more carefully.

The fact is the public want to see "doings," and there must be doings in the posters, and not subtle suggestions of a "tiff" with Johnny.

The most heartrending case of "fall down" on the part of artist and manufacturer is that of the poster for Kalem's great production, "The Girl Scout." Think of the possibilities of this play! I will suggest a few of the things that "might have been" done. The Kaffir servant, Schrake, holding up a hat which the girl scout shoots out of his hand. The Boer captain attacked by Schrake, the Kaffir, as he is about to lash the girl scout. Young Voorhaut in a death struggle with Sergt. Cameron, and Neltze with rifle raised about to shoot the Canadian. Voorhaut "holding up" Sergt. Cameron and the latter throwing himself from his saddle. The battle scene, smoke, fire, and fierce combat. The Boer gun in the foreground and Cameron seizing the breach block with one hand while he fells a Boer with the other. The train of Boer prisoners, the proclamation of peace, and the girl scout rushing into Cameron's arms. Of course, the battle scene would have made the best picture, and it would have been quite within the proprieties to make the girl scout a part of this picture.

But now, with all these possibilities, what did the artist produce? Why, just a man looking at a girl!

To be sure the man wears a bushy beard, but he looks much more like "Uncle Reuben down to Podunk" than he does like a Boer.

In the background is another figure which would pass very well for Uncle Reuben's grandson, Zeke Tomkins. As for Neltze, the girl scout, she wears a white shirt-waist exactly like Liz, the Sewing-machine Girl. You can see a thousand of her any fine Summer evening over on Avenue A.

And are they doing anything? Not much.

There is an "expression" on Neltze's face which suggests that Uncle Reub. is telling her that "the price of aigs is daown." But for that matter it might mean anything except the expression which should have been on Neltze's face at the moment in question. In a word, there is nothing to suggest the nature of the play except that the shirt-waisted scout carries a gun—carries it just about as she would a broom—and the gun is not too easy to see.

Why are the lithographers turning out stuff like this and charging three prices to the exhibitors for the same? Is it because they intend to alter the title and use the "stone" again some other year? Surely it is not because they know no better. That can't be.

INJUNCTION GRANTED.

United States Circuit Court Sustains Edison Patent 12192 in the Suit Against the Viascope Company of Chicago.

On November 17, 1909, Judge Kolhsaat, sitting at Chicago, in the United States Circuit for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, granted an injunction order against the Viascope Manufacturing Company to restrain them from the further infringement of the Jenkins-Armat patent, owned by the Motion Picture Patents Company.

As a result of this injunction, the Viascope Manufacturing Company will be restrained from the further manufacture of projecting machines which infringe this patent, and inasmuch as no present day exhibitor would use a machine which does not embody the features covered by this patent, it is difficult to see how the Viascope Company can continue to manufacture projecting machines of any kind. Of course, exhibitors using Viascope machines, which are now held to be infringing ones under Judge Kolhsaat's decision, are liable to similar action on the part of the Patents Company to restrain the further use of such machines and for damages for their use.

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION AGAINST NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE COMPANY DENIED.

The motion for the preliminary injunction by the Motion Picture Patents Company against the New York Motion Picture Company has been denied.

From the reading of the decision, it is evident that more substantial proof than was brought in this case must be had before an injunction of this kind might issue. In the particular case at bar, Judge Chatfield said that although a statement was made by the Motion Picture Patents Company that unless an injunction issued they would suffer irreparable injury, he did not consider that the irreparable injury referred to might be as great as to other companies if they were compelled to bring their instruments into court and divulge the secrets of their business.

This is the first victory for the Independent cause, and will be, in all probability, a standard in all of the decisions to be rendered hereafter wherein the Motion Picture Patents Company are seeking to compel Independent manufacturers to bring their instruments into court, showing what devices they use in taking moving pictures.

Practical Talks to Operators.

I.—THE PROJECTOR, ITS USE AND TREATMENT.

By Arthur S. Newman, in "The Bioscope."

When moving pictures first became recognized as a form of entertainment, a deal of mystery surrounded the machinery with which they were produced. Projectors were carefully guarded from view, so that no lay man should know the means employed, and the operators of the diverse styles of apparatus were careful that no competitor should find out the special form of appliance in use. Projectors were carefully packed and locked up, or even taken home after each performance. They were kept clean and guarded from injury, and the secrets or supposed secrets of their mechanisms and the names of their makers carefully preserved. Later, the number of operators and of the machines became so great that the mysterious side of the question gradually faded away, and the operators, instead of taking special pride in their apparatus, began to look around in order to find a practical machine not liable to derangement, and one that could be quickly set up for work and as quickly packed up after the show was finished. The position of the operator became a less lucrative one, the machines were more easily worked and kept in order, and as less special knowledge and care were needed, familiarity produced its usual offspring, contempt, and careless workers were not conspicuous by reason of their rarity. During the last year or two, the pendulum, having reached the end of its swing, has started on its return journey, and from day to day an improvement in the style of operators and operating is becoming increasingly evident. The public is becoming more critical, competition more keen, and to satisfy the public taste and keep in the front rank it is now not only necessary to provide good machinery and films, but also to place them in the hands of competent and painstaking operators.

Good apparatus, good films, good surroundings, may be provided, but unless the operator be also good the performance will, even if good at the start, soon degenerate into a second-rate one. It may be a matter of days or weeks, according to the interest taken in the machinery and its consequent treatment.

A projector, good in the first place, will, with reasonably careful usage, last a long time without showing much falling off in the excellence of its results, while if neglected the pictures it produces will soon become unsteady. Cleanliness of the gate will prevent wear of the films, and regular cleaning and oiling of the machine will allow the spindles and bearings to retain their good fitting qualities for a long time. A new machine seldom runs quite as well as one that has had a little use. The spindles and bearings, the teeth of the gear-wheels, and fittings of all kinds, are always somewhat harsh when leaving the workshop, compared with their condition after some running, and when the different parts by a small amount of wear have become properly "bedded" to one another. This harshness must not be ascribed to defects of manufacture, because even the finest productions of engineering science, for instance, the engines of an ocean steamer, are always expected to work more sweetly after a few trips have been made with them.

Much good may be done to a new projector by being careful to oil it thoroughly before each time of using, and by wiping all black or dirty oil away after the performance is over. This should be continued until the oil runs from the bearings almost clean, and when this is the case the machine will probably be in the best condition it will ever experience. All dirt and grit left from the manufacture will have been washed out, and the spindles and working parts will have worn off the minute irregularities which had been unavoidably left by the tools of the maker, and the fittings of all the parts will not have become loose by the grinding which would have taken place had not the dirty oil containing the fine particles of metal and grit been carefully wiped off. The gate, also, should have special attention when starting a new machine. Although beautifully smooth and polished, it is probable that the first few performances will reveal parts of the pressure surfaces which stand somewhat above their best position. Only the wearer can tell where the shoe pinches, and only the film can tell where the pressure is hardest. This is the position where dust, dirt, and the rubbings from the film will accumulate, and if allowed to, the film will suffer naturally; but beyond this, the gate of the machine will suffer also, because the accumulation will protect the high part and it will become still higher in proportion owing to the wear of the other unprotected parts. If with a new gate extra care in cleaning be taken, it will rapidly settle down and give little or no trouble, because the pressure surfaces will soon be as level and smooth as the film can make them. Many operators use a penny or other coin to scrape adherent matter from the gate. No doubt this is very convenient, because coins are easily at hand. A better tool for the purpose can be made by cutting a piece of hard sheet brass, about seven inches long, to the width of the gate, and carefully squaring and smoothing the end. If truly made, a single sweep of this along the gate will clean the surfaces, edges, and corners much more completely than can be done by 20 or 30 rubs with the edge of a coin, the round edge of which will not deal with the corners at all well. Vaseline is often used on the gate and springs after cleaning, and is very good if not too lavishly put on, but only a small quantity is needed. However small an amount is applied, it is advisable to lightly rub it off (or I should say try to rub it off—with a fairly clean rag—enough will still remain for the purpose required.

A PROJECTION MACHINE FOR THE HOME.

A Useful Premium for M. P. Theaters.

At this time of the year, women allow their husbands to smoke in the parlor, not that they really enjoy the odor of a cigar or of a pipe, but they want the tobacco coupons to enable them to buy Christmas gifts, without untying the purse strings. The wife gets her husband a safety razor free of charge and also brings an economical reform in the household, by having him shave himself.

As coupons of all descriptions are in great demand at this time of the year, The Philadelphia Projection Company, of 44 North Ninth street, Philadelphia, Pa., have engineered a plan by which many children may be made happy at the coming Christmas, and this free of cost to the parents, while the plan will work a real boon to the moving picture shows. Exhibitors may think that with a motion picture in the home, their customers will have no more use for the moving picture theaters and consequently save a harvest of nickels and dimes during the coming year. Well, Mr. Exhibitor, do not worry yourself, as the little motion picture machines will create a greater desire to see real moving pictures, and, as with the amateur photographer, the mothers will find that the cost of buying new films will amount to more than the money expended at the show places.

The Philadelphia Projection Company offers to sell you their little motion picture machine at the low price of $25. It is a well-made parlor machine, running the regular standard films. You buy one of those machines and you give for one week a coupon to each visitor and at the end of the week the machine is awarded to the lucky number. We are sure that the number of mothers, anxious of securing such a gift for the pet boy of the family, will increase your door receipts by at least one-quarter. If your receipts are only $300 per week, the little machine will increase them to $375, and deducting the $25 cost of the machine, you will still be $50 ahead of the game and have the satisfaction of knowing that you will make one boy happy on his Christmas day.

The Philadelphia Projection Company also offers a small Parlor Projector at the small cost of $4.50, which can be given away on one day's receipts. We examined those small machines and were surprised at their simplicity, yet perfect in every detail and answering all the purposes. We wish to state that a number of cheap toy motion picture machines are on the market; they are real toys in the proper sense of the word, work imperfectly for a few days, and their greatest drawback is that they are limited to very short films of smaller dimensions, while on the machine offered by the Philadelphia Projection Company you can use the standard films, the films that you see daily on the screen. We are pleased to give this notice, as we sincerely believe that more small machines used in the homes will develop a greater interest for real moving pictures.

The Neosho Slide Company, 100 South Wood street, Neosho, Mo., send us a neatly printed illustrated catalogue of their stock announcement slides. Without exception the designs are both clever and neat and at the price of three for a dollar should have a large sale. Exchanges and exhibitors should write for a copy of the catalogue.

The Brayton Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, who have earned a reputation for making clever, catchy slides for all purposes, have again put out a pair of Hat slides for which they are having a much larger demand than their famous "Just to Remind You There Are Others Behind You" which had a world-wide sale. This concern specializes on slides for announcement and advertising purposes, contests, etc. They make no song slides, devoting their entire time to special work.

THE NATIONAL INDEPENDENT MOVING PICTURE ALLIANCE.

On November 18, 19 and 20, the Executive Committee of the N. I. M. P. Alliance, together with the Independent manufacturers and importers, held a meeting in New York City.

The meeting was called to order November 18, at 2 P. M., at Hotel Imperial, New York City. The full Executive Committee was in attendance, as well as the following members: C. O. Bauman, New York Motion Picture Company; Thomas Cochran, Imp Company; J. E. Brulatour, Lumiere Company; F. W. Tracy, Exclusive Film Company; J. A. Whitman, Actophone Company; E. Thannhouser, Thannhouser Company; D. E. Horsley and A. G. Whyte, Horsley Manufacturing Company; P. W. Panzer, C. W. McChesney, Jno. Fenniman, J. C. Hutchison, E. W. Evans, Pantograph Corporation; H. Kolle, M. C. Travis, E. M. Menhalter, Travergraph Company; Theo. Brinkmeier, Brinkmeier Company; J. E. Moseheim, C. M. Freeman, A. Davis, I. Finkler, Film Import and Trading Company; Geo. F. Carson, Carson Company; I. W. Ullman, G. H. Abbott, Columbia Manuafcturing Company; W. H. Swanson, proxy, Chicago Film Exchange (Importing); W. H. Swanson, proxy, Phoenix Manufacturing Company; Pat Powers, Powers Company.

The treasurer reported that the film exchanges were very prompt in remitting their assessments of twenty-five cents per customer.

The main purpose of the meeting was the discussion of pending and expectant lawsuits; the engaging of more attorneys, and the increasing of assessments of manufacturers and importers. The assessment of $1 and $2 per reel as against the importers and American manufacturers was withdrawn. Other and better arrangements were made whereby each concern would not have to expose its volume of business.

It was agreed and voted upon that in future manufacturers and importers would make no effort to organize a separate organization, whether within the lines of the Alliance or otherwise.

The former Committee on Ways and Means of manufacturers and importers was increased from three to five.

Mr. Rubel, of the Phoenix Film Company, secretary of the Ways and Means Committee, having various personal matters to take care of, his resignation was accepted and Mr. Swanson appointed in his place. The Committee on Ways and Means now consists of: J. J. Murdock, chairman; J. E. Brulatour, treasurer; W. H. Swanson, secretary; Mr. Moomaw, of the World Film Manufacturing Company, and Mr. Charles Bauman, of the New York Motion Picture Company. It was found that an assessment of $1 per reel sold by importers and $2 per reel sold by American manufacturers was not entitled to be incorporated in the By-Laws, same having been passed at a subsequent Executive Committee meeting, at the Belmont Hotel, New York City. Hence they were withdrawn from the By-Laws. Mr. Meline, on his way from Portland, Ore., to attend the meeting, according to a telegram received by Secretary Swanson, was taken dangerously ill at Omaha, Neb., with ptomaine poisoning. A telegram of regrets was sent to the home office, expressing the sorrow of the Association.

All manufacturers who have entered as such under charter membership are required to put their first reels on the market not more than ninety days after the first day of November, and are given a period of sixty days after the expiration of this ninety days to explain why they should not be dropped from membership for failure to meet this requirement.

A vote of appreciation and congratulation was extended to Mr. P. A. Powers, of the Powers Company, on his having secured the exclusive control of the D'Art films, formerly handled by the Pathe Freres Company, Paris.

Manufacturers and importers who delay paying their dues do so under penalty of a 25 per cent. increase. Exchanges failing to pay their weekly assessments have a like penalty assessed.

The matter of regulating of release days and the difficulties of same were adapted so that each day's release will be equal. Any exchange member of the Alliance releasing a film before 7.30 A. M. of the authorized release day will be fined $100, the member to stand suspended until this fine is paid. The manufacturers and importers are to label each can with the proper release day of the contents.

The Alliance secretary was authorized to edit and distribute bulletins furnished by each manufacturer, thereby doing away with individual distribution.

Any Alliance exchange permitting the use of film by another exchange not a member, to pay a fine of $50 for each reel so furnished to non-members.

The Horsley Manufacturing Company were permitted to change their membership name from Horsley Manufacturing Company to Centaur Film Company, of Bayonne, N. J.

A vote of appreciation and thanks was extended to the chairman, secretary and members of the Executive Committee for the conscientious devotion of their time and energy to the best interests of the Alliance. Unanimously carried.

Any manufacturing member not complying with all rules and regulations as regards the 90-day period and 60 days grace additional, has his membership revert to the Executive Committee. All moneys paid being forfeited as dues.

The new members accepted include: Golden Gate Film Exchange; Pacific Life Motion Picture Company, accepted as a manufacturer; New Jersey Film Rental Company, 214 Sixth avenue, New York City; Eureka Film Exchange Company, P. D. Stratton, president, Everitt Building, Akron, Ohio. Rejected applications: R. Prieur, representing Lux European film, on account of the Constitution and By-Laws prohibiting the acceptance as members of European manufacturers, those who have previously held contracts to sell to members. The application of Frieda Klug was rejected for the same reason. Carragien, Independent Film Exchange, St. Louis, was rejected on account of initiation fees not accompanying application.

All importers and manufacturers were advised to adopt high-class posters for distribution to the exchange and exhibitors.

The secretary was instructed to make a missionary trip throughout the United States with a view to presenting the advantages of the Alliance to exchanges who are not already enrolled as members.

Certain trade papers have stated that there was dissension amongst the Alliance officers and that the president was expected or asked to resign. There is not a word of truth in this rumor. Mr. Murdock is in complete accord with the other members of the Executive Committee, and at no time during the sessions was there a hint to the contrary.

The only Alliance member who did not acquiesce with the whole proceedings was the Film Import and Trading Company, who declined to submit to the taxation of $20 on each imported release. This, they claimed, would place them in the position of benefactor to a number of American manufacturers, who, although the American releases were taxed $40, would be exempt until they began to release films. The manager of the Film Import Company thus defines his position:

"We are ready to co-operate with any equitable business proposition that is offered in the interest of an organized Independent movement. But it must be good business and not hot air. The weakness of the Alliance is that it has opened its arms to anybody and everybody who has made a claim that he would manufacture moving pictures in America. There are eighteen of these concerns and many of them exist only on paper. They have promised to get out pictures at some future time, and on this basis they have as much voice as our company or the New York Motion Picture Company or Laemmle or any of the other few who are really making releases. I withdrew from the conference on Thursday and have had nothing to do with it since, although we are ready to co-operate whenever the others get down to a business basis.

"If there be no good business basis offered," continued Mr. Freeman significantly, "we are prepared to go ahead without reference to anybody else, in which case we will have a statement to make of importance to the trade."

POWERS CLAIMS FILM D'ART.

P. A. Powers, of the Powers Film Company, one of the new Independent companies, makes a statement that he has closed a contract with the Societe Film d'Art, of Paris, whereby the Powers Company becomes the sole American agent for "films d'art" after January 1.

"Her Generous Way," the sixth Imp release (which, by the way, was wrongly titled "Her Own Way" in our last week's issue), is a serio-comic. It is about a charming young matron who is so kind-hearted that she gives away to every beggar she meets the money which she had coaxed out of her husband to buy a new hat. Of course, such a thing is unreasonable to expect in a woman, but Miss Generous goes about it so naturally that it is really convincing, and the many amusing incidents will keep the audience in good humor. A full reel comedy is something that is seldom undertaken with success, but there is not a foot in "Her Generous Way" that is monotonous and it will fill a very pleasant part in any program. The photography is good, each succeeding "Imp" film showing marked improvement in this respect.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

Color is in the air just now. I mean moving pictures in natural colors. Mr. Charles Urban and his staff of associates has descended upon these shores in order to give the American moving picture public an opportunity of seeing results by Kinemacolor, as to which my opinion was published in these pages a few weeks ago. That opinion has been given so often, both here and on the other side of the Atlantic, that people must begin to think that I am a bit vindictive, and that I have some sinister motive in deriding the Urban-Smith process. Not so. I have merely dissected it from the scientific point of view. However, as there may be some who think that my motives are not disinterested, the following confirmation of my views may have some weight. It is by a London correspondent of a moving picture publication published in New York City. This gentleman says: "Kinemacolor does not seem to make great headway in this country (England). It certainly seems strange that with the great success claimed for it, it is not by now well introduced into the moving picture exhibitions." This is what I said several weeks ago.

The "mysterious inventor" is also busy. The latest specimen of the breed is said to be not in any way connected with photography, to have made his discovery entirely by accident, and to have produced exceedingly good results. Yet, again, I am contenting myself with a simple quotation. It is the kind of thing that I have read literally hundreds of times the last fifteen years, and I suppose it is the kind of thing I shall go on reading for another fifteen years. The gentleman who discovers these things entirely by accident should be caught, and put in a glass case in some natural history museum.

But now I come to a gentleman of a different calibre. No other than my friend Carl Laemmle, whose nice, good looking portrait smiles at you blandly in the last number of The Moving Picture World. Carl has the reputation, which is not entirely undeserved, of being one of the shrewdest men in the moving picture game to-day, and therefore more importance should be attached to his utterances than to the nonsense which I have quoted above. He certainly is in a position to command good information on the technical end of matters, and the success he is making with his "Imp" films shows he knows how to go about the technology of his subject. He has done so well so far with his pictures that improvement in the same ratio will assuredly before long give him a leading place amongst American film manufacturers.

Carl, too, like the rest of his competitors, is talking moving pictures in natural colors and here is what he says: "I have discovered in Germany one obscure inventor who has mastered the essentials of this vast improvement, and I also have a man in this country working on the same lines." He also says that he has seen "actual demonstration in color photography and that other manufacturers are experimenting along the same lines." He commits himself to the conjecture that "it seems to be only a question of months before the world will be astounded with the dream of decades."

Now, Carl, my boy, I have read all this before, many a time and oft, and I would not for worlds take up the position of casting doubt on your statements, yet I put it to you that they are legitimately open to comment. In the first place, ever since I took an interest in the subject, which is many years now, I have been reading and hearing of "obscure German inventors" in color photography. What is more, I have met them, conversed with them and studied their minds and their results. And again: that "little dream which is to come true in a few months" is also an old friend of mine. There is, indeed, about Carl Laemmle's utterances on moving picture color photography such a familiar aspect that I seem to be shaking hands with some very old friends. Understand me, I am not casting the smallest doubt on Mr. Laemmle's bona fides in this matter. He is far too shrewd, I am sure, to make such statements as these without adequate grounds. Nobody hopes more sincerely than I do that what he says is thoroughly well founded. But at the same time there are two or three fundamental considerations in regard to the subject which should not be lost sight of.

In the first place it is ridiculous to suppose that success in making moving pictures in natural colors is likely in the nature of things to be the outcome of any sudden discovery; or that probably it will come from an "obscure" inventor. Experiments in color photography date back exactly 70 years, that is to say, so soon as the Daguerretype was made practicable, Bacquerel, the French scientist, started to make photographs in natural colors on paper. His results are in existence. I saw them in Paris a few years ago. Besides Bacquerel, numerous other experimentalists have worked to the same end on glass as well as paper. But until the year 1861 no definite advance was made because the very principles of the subject were only imperfectly understood.

In that year Professor James Clark Maxwell, of Cambridge, England, enunciated the theory of trichromatics, which forms the basis of the three-color printing method of to-day. Equally so Ducos Du Hauron, a French experimentalist, got to work on the same lines. And the practical outcome, so far as photography on glass is concerned, was seen some 12 years or so ago in the work of Frederick Eugene Ives, who produced the beautiful photograph in natural colors with which his name is associated.

Innumerable other experimentalists have since been at work, and some of them, like Friese-Greene and Urban-Smith, are applying this method to moving picture films. But all of them nearly without exception trace the fundamental experiments back to the trichromatic theory advanced by Professor Clark Maxwell, which theory supposes, on the part of the experimentalist, an intimate knowledge of the nature and properties of light. In other words, your experimentalist must be an expert with the spectroscope. Generally speaking nobody who is unacquainted with spectroscopic work can hope to make moving pictures in natural colors. There have been many other experiments made at the pigmentary end of matters. That is to say, the silver deposit in the film has been changed in color. Then colored inks have been used as in three-color printing; then again the light has been colored. But, up to the time of writing very little of practical value for moving picture purposes has been accomplished.

Mr. Laemmle may have something altogther different up his sleeve, and it is tolerably certain that what ever he has got MUST be in accordance with known theory on the subject. That theory, I may point out, is accessible to any intelligent student of natural science who will go to the nearest library and read up "light," "the chemistry of the silver salts" and "the chemistry of aniline dyes." Here are all the data available for any inventor or adapter who can so mould well established theory to meet the exigencies of modern film making. This is the entire crux of the matter. The principles of moving picture natural color photography are perfectly well known. There is no secret about them. You do not have to go to Germany for them. They can be ascertained in Chicago or New York by anyone interested. The manufacturers who are experimenting, if they have sufficient basic knowledge can ascertain these principles for themselves.

You know, gentle reader, that the basic principles of moving picture photography itself date back scores, maybe hundreds, of years. Persistence of vision was not the discovery of anybody present living in the moving picture game. It is solely upon the phenomena of persistence of vision that moving picture photography as it is known to the world to-day depends. So with the celluloid film. Celluloid is a fifty-year-old product and the scientific properties of bromide of silver were discovered years and years ago. There is, indeed, very little new under the sun.

I am not writing these paragraphs with the idea of discouraging anybody from wrestling with the problem of natural color photography applied to the moving picture. On the contrary, I want to encourage inquiry as much as possible—I mean inquiry along scientific lines, that is, by the light of established, ascertained, definite knowledge. In other words, you must get down to the first principles of the subject. Great optical and chemical knowledge are required, together with accurate experimentation. It is absolutely impossible that there can be any accident about the matter, or any chance, or that the thing will turn up just as a mushroom appears in a night. In the whole 70 years that photography has been made practicable there has been only one accident of any importance which has influenced practical photography at all. And that was when the father of photography, Daguerre, having exposed his bromized silver plate in the camera, was at a loss how to develop it. He left the exposed plate in his chemical cupboard all night and in the morning there was the photographic image upon it! By a simple process of elimination he discovered that it was the vapor of mercury which made the pictures.

This is the only important accident that has ever happened in connection with photo-chemical science. There is hardly an invention before the world to-day which is not the outcome of hard, persistent, scientific work, based upon a thorough knowledge of the underlying principles of the subject—whether it be in chemistry, mechanics, engineering, or indeed any branch of industry into which the scientific method enters. And in this matter of moving pictures in natural colors, it is the scientific method, and the scientific method only, that will solve the problem.

ANOTHER PATHE SUNDAY RELEASE.

The Pathe Company announces another Sunday release for December 12, the subject being the film d'art, "Le Grande Breteche." From this it would appear that the Sunday release of November 14 must have brought satisfactory results.

A CONDENSOR PROJECTOR.

A device recently patented, and now upon the market, ingeniously constructed, protects the condensors in projecting machines from breakage. An officer of the company stated to a representative of this publication that the article as perfected was the result of much experimentation. He said:

"A condensor is difficult to handle and usually breaks when badly needed. The thin edges are the most dangerous, especially in a new condensor when the light is first turned on. The expansion and contraction unnecessarily intensified by excessive heat usually does the damage. The protector is scientifically arranged to catch the direct light rays which enter the condensor. Heat travels intermittently upward and forward and the greatest intensity is naturally at the top. The condensor acts as a shield, repelling this excessive heat, and the heat entering the aperture with the light rays strikes the center of the condensor and is diffused slowly and evenly through the glass. In this way the expansion is natural and the glass does not break.

"The composition is absolutely a non-conductor of heat and lectricity, and if the lamp is shoved forward the condensor will prevent grounding and shorting. It also serves as an indicator for placing the lamp in position, and prevents filing sparks from escaping, filling in the crevices between the condensor and shell. It has been carefully tested and worked out, and will reduce breakage 90 per cent.

"A clear picture cannot be shown with a cracked condensor, as it destroys the purpose of the condensor."

Particulars of this device may be obtained from the Condensor Protector Company, 1932 North Fairfield avenue, Chicago, Ill.

We have to thank the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Newark, N. J., for an invitation to be present at their Annual Ball last Monday evening. Unfortunately the invitation did not reach us in time to permit of our attendance.

The Kuhn-Thornton Company, of Rochester, N. Y., with a capital of $1,500,000, has been formed to manufacture a new fireproof film for moving pictures. Mr. Kuhn was formerly vice-president of the Defender Photo Supply Company, and Mr. Thornton is the holder of many patents in connection with the subject. The factory is in course of construction.

The attention of exhibitors is called to the advertisement of the Electric Service Supplies Company, on another page. The ticket chopper made by this concern is the most serviceable article of the kind that has come to our notice and is giving satisfaction in hundreds of theaters. It is operated by foot, thus leaving both hands free, and is proof against misuse on the part of the ticket taker. It is furnished in any color of wood to match the front decorations. Other particulars on application to Electric Service Supplies Company, 1024 Filbert street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Alan J. Williamson, of the Williamson Cinematograph Company, has arrived in the United States on a business visit and may be addressed at the office of The Moving Picture World by those members of the trade who may wish to get into contact with him. He is here for the purpose of placing several novelties on the American market of which we hope to speak in detail next week.

H. A. Spanuth, formerly with Miles Bros. and later manager of Laemmle's New York rental department, has opened an Independent exchange at 10 East Fifteenth street, New York. He says he has 1,000 reels to put into immediate service. Mr. Spanuth offers one week's free service to the theater manager who suggests the best name for his new exchange.

COMEDY AND TRAGEDY (Edison).

It is now many years since we, in company with hundreds of others, waited two hours outside a theater door in London to see the beautiful American actress, Mary Anderson, in two of her greatest successes, both of which oddly enough have formed the themes of moving picture films. The first of them is the classic story of Pygmalion and Galatea, the second bears the very title of this picture, "Comedy and Tragedy." "Comedy and Tragedy" was a short piece adapted from the French by W. S. Gilbert. It showed Clarice, a celebrated French actress, entertaining a royal Duke and his friends in her home, and being called upon for the edification or rather the enjoyment of His Highness to give an exhibition of her dramatic powers. So she consents to do so. Simultaneously her lover is fighting a duel outside her house, of which she is alone conscious. So the poor woman, while simulating comedy for the amusement of the Duc D' Orleans also feels and betrays all the anguish of real tragedy! The Duke and his fellow guests applaud the actress for her exhibition, not realizing, of course, that the woman's anguish is real and not feigned. Such an opportunity as this brings out, or rather should bring out, all the histronic ability of which a woman following the calling of actress is capable of exhibiting. She is required, as it were, to go right through the scale of human emotions from the feminine standpoint and to make her audience feel as she feels.

This theme, which we saw in London, forms virtually the theme of the Edison "Comedy and Tragedy" and, moreover, it has the same title. Like Mary Anderson, Mdlle. Pilar Morin has to simulate comedy and feel tragedy for the edification of her guests, but the French actress is more heavily handicapped than Miss Anderson was, in that she is debarred from the saving help of speech. Pilar Moran has to convey all these emotions across the foolights in this photograph, purely by action, and how marvelously well she does it, it is impossible for us in mere words to tell the reader. Suffice it to say that practically for the first time in the history of the American moving picture film business, an actress, or rather a pantomimist, of transcendental ability takes the stage and shows us in this picture film acting quite up to the level of that which we have been accustomed to see in the Pathe films d'art, about which we have written so much during the past few months.

The story of "Comedy and Tragedy," which was printed in The Moving Picture World of November 6 last, does not now concern us in detail. What is chiefly our business this week is to record the fact that this particular picture was exhibited on Monday last in a New York moving picture theater and attracted very great applause. Moreover, as a month ago we did not have the opportunity of giving out impressions of the picture in detail, we here take the opportunity of doing so. And those impressions, let it be said, writing as we do a few days after seeing the picture, are chiefly of the very fine work which Pilar-Morin put into the story, which, however, was well acted by the other characters, the stage being well dressed and everything done to give the story dignified finish and the correct tone of good society.

And again, for a second time, we feel constrained to accord the Edison Company the highest possible praise for the extremely fine photographic quality of this picture. Time was, and that not very long ago, when Edison pictures were incurring much exaggerated odium in virtue of certain irregularities of quality which for some time were observed in the company's pictures. But all this has been swept away as if by magic and, thanks to skill, enterprise and persistent hard work, your Edison moving picture photograph has been put on to a plane of artistic and technical merit which fears no rivalry in the United States. It is always a pleasure to us in these pages to encourage real merit, particularly from the photographic end, and we desire to say that the Edison forces just now are turning out some exceedingly fine photographic work indeed, of which a specimen is visible in this picture of "Comedy and Tragedy."

THE CROCODILE HUNT (Pathe).

Another of those natural history subjects which are popular with moving picture audiences and the production of which we desire to encourage, for the reason that, like the industrial subjects to which we made reference last week, your natural history subject makes a universal appeal. In the case of "The Crocodile Hunt" there is a touch of the unconventional that should surely appeal to an American audience. In the first place, the crocodile, if we mistake not, is not indigenous to the North American Continent. It is—and here we write under correction—an African amphibian. Secondly, few people in this country have seen a crocodile in its native haunts. The Pathe picture shows us how the water is baited from a boat by Oriental-looking natives. The beast bites, is hooked and is dragged along the side of the boat, struggling, by the way, just as a salmon struggles when he is on the hook. Finally he is made to be very active with his mouth by means of a pole. The conclusion of the picture shows us the results of the day's hunt in the shape of a half-dozen gentle crocodiles wagging their tails on dry land. The picture is nicely colored, and, as we have said, must surely appeal to moving picture audiences in virtue of its unconventionality, for a crocodile hunt is something out of the common.

THE OPEN GATE (Biograph).

Love and duty. These two forces in life frequently cross and cause untold suffering and sorrow. Here are two lovers, whose troth is plighted, but who because the girl believes it her duty to do a certain thing, are separated, the man leaving, declaring he never would return. For fifteen years he keeps his vow, but the love affairs of a nephew bring him back to the same gate, where he meets his former love. They renew their vows and a double wedding follows. Every life, however commonplace it may be, has its dramatic moments, and the one here indicated is no exception. As is usual with the Biograph actors, they make the most of these moments and create a drama of unquestioned power. Perhaps the question which will come to the minds of most who see it is whether what is thought to be duty really is duty. Sometimes it is only a mistaken sense of the necessity of self-sacrifice. Duty can be, as it could have been in this instance, performed just the same as if one's own wishes are consulted.

THREE THANKSGIVINGS (Edison).

Although Thanksgiving will be past when this number of The Moving Picture World reaches the hands of its readers, yet no doubt some of the sentiment of the celebration will have survived. So that this pretty little topical picture from the Edison studio, which was released last week, will be sure of an agreeable reception though it may be seen days after the 1909 Thanksgiving Day has been added to the past. The story is of a domestic nature. A boy leaves his home for New York to better himself. On Thanksgiving evening he is enjoying himself in a cafe when he sees an addressed tag on one of the birds which reminds him of the country home he has left. That country home is a farm where turkeys are raised for the market. Of course, he determines to do better and give cafes a wide berth in future. The lure of the West attracting him, he goes, and makes his fortune, and returns home on the third Thanksgiving Day, where he is not recognized until he removes his false beard. So happiness descends on the scene; he is united to his sweetheart, and the third Thanksgiving dinner passes off midst all the glamor of family sentiment. The Edison people work out this simple and touching theme so clearly that it is evidently plain to any American moving picture audience. It was exceedingly well rehearsed on the occasion when we saw it. But we desire to give it praise on several grounds. In the first place, we were immensely pleased with the natural groupings of the characters around the family table and the very natural way in which they comported themselves. It seemed to us that we were looking upon a real domestic interior. This is very high praise indeed for the moving picture film, whose chief drawback, as a rule, is admittedly lack of naturalness. Therefore, in this respect we think the Edison Company make a great advance in their work. Then, again, we should like to praise the photographic quality of this picture. We have observed for many months past that the photographic qualities of the Edison pictures have steadily improved; that they are taking on regularity, uniformity of tone and depth of deposit. Moreover, they are cleaner than they were wont to be earlier in the year. They are free of those disturbing spots, patches, streaks, tears and other drawbacks to fine photographic quality. Altogether a very fine picture indeed.

"The Governor's Daughter" (Kalem).—The story of the Kalem release of the 26th, "The Governor's Daughter," is written in the first person singular, which we think is something of a novelty in these productions. It seems that one of the members of the Kalem Company's staff disinterred in an old house some documents dating from Revolutionary times. One of these documents tells a very pretty love story, in which the daughter of the Governor and a clergyman are the chief characters. It is war time, and the old conflict of love and duty is fought. Of course, all ends happily, and Lady Betty marries the clergyman, who was for a time the enemy of his country. The story is quaintly told and as a literary production we think it deserving of special mention. Picture stories, as a rule, though full of descriptive and graphic power, seldom soar into the purely literary, a quality which marks out the story of "The Governor's Daughter" as unique of its kind.

"Sins of the Fathers" (Vitagraph).—A story of a feud which apparently was destined to cause a young couple a lasting grief, but ended with a moderate degree of happiness after all. There is some fighting, a few pistol shots, a number of men on horseback chasing a lone fugitive, and some more melodramatic features which serve to give continuity to the story, which, in the telling, seems a trifle confused, or not quite complete. The opening scene in a country school is a pleasant introduction, and when the schoolmaster succeeds in whipping the bully who enters the room, even though he is the big girl pupil's brother, everyone seems well satisfied. A faint ripple of applause floated across the audience when the teacher had him down and sent him home. Then comes the introduction of the feud, most of which is fortunately left to the imagination. The girl hears the plot against the schoolmaster's life after he has choked her brother insensible. She warns him in the field and turns the clansmen away. The picture closes with the girl, who has been turned out by her father, in her lover's arms. There is a good deal of heart interest in this film, which, interpreted by good acting and illustrated by clear photography, makes a picture well worth seeing. The only scene that seems overdrawn is where the clansmen ride almost up to the hiding schoolmaster and then turn and ride away. It seems as though they could not help seeing him, and this fact destroys the plausibility of the picture.

"Moon for Her Love" (Gaumont).—A beautifully tinted comedy, well acted, which is a species of travesty upon some of the absurd things girls expect a man to do for them. There is a cave scene in which witches and fairies are discovered, which is effective. A bit of magic after the moon is brought down which causes it to reduce in size until it will go into her apron is attractive. The sudden appearance of a baby is hailed with shouts of laughter, and the picture closes two years after with a cradle rocking merrily.

"Visions of a Nag" (Gaumont).—A picture which might be used with telling effect in S. P. C. A. campaigns. It purports to be the dreams of a poor old horse which lies dying in his stable; and introduces some attractive views of horses in picturesque pastures, and either being ridden or driven in the park; a glimpse of the Derby and an old age in which he was tenderly cared for. But he awakes to hear his brutal driver threaten to leave him outside to starve because he is too old to work longer.

"The Best Man Wins" (Essanay).—A choice bit of comedy, well acted and illustrated with good, clear photography. The scene is laid on a ranch where all the boys want to marry one girl. Finally she posts a notice that she will marry the one who first returns with the marriage license. Away they go careering over the plains, up and down hills and through streams for that license. And here is the only weakness. The ride is too long. They get the licenses and start back, and the weakness is overcome. The return is much shorter. Meanwhile her real lover, who was called away a year before, appears, the parson is there and when the cowobys come galloping up with their licenses they are just in time to extend congratulations. It is one of those enjoyable comedies which leaves everyone feeling pleasant because somehow there is a feeling that the right man did win.

"Adonis Is Robbed of His Clothes" (Pathe).—A tinted picture, depicting the experiences of a young man with a number of women after he had been robbed of his clothes and appeared clothed in a number of fig leaves. It is a rough-house picture, with a long chase, but even this is made interesting by good acting. The views are clear and picturesque and are worth while seeing.

"The Personal Conduct of Henry" (Essanay).—A story with all the dash and life which characterize most of the Essanay films, particularly those which deal with humorous subjects. Henry when left alone undertakes housekeeping, but discovers that housekeepers are born and not made and unfortunately for him he wasn't born that way. Like most men under similar conditions, he gives up after a desultory trial. And then, after forcing some burglars to clean up his litter, including the remains of champagne suppers, he starts for the station, gleeful in the thought that his returning wife can find no fault in him. But the burglars, seeking revenge, return and replace the litter, including with it some compromising bits of feminine apparel, which condemn him in the eyes of his wife. And the last seen of the unfortunate Henry is his disappearance in the kitchen where in that torture chamber the rolling pin and the flat-iron await his coming. The fun is fast and furious and the audience takes it out in laughing continuously.

"A Mislaid Baby" (Essanay).—Whoever conceived the idea of mislaying a baby and permitting someone else to purchase the carriage in which the youngster was reposing easily began the construction of a laugh producer which has had few equals. The mother could not buy the carriage at her price, but her weary husband had placed the baby inside and when another woman purchases the carriage and wheels it away the father reads blissfully on, without missing his offspring. Meanwhile the purchaser of the perambulator has not seen that it is occupied and there is more consternation when the discovery is made at her home. But finally the difficulties are all made straight and there is a plenitude of explanations and forgiveness. The main proposition is that the film is funny and cannot fail to make those who see it laugh uproariously.

"The Patient from Punkville" (Pathe).—A comedy by M. Gabriel Timmory which keeps the audience convulsed. A doctor is called away and the story concerns two burglars who were surprised by the arrival of a patient and hastily prescribe for him. The doctor returns, finds the thieves, who profess to be patients and secure prescriptions. The doctor discovers his loss and the real patient at the same time and has him arrested. The complications are funny, while the acting is so good and lively that everybody is kept in good humor.

"The Conspiracy" (No mark).—Seen at an independent theater and tells the story of a man wrongfully accused of robbing a safe. It shows him in prison, with his escape, his employment on a steamboat upon which his accuser sails, and the final bringing to justice of the real criminal and the restoration to his place of the injured man. The action is good in this, with the exception of one or two scenes, but the photography is very poor. The negative is badly underexposed and the printer didn't do any too good work.

"Indiscreet Father and Son" (Lux).—A somewhat silly tale of a father and son who were severely chastised by the wife and mother for loving not wisely but too well. Some funny situations of the rough-house type are developed and they raise a laugh, but the film possesses little real merit.

"Electrified Humpback" (Lux).—A picture representing a humpback who procures an electric machine to help his deformity, but it creates so much trouble by giving everyone shocks that he tears it off in his rage and demands his money back.

"The Paleface's Wooing" (Kalem).—A melodramatic picture of the wooing of a white man and an Indian maid, with the attendant jealousy of an Indian lover, the stern refusal of a stoical father, an attempt to kill the white man which is foiled by the girl, the struggle between the Indian and the cowboy and the killing of the Indian. The closing scene shows the consummation of this drama. The setting of this film is picturesque and therefore very attractive, and the action is lively enough to please the most exacting critic of melodrama.

"How French Perfumes Are Made" (Pathe).—An industrial picture of merit, illustrating the manufacture of perfumes and giving a clear idea of how it is done.

"A Midnight Adventure" (Biograph).—The effects of novels which weave romantic sentences around every object, no matter how commonplace, are variously estimated, but perhaps there is a general feeling that they are more or less injurious. The Biograph Company has based an interesting and lively picture upon this belief. Mercedes reads a novel which depicts lovers as knightly individuals who are always performing gallant tasks for their ladies. When commonplace Frank arrives she insists that he show his love for her by undertaking some adventure, and suggests in a rather menacing way that he go to a neighboring house and steal one of her own photographs from a friend's table. Frank does as bidden, falls into the police net and is on his way to prison when a friend succeeds in getting him freed. He carries the photo to his lady, but waves her a fond goodbye and when she wakes up and follows him finds him vigorously embracing the friend from whom the picture was stolen. The knightly scheme of courtship scarcely met the young woman's expectations in this instance. The story is not complicated, but its working out by the Biograph Company is satisfactory and they really make an interesting picture of it. Perhaps much more so than might reasonably be expected.

"Sweet Revenge" (Biograph).—Yes, undoubtedly revenge is sweet and the jilted girl in this picture determined to obtain satisfaction for the slight she suffered, but the means taken, sending the love letters of a certain young man who was to be married to another by messenger to the new fiancee was not calculated to achieve the most certain results. However, she relented after the letters had gone, and pursued the boy to get them back, only to discover that he had dropped them from a bridge into the river below. One doesn't quite see the value of this subject for motion picture reproduction. It has very little dramatic power and while the company makes the most of the opportunities, it must be confessed that these are too few and too insignificant to create any material interest. It is possible that the suggestion is sufficient to compensate for the loss in dramatic interest, but one is disposed to dispute that view and to consider that the picture contains no more than a slight interest which may be fleeting or not, as the individual receives the impression.

"The Rubber Man" (Lubin).—A sort of rough house picture in which a so-called rubber man creates more or less disturbance before he is finally captured and placed where he can do no further injury. The interest centers chiefly in the antics of the rubber man, which are sufficiently lively and unexpected to maintain interest until the close.

"Late for the Recital" (Pathe).—The mixup in love affairs caused by the difficulties of a professor who attempts to get to a recital, but is obliged to return home and surprises a man making love to his daughter. The antics of the young man, who successfully makes love to two women between the visits of the professor, supply sufficient sport to maintain interest.

"On the Border" (Selig).—A wild and woolly Western drama, with headlong rushes, gun play and the tying of two different men fast in an underground torture chamber, with water falling on their foreheads drop by drop. There is a story of love and a difficulty over cards, with shooting, wild, rushing mustangs, reckless riders and all the dash and go of the plains. It is melodramatic, yet there is something about it which makes us ask what it all means. In other words, the producer has failed to properly convey the story (if there is a story) over the footlights. The photographer has also fallen from grace in several of the scenes.

"In Wrong Simms" (Selig).—The unfortunate experiences of a gentleman who started out with the best intentions of making things better for those who were in any sort of difficulty. The situations are unexpected and unnatural, therefore only mildly humorous.

"A Heart's Devotion" (Gaumont).—A pathetic story. Two girls, sisters, love the same man. One accepts him, but because the other sister develops consumption the engagement and the wedding are both kept from her. Divining that something she did not understand or know about was in progress, she rises from her couch to investigate and meets the wedding party returning from church. The shock is too great and she falls dead at her sister's feet. While the picture is tragic in this respect, it may be admitted that the logical conclusion is that it was better so. This ended all the suffering she might have endured if she had been allowed to live and see her sister happy with the man she loved, too. Technically this picture is up to Gaumont's best, and many of the scenes are really pictorial in their setting. The picture as a whole is impressive, and in Keith's, where we saw it, the audience watched it in breathless silence, then the sign of appreciation was shown by a stamping of feet all over the room.

"The Mountaineer's Honor" (Biograph).—The dramatic possibilities in the standard of honor recognized by the mountaineers of Kentucky or some other Southern States have never been adequately recognized. The capable Biograph company has succeeded in reproducing graphically and convincingly one of these picturesque, though pathetic, scenes. It can be understood how ferociously a brother might follow and attack the betrayer of a sister, but the peculiar standards which make hanging such an ignominious form of execution will be scarcely comprehensible to one who has never known of the peculiarities. Under such circumstances it may, perhaps, be plain why a father should drive his daughter away. No matter how unsophisticated one may be, the parents are not likely to display any compassion, and this scene is unquestionably accurately reproduced. Not all unfortunate girls have a lover ready to accept them regardless of what has occurred. This human touch by the Biograph people gives a more pleasing ending than would the stern justice of the parents who turn their daughter away. More sinned against than sinning, and therefore entitled to charity, such girls excite pity rather than a sense of justice. Dramatically this picture displays great strength. Photographically it is clear, and the action of the characters is smooth and without unnecessary waits or melodramatic movements.

"On the Little Big Horn" (Selig).—This enterprising house has produced a picture which has all the accuracy of history so far as essentials go, and has graphically illustrated Custer's last stand on the Little Big Horn, when his entire command was killed by the Sioux Indians. With it is woven a love story, which, while perhaps not wholly accurate, is not impossible, and it gives a touch of tenderness to the otherwise stern and bloody pictures which makes it all the more attractive. The picture is worked out with all the rush and dash which make Selig's Western pictures so interesting. Without undertaking to note the details of the picture, it is, perhaps, sufficient to say that they are sufficiently accurate to satisfy the ordinary observer, and that is the main feature. The moving picture audience wants action, and these exhibitions of headlong bravery are thrilling enough to bring rounds of applause. The picture will be a factor in maintaining Selig's reputation for films of this character, and is being billed as a headliner with success.

"The Red Star Inn" (Melies).—A thrilling story, in which a wrongfully accused sailor is exonerated and the real thief brought to justice through the well-directed detective work of the sailor's sweetheart. The picture shows graphically the interior of an inn, and there is intense interest as the thief takes the money belt from the paymaster, then steals back to his place and apparently goes to sleep. There is a dramatic scene in the courtroom when the girl rushes in with her new evidence, which clears her sweetheart and causes the arrest of the real culprit. The story is more or less melodramatic, though that naturally does not detract from its interest, and there is plenty of action. That the film is satisfactory to the average audience is clearly shown in the way they watch and even applaud the picture. Technically it is clear, and there is sufficient variety to maintain the interest to the end.

"A Lady's Purse" (Essanay).—What is in these great purses the ladies carry? Has any mere man ever discovered the usefulness of those adjuncts of the feminine make-up? Apparently not, for when the two who set out to follow a woman about, to take her purse, finally secure it and investigate they find a great quantity of stuff which they cannot use, and only twelve cents in money. The scenes in the department store, particularly about the bargain counter, where the men are almost crushed in their efforts to extricate themselves from a bad predicament, are reasonably accurate, though of course a bit exaggerated. The attempts of these individuals to wend their way through the store are funny. Perhaps they have the sympathy of the men in the audience who have been unfortunate enough to be caught in the same kind of a trap. Some men have, and, like the two in the picture, have undoubtedly wished themselves well out of it. As a whole, it is very funny, and will appeal to a large number who understand what department store crushes are like.

"On the Wrong Scent" (Essanay).—An instance where similarity of perfumes led to an exciting combat between two women, in which feminine wearing apparel was scattered all over the place. When Smith's wife detects the scent of a delicate perfume about his clothes she has her suspicions. When later they are dining at a restaurant and she discovers the same perfume about the clothes of a young woman sitting alone, there is a row which culminates in the police court, where mutual explanations, supplemented by the assertions of a vender of perfumes that he is responsible, finally settle what was proving to be a bad difficulty. The action is vigorous, and the efforts of the two women to hit with their fists as they scratch and bite, are funny. The picture is accompanied by screams of laughter.

"TULIPS" (Gaumont).—An educational film of more than ordinary merit. It has been common to see beautiful flowers reproduced, but this is among the first, if not the first film shown to the general public in which the flowers are seen developing from the bud to the full bloom in all its richness and beauty of color, thence through the various stages of fading and decay. An infinite number of pictures and a great deal of labor were required to secure this film, and now that it is done one wonders at its marvelous revelations. The life of the flower is passed in review within a few minutes. The film is beautifully colored and is technically perfect. It is easily one of the most interesting educational subjects Gaumont has ever shown.

THE HOSTAGE (Ambrosio).

The Film Import and Trading Company are releasing this week a picture much in the style of the well-known "Nero." It is based upon one of Schiller's poems and the scene of it is laid in ancient Greece, which gives opportunity for a lavish display of costume, much processional work, and some very beautiful scenery, not to mention exceedingly fine acting, to all of which Ambrosio has done the fullest justice. The result is that we have a series of beautifully staged pictures which please the eye, although possibly the story, which deals with the theme of friendship and some little love interest, may not strike an American audience as too familiar. But aside from this matter, the film is photographically very fine. The acting, too, is such as would do credit to the stage of any country, and on these grounds the picture is bound to have considerable popularity.

"All for Love of a Girl" (Powers Company).—A drama full of action, and played by a company of very good actors. The scenes where the miners are washing the dirt are not so good photographically as they might have been with the exercise of a little more care on the part of the operator. The figures are somewhat out of focus. The setting was accurate, however, and it is a pity that the technical quality is not up to standard. The interior scenes offer no such objection, however. All blurring has disappeared and the pictures are clear and sharp, with good tonal graduations. While the play is somewhat melodramatic, it must be admitted that the actors have not overdone it. The play runs evenly and smoothly. The sudden appearance of the former lover is managed well, and the suicide of the husband is behind a screen, sparing the audience that sight. The picture would be better if the screen did not fall. Let the imagination fill in the blank and spare the onlookers the grewsome sight of a dead body hanging across a chair. Even though it is only momentary, it is too much, and the film would be improved to stop when the pistol explodes. The company is to be congratulated upon its success in this film, which proves that they are beginning right and will probably correct these minor defects in future pictures.

"An Unlucky Acquisition" (Eclair).—A gentleman purchases an image, perhaps a dummy for the display of clothing, takes it home, and it causes all sorts of difficulty for his mother-in-law. The fun is somewhat rough, but those who enjoy a different form of the mother-in-law joke will laugh heartily, at the trouble she has dreaming of that image. The story is not especially strong, but it is reasonably good and succeeds in producing numerous laughs.

"Punishment of an Athlete" (Theophile Pathe).—Not a particularly interesting story of a traveling athlete who thinks he killed a man, and when the man, who was only stunned, recovers and confronts the athlete, the latter drops a huge weight with which he is performing upon his chest and dies from the effects of the blow. Scenery and grouping of figures are reasonably attractive and picturesque, and the story is not without its interest, yet the picture is not up to the best standard in either conception, acting or photography.

"Julius Caesar" (Itala).—Perhaps this picture is, in some ways, as good as anything this firm has done. The dramatic possibilities in this historic scene, the assassination of Caesar, are great, and perhaps will never be wholly exhausted. It is a touch of the romance of history that appeals very strongly to the imagination, and naturally has its effect upon the reproduction of the story, no matter what medium is employed. The Caesar here is reasonably dignified, and the conspirators perform their parts with reasonable fidelity to the ordinary interpretation of the story. It doesn't seem that the company rises quite to the possible dramatic heights, and it does so well that one wishes it had done better. But however these slight shortcomings may arouse a desire to see some of the work a little better done, one may thoroughly enjoy the film and see again the murder of the great statesman and soldier re-enacted with sufficient fidelity to make it seem real. The picture as a whole is to be commended, and for such an ambitious attempt holds its quality well from beginning to end.

"Goddess of the Sea" (Le Lion).—A species of fairy story in which the love of a goddess for a shepherd youth brings his death. There are numbers of attractive scenes, with some handsome models posing in a few of them, but the film is not as good as some which have come from this house. The action is necessarily narrow and the only dramatic feature is where the youth breaks away from his goddess of the sea and falls into the ocean, to be drowned. The ending may be artistic, but in a film of this type would be far more interesting and satisfactory if it were changed to allow the couple to live together in happiness afterward.

ESSANAY PRODUCERS IN TEXAS AND MEXICO.

To Install Temporary Studio in El Paso—Essanay Western Pictures in Great Demand.

G. M. Anderson, the Western producer for the Essanay Company, left Denver, Col., last week for El Paso, Texas, to oversee the final work on the Western branch studio. He was accompanied by his camera squad and several stock actors. For some time the Essanay Company has been planning a studio in the West, and owing to the great demand for Essanay Western subjects decided to establish a permanent Western department, with studio in some live Western town. The definite location of the new studio has not been settled upon, although the company will probably spend the remainder of the Winter in El Paso. Scene painters, carpenters and helpers left Chicago for El Paso some time ago to join Anderson and his company. More talent has also been employed.

G. M. Anderson, in an interview given out recently, said:

"We are well equipped, or soon will be, for making some of the best Western subjects ever released by any company. Up to this time all our Western stories have been made out-of-doors or the interior scenes made in Chicago. Last year we were handicapped in having to return to Chicago to make the interior views, but with the new studio in operation this difficulty will be removed. We have purchased a portable lighting plant for our new studio, besides material for making some mammoth productions. Good scene painters are on the job, and people who can act, cowboys who can ride, women who can shoot, have been employed.

"We have some big pictures in the making. Arrangements have been made with one of the best known Texas ranchmen for a picture on cattle raising in the West, which will undoubtedly prove of vast educational interest. We intend to visit Central Mexico and possibly Grand Canyon for some scenic pictures. Everything is moving smoothly. We are having the best kind of success with our photography and plenty of good people, etc., to tell the stories."

The success of the Essanay's Western pictures has been wonderful. "The Best Man Wins," the first Western picture, released November 20, is reported to have been a winner. The photography in the picture is excellent, while the subject, a sparkling little comedy, is a choice one.

Many of the film exchanges have inquired of the Essanay Company as to whether or not the Western releases will be confined exclusively to dramatic subjects, as it appeared from previous advertising. The Essanay Company's bookings of Western subjects up to and including the release of January 1, include a number of comedies. This means two reels of the Essanay's popular comedy and will surely satisfy the film exchanges.

THE ESSANAY COMPANY OUT WEST.

(From The Denver Post.)

G. M. Anderson, secretary of the Essanay Film Company, of Chicago, has been in Denver for six weeks, "making pictures," and from here will take his little company to Las Vegas, then to Catalina Island.

"Our studio in Chicago," explains Mr. Anderson, "occupies a whole floor, and there we make all interior scenes, and maintain a picked permanent company of players. During the Summer we make outdoor pictures in and around Chicago, but when Fall comes, I take a photographer, property man and several principals, and follow the warm weather. Colorado is the finest place in the country for Wild West stuff. Some of the Eastern companies try to use the Adirondacks, but they don't get the effect that the Rockies give."

With Mr. Anderson, who acts the "heroes" himself, are J. J .Robbins, expert photographer; Jack O'Brien, a handsome young actor, who does the "heavies"; Arthur Smith, character actor, and W. K. Russell, property man and assistant hero and villain. This is the traveling organization, leading ladies, soubrettes, ingenues, mobs, posses, etc., being secured from the stock companies and vaudeville houses of the various cities that serve as a base for operations. Some ten or twelve "Western dramas" have been staged and photographed by Mr. Anderson since his arrival, Golden and Mt. Morrison being the spots chosen for the purpose. Last Tuesday, for instance, "The Heart of a Cowboy" was put on at Mt. Morrison, and for the benefit of those who like color and charm, interest and new sensations, a day with a "moving picture" company is enthusiastically recommended. Leaving at 8 o'clock, the company reached Mt. Morrison at 9, where the train was met by a bunch of trained cow ponies and riders under command of the Morrison boys themselves. Up into the hotel flocked the company, the property man threw back trunk lids with a bang, and in a few minutes the principals were appareled and "made up," horses mounted, and away down the street, down by brawling Bear Creek, on to a little farm house, tucked away in a clump of lofty cottonwoods. Permission had already been obtained, and seated at ease on the grass, horses hitched, the company listened to this reading from Mr. Anderson:

Scene 1. Girl comes out of house, holding some kodak pictures of herself. Cowboy comes up, sees picture, and begs it from her. She refuses at first, but finally gives him one, writing "To Steve" on it. He asks her to walk with him, but she refuses and he departs.

Scene 2. As Steve goes out the gate, he meets his partner, also named Steve, coming in. They shake hands and part.

Scene 3. Girl gives cry of joy as she sees newcomer. Throws herself into his arms. Playfully demands his pencil, and writes "To My Sweetheart, Steve" on the picture that she gives him.

Scene 4. As this Steve sits in front of his dug-out, looking at the picture of his sweetheart, the other Steve comes up. He demands to know what his partner is doing with the picture, and shows his own to prove that the girl is his sweetheart. Bad Steve sneeringly shows him his picture with "To my sweetheart" written on it. To settle the matter, however, they ride to the girl's house.

Scene 5. Call girl out. When an answer is demanded, she puts her arms around Bad Steve's neck, but holds the hand of friendship to Honest Steve. After a minute, he joins their hands and rides away.

Scene 6. Mexican rides up to Bad Steve's dug-out, and tells him of a chance to steal some cattle. Steve refuses at first, but finally consents, and they ride away.

Scene 7. Cutting a bunch of cattle out of the herd, and driving them away. Steve drops his picture.

Scene 8. Showing the thieves hurrying the stolen steers along. Steve goes to girl's house, and sends Mexican to sell cattle.

Scene 9. Rancher discovers his loss. Organization of the Vigilantes.

Scene 10. Ride of the Vigilantes.

Scene 11. Bad Steve visits the girl's house. As they sit on step, the Vigilantes ride up. They accuse Steve of stealing cattle, and when he denies, pull picture on him. The girl makes them stand back, and as she defends him, Honest Steve slips in beside his friend. Takes his picture out of his hat, and forces it into Bad Steve's hand. Bad Steve produces it as proof of his innocence, and Honest Steve steps forward and takes guilt upon himself. Vigilantes throw rope around his neck and lead him away. Girl throws arms about Bad Steve's neck.

Scene 12. Bad Steve comes to house and tells girl she must elope with him. She consents and hurries in to get her things. Mexican comes up and starts to divide money. Bad Steve stops him with curse, and leads him around to side of house.

Scene 13. Girl comes out and looks around. Hears voices and creeps around.

Scene 14. Steve and Mexican quarrel over division of money. As they wrangle girl appears, learns the truth, and steps forward. Mexican starts to stab her, but she jerks revolver out of Steve's holster, and covers them both. Makes Steve hand her the money, write a confession, and then forces them to mount the same horse and jump the country.

Scene 15. Girl mounts horse and starts on her ride to save Honest Steve from lynching.

Scene 16. Girl riding.

Scene 17. Vigilantes riding with Honest Steve in their midst.

Scene 18. As they are about to hang Steve, girl rides up. Hands over money, shows confession and lifts the rope off his neck.

Scene 19. Girl gives Honest Steve another picture with "To my future husband" written on it.

Talk about the intelligence demanded by the theater. The company is supposed to grasp the entire idea at once, for Mr. Robbins mounts his machine and Mr. Anderson calls "First scene." Miss Loma Besserer, the "girl" on the occasion, has played leads in many stock companies, but it was her first experience with "moving pictures," and started off with true "leading lady" refinement and reserve.

"No, no," cried Mr. Anderson. "Charming in a theater, Miss Besserer, and you certainly look a picture. But you've got to ACT a picture! This is practically pantomime, you know. Turn loose!"

"Can I talk it?" she demanded.

"All you want. The machine doesn't take conversation."

And pretty Miss Besserer, giving a braver furl to her cowboy hat, did "turn loose," making up dialogue as she went along. All of them did, for that matter, and it was splendid dialogue, too, so good that the whole thing could have been put on a stage just as it was given. Once over a scene, Mr. Anderson calling corrections, Mr. Robbins putting down little stones to mark each position, and then the whirl of the machine. Scenes 1, 2, 3, 5, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15 were taken one after another—all being house scenes—and by noon that part of the play was over. Not once was there a break made—scene succeeding scene with marvelous rapidity and telling effect—until the tableau, where the girl makes Bad Steve and the Mexican mount the same horse. Then the trouble began. Bad Steve would gain the saddle, but when the Mexican started to climb up behind him, off went the pony, and out of the picture. Pain on Mr. Anderson's face, anguish in the eyes of Mr. Robbins. Three times did this happen, and twice, too, did Miss Besserer's own horse bolt the picture when she came to mount for her own wild ride.

The jolliest sort of dinner in the little hotel, then remounting and the journey up into the hills, where the unsuspecting cattle grazed. Here Scenes 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 16, 17, 18 and 19 were taken, a deserted house being pre-empted for Bad Steve's home. Again Mr. Anderson's Gatling gun directions, and scene after scene without halt, until the cattle stealing. With infinite pains Mr. Robbins placed stones and bent bushes to show the exact radius in which the cattle must be stolen, but he forgot to tell the steers. Unaware of their responsibilities and new importance, the crazy beasts bolted the picture time and again, and by the time they did get bunched, stolen and photographed, both Bad Steve and the Mexican were sorry that they had ever quit the straight and narrow path. The Vigilantes made their flight across the front yard, Miss Besserer galloped madly up and down before the "machine," and just as the light was beginning to fail, the last picture was taken. A tired lot of players rode back to town, for every mind had been working at lightning speed, faces were weary from contortion, and all were hoarse from the rapid fire dialogue invented to help them out in their "pantomime." "Oh-h-h!" sighed Miss Besserer, "Camille is child's play to this."

These films will be sent to the head office in Chicago, and from there leased to "renters," as the jobbers of the "moving picture" industry are called. This lease calls for the return of the films after six months, for then they are worn out, and the company takes this means of protecting the people against spoiled pictures. The "renters" then lease them out to the "picture shows" at so much a day. The first run of the films, of course, are seen in the cities at the best shows, then they go to the next best shows, and on down the line until the expiration of six months finds them delighting the Podunk populace. Then they are sent back to Chicago, and "melted up," for there is a lot of silver in them. The Essanay Company, for instance, nets about $2,000 a year from this "melting up" process alone.

Money seems to be less an object with these "moving picture" people than with theatrical managers. The members of the company are better paid, for instance, and the "assisting talent" is handsomely recompensed. Leading ladies and leading men, according to their professional standing, are paid from $15 to $100 a day, and the Essanay Company even offered George and Josephine Cohan $2,000 for one dance. To show how great an inroad the "moving pictures" are making into theatrical receipts, and the closeness with which the syndicate watches such things, no actor or actress under control of Klaw & Erlanger is allowed to take part in any of the "plays," or even "do a turn." And as for the "plays" themselves $100 is paid for a good one, and many of the country's famous authors are turning their attention to this new source of income.

W. O. Ziegenfelder, proprietor of the new Fairyland, Springfield, Ohio, placed the order for his complete electric and machine equipment with J. H. Hallberg, New York City, including the "Hallberg" Economizer and the Motiograph double dissolving outfit, combined with the Motiograph No. 1 flickerless moving picture machine. The order also included a complete ventilating outfit, with exhaust fan, and 4,000 candle-power flaming arc lamp for the exterior.

The theater has now been open about a month and big business is reported.

The New Jersey Film Rental Company, of 214 Sixth avenue, New York, have opened a branch office in Connecticut. This is one of the few States in which a film exchange has never been located, and we expect that they will pick up considerable business in that locality. The New Jersey Film Rental Company have built up a good business by square dealing, and we are glad to see them expand. The Connecticut office is located at 1188 Main street, Bridgeport, Conn.

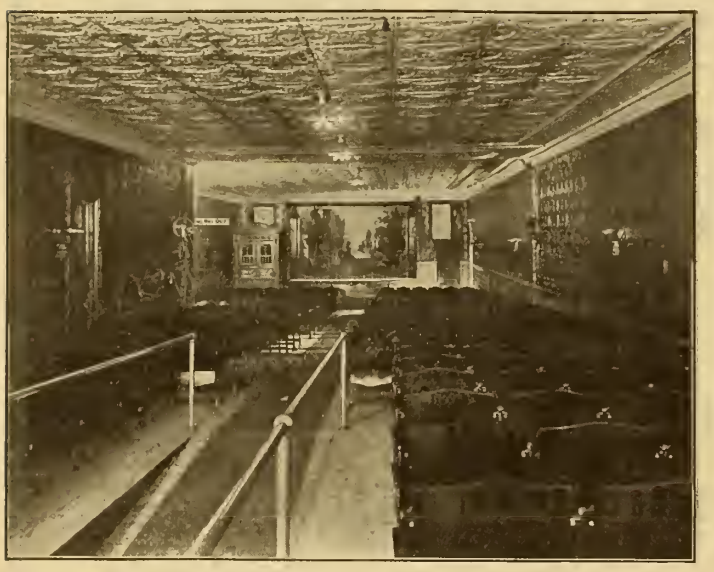
THE MUSIC QUESTION.

The Pian-Orchestra — An Instrument Specially Adapted for Moving Picture Places.

The Moving Picture World, which has the welfare of all moving picture exhibitors at heart, has long observed the need of good music among nickelodeons. On several occasions we have given the subject strong editorial mention. With the start of this Fall season, the question of suitable music looms up more important than ever with exhibitors who expect to operate for profit. A representative called on the main branch of the Rudolph Wurlitzer Company, Cincinnati, Ohio, who are credited with being the world's largest manufacturers of automatic musical instruments, and secured much information on the music feature for nickelodeons. Our representative found Farny R. Wurlitzer, who has charge of the automatic branch of the Wurlitzer business, full of ideas and practical suggestions. Not only is Mr. Wurlitzer an enthusiast on the possibilities of the self-playing instrument for nickelodeon use, but he supplied many powerful reasons in support of his views. Mr. Wurlitzer stated at the outset that the moving picture shows are coming in for a large share of his company's attention, with the beginning of the Fall season. The exhibitors, he says, are wise, so far as he has observed, and very quick to grasp a proposition that will make their shows more atractive and add to the profits of the business.

"Why, there is positively no limit to the possibilities of the self-player in this field," said Mr. Wurlitzer, "and while hundreds of picture shows have installed automatic instruments with pleasing results, we have only scratched the surface of this field. You see, it is really a dead open and shut proposition for the nickelodeon. Music of some sort they must have. The majority have one, two or three musicians to furnish incidental music while the show is in progress, and play accompaniments to songs and vaudeville acts. The expense of these performers is a heavy one, and keeps up week after week. There is not an exhibitor but who would welcome a chance to cut down the cost. How to do it has been the problem. The various types of Wurlitzer automatic musical instruments reproduce the playing of skilled musicians so exactly that it is difficult to tell the difference. For instance, our Pianorchestra perfectly reproduces the playing of symphony orchestras of various sizes and instrumentation. The Violin Piano represents a violinist and pianist playing in concert; the Flute Piano represents a flute player and pianist playing in concert; the 88-Note Player Piano perfectly reproduces the playing of an expert pianist. All of these instruments which combine the piano may also be played by hand as regular pianos. The Automatic Harp has a set of automatic fingers which pick the strings just as a human performer would. The Mandolin Sextette duplicates the playing of a mandolin orchestra; the Pianino and Tremolo Piano are the highest grade of self-playing pianos of the smaller size; the Tonophone is a high grade paper roll electric piano, without a keyboard, and so on. These instruments are all sold by us on payments that about equal what the theater would have to pay out for musicians. In a few months the exhibitor owns his instrument, after which his music costs him nothing, except the small cost of new music rolls."



JOHNSON BROS.' moving picture house at 775 West North avenue, Chicago. Interior view, showing Wurlitzer Pian-Orchestra near the stage.

"How are the instruments operated?" Mr. Wurlitzer was asked.

"By electric light current. The current from an ordinary incandescent light wire is all that is required, and we have some special instruments that are run by spring motor, wound by hand. These are for the small towns or districts where they do not have electricity."

THE ORIENTAL (Chinese Theater), San Francisco, Cal.

The Pian-Orchestra forms an ornamental centerpiece in the vestibule. In this location it attracts passers-by and then entertains them after they come in; the music being heard equally well both in and outside.

"In what shape does the music come?"

"On perforated paper music rolls, similar to the regular player piano music rolls. These are very inexpensive. They are changed in a few seconds' time without even stopping the instrument, and our music library is very large. We keep abreast with the times, and as fast as a new song or new instrumental piece wins public favor we have the rolls cut for it in our large roll cutting department."

"Are the instruments simple? Do they require much attention?"

"They are comparatively simple and require only about as much attention as an ordinary piano or organ would. Our customers have practically no bother on this score. They quickly get familiar with their instruments, and any slight slip can be quickly adjusted without calling in the services of an expert repairman."

"In just what way are the special styles of instruments used?"

"For two separate and distinct uses. Inside for entertaining purposes and outside for bally-hoo. Many exhibitors place their instruments at the front entrance in the center, where it furnishes music inside and can also be heard by passersby on the street. When used for bally-hoo exclusively, the instruments are usually placed in the vestibule. However, many exhibitors who use the smaller instruments place them in the space in the front of the exhibition room over the ticket office. In arranging a Violin Piano or Player Piano in this way, the back of the instrument faces towards the street, so as to get the greatest volume of music in that direction."

"What is the best general purpose instrument?"

"The Pianorchestra (the automatic orchestra). This instrument perfectly reproduces the playing of an orchestra of skilled musicians. A nickelodeon having one of these instruments is on a par with a regular theater employing a regulation orchestra. Furthermore, they have an attraction that will draw patrons equally as well as the picture end of the performance. They are such an attraction that they do away with the necessity of having singers and entertainers, and thus save that item of expense. Many of our smaller instruments have piano keyboards, and can be played by hand in the regular way to accompany singers."

"How do the prices range?"

"Prices on all the instruments are exceedingly reasonable. We have a special plan of payments by which a theater does not feel the investment at all—simply paying by the month or week about what they would pay out for musicians, until the instrument is settled for. There is another most important feature of the automatic musical instrument from the nickelodeon's standpoint, and that is the fact that the instrument is always ready for work. It will remain on the job all day and all night, so that the owner gets his music when he pleases and as long as he pleases. In this way he becomes entirely independent of musicians."

The Cherry Mine Disaster, the greatest calamity since the San Francisco earthquake, is the subject of a remarkable set of stereopticon slides and lecture by Photographer Rice, of the Brayton Manufacturing Company. As the bodies are still being recovered from the mine and the newspapers are full of accounts of the disaster, exhibitors who obtain this set of slides will no doubt find them a great attraction. They are sent out with printed lecture by the Brayton Manufacturing Company, 122 East Randolph street, Chicago, Ill.

The Exhibitors' Film Exchange, of Third avenue, New York, inform us that they will be prepared by the end of this week to contract for special service to a limited number of first-run customers. Their Morris Levy is at present in Europe and he has secured contracts for a steady delivery of twelve reels a week of selected subjects new to this country. It is the object of the Exhibitors' Film Exchange to establish an exclusive film service to a limited number of customers. This should interest managers in overcrowded sections where the similarity of programs is a constant menace to their success.

New York City, November 23, 1909.

Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—Will you kindly have this notice printed in your next issue in order that it may help to protect the interests of some of the film exchanges in the country, who are subject to taking chances on out-of-town contracts?

On October 28 I received a letter signed H. M. Fudge, care Gem Theater, Pinckneyville, Ill., to be put on my shipping list for twelve reels of film and six sets of song slides, to be shipped C. O. D., contract, references and security to follow. Complying with his request, in taking a chance that the majority of film exchanges have to take on account of competition being so keen, these goods were shipped, and no trace of man or goods can be found at the present time.

Should any of the film exchanges throughout the States be confronted with a man with any part of the following list of films or song slides, they will know that these have been stolen, and we ask them to communicate with the undersigned at once.

Thanking you in advance for same, I remain,

Yours very truly,

THE GEISHA

WHO SAVED JAPAN

LENGTH 955 FEET

Following the assassination of Marquis of Ito of Japan, one of the greatest statesmen of history, the whole world began to read the story of this marvellous man's life, and all agree that nothing more romantic or sensational is to be found in fiction.

When the Royalists of Japan were struggling to overthrow the tyrannical Shoguns, and to restore the Emperor to his rightful position as the ruler of a united nation, the Marquis Ito, then a young man, was one of the leaders of the reform movement.

He was so aggressive a fighter and so wonderful a leader that the Shoguns placed a great price on his head, and he was saved to his country and to history, in one instance at least, only by the bravery and strategy of a little Geisha girl. And in after years, after he had become titled and famous, the Marquis Ito took the Geisha aud made her his wife.

"THE GEISHA WHO SAVED JAPAN"

is a true story of the life of Marquis Ito. The Japanese houses, gardens, properties, costumes—and many of the actors—shown in this production are THE REAL THING, and we confidently predict that it will be considered one of the most novel and praiseworthy pictures of the year.

Stories of the Films.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE TRICK THAT FAILED.—"Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them." With Nellie Burt greatness was thrust upon her, but it was indeed transitory. Nellie is an artist struggling for fame, at the expense of a vacancy in the digestive region. It cannot be said that she was not possessed of a sensitive pneumogastric nerve, but she had a will power that proved an anesthetic to the pangs of hunger. Painting after painting does she finish and carry to the art dealer, but he gently tries to dissuade her by showing a stack of her work with still no purchasers. Still she persists. Now Billy Hart, a successful artist, sees her plight, and being desperately in love with her, proposes marriage, as does also Hans Kessler, another artist. Nellie, however, is wedded to art, and declines Billy's offer, stating that she will not consider his very flattering offer until she has sold pictures enough to establish her fame. An idea strikes Billy. He will make her famous by the following scheme: He enlists the services of several friends, his housekeeper and valet, giving them money to buy up the stock of Nellie's paintings at the art dealer, and when the dealer turns over to Nell her share, she feels that she is at last great, so goes to Billy's studio to tell him of her good fortune, and inclined to accept his proposal. All would have gone well for Billy had not the awkwardness of his valet exposed to view the pile of paintings. Nell realizes the deception perpetrated, and flies into a rage. Leaving the place with the exclamation, "You'll not make a fool of me!" she goes to her own atelier, where she accepts Kessler, who calls shortly after.

IN THE WINDOW RECESS.—Never was mortal placed in a more terrible and perplexing position than the woman in this story. Practically between two fires, she is forced to submissively receive the taunts of a suspicious husband, backed up by convincing evidence, in order to save her child's life. Police Officer Wallace leaves his house for his post, to learn that a desperate convict had broken prison and was lurking in the neighborhood. This convict, dashing into the Wallace home, seizes the little child, and with pistol in hand hides in the recess of the window, with the injunction to Mrs. Wallace that if she reveals his hiding place her child will suffer. The officer returning home, finds the convict's hat on the floor, and noticing his wife's agitation, of course suspects she has entertained someone in his absence. He proceeds to make a search, and pounces upon the convict so suddenly that he fails to carry out his theory. Hence, taken unawares, he is overpowered, handcuffed, and handed over to the prison guards to be reincarcerated.

THE DEATH DISC.—A Story of the Cromwellian Period. In the early part of the seventeenth century, England was in a state of turgid excitement. Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector of the English Commonwealth, was assiduous in his persecution of those who defiantly adhered to Catholicism. Few there were who had the temerity to openly profess their religious views, for such profession invariably meted execution. The Catholics, therefore, were forced to worship in secret. Many historians claim that while Cromwell was persistent in this persecution, he did it rather to satisfy his constituents than through the dictates of his own conscience. Spies on every hand industriously reported every exhibition of Catholic fervor, and the Lord Protector was forced to accede to their tacit demands. Three soldiers are discovered as adherents to the faith and are imprisoned awaiting Cromwell's sentence. A respite, however, is offered them that they should cast lots and one would be executed, allowing the other two to return to the ranks of their own following to spread the warning among those true to the Church of Rome. This they refuse to do, so Cromwell sends for a child, the first the guards may meet, to be the messenger of life or death to the condemned, and by a strange fatality he obtained the child of one of the soldiers. The child is brought before Cromwell, and its presence prevents him striking down his best friend in a fit of anger. He is so impressed with the little one, particularly as it revives memories of his own dead child, that he presents it with his signet ring, promising to obey any command of hers invoked by its aid. Three discs are to determine which should live or die, and, childlike, she decides to give her father the prettiest, "The Death Disc," thus condemning her own father to death. The soldiers who return the child to her mother are moved to compassion and tell the poor woman the value of the signet ring. Through this she saves her husband on the eve of the execution and Cromwell redeemed his promise.

THE HEART OF A CLOWN.—This picture portrays a day in the life of a clown who is proprietor of a small traveling circus in Europe. His favorite daughter is critically ill, and combined with his duties as the fun-maker at the show, is that of nursing the sick child. His elder daughter is also a member of the troop. With his two children and his devoted wife he lives in a large dressing tent pitched at the edge of the arena. Here is indicated the story of the picture. We see the circus arrive, to the great joy of the villagers. Then we see the little girl carried on her couch out of the wagon. As the film is unreeled we witness a varied and interesting circus performance, the clown, as usual, being the cause of hilarity. There are acrobatic turns by clever performers and some wonderful tricks done by extremely well trained animals. The effect upon the assembled villagers is interesting to note, the clown's work eliciting the greatest applause.

We, who are by means of the camera permitted to witness the other side of the clown's life in the interior of his "home," see the suffering and parental anxiety of the man. This is the whole theme of the picture. The poor fellow, faithful to his work, goes through his act with well-simulated gayety and enthusiasm, though his heart is breaking from fear and anxiety over his little girl.

In addition to worrying over the illness of one child, a little incident, which occurs in the circus ring, shows that the father has a watchful eye where his pretty elder daughter is concerned. The ending of the picture is a happy one and we see the departure of the circus. The man who has interested us leaves for new fields with a happy smile that is not altogether assumed.

The picture should not fail to amuse the children, and the blending of comedy and pathos is sure to carry weight with the older people.

THE WONDERFUL ELECTRO-MAGNET.—An inventive genius discovers a magnet that will attract human beings. It is operated by means of a lever. He demonstrates his invention to a moving picture man, who, impressed with its possibilities for boosting his waning business, places it near the box-office of his theater with amazing results.

A young minister, whose bishop has requested him to do something to increase his congregation, passes the moving picture house about that time and is caught by the magnet. Apologies and explanations follow. He has a brilliant idea and induces the inventor to accompany him to his church, where they try the scheme at the door. The result is highly satisfactory, as every passer-by is attracted to the interior of the church, willing or otherwise.

The comedy of the picture is farcical and hilarious without in any way offending. It will prove immensely entertaining to both young and old.

TWO SIDES TO A STORY.—There are always two sides to a story, and the price of deceit is oftentimes severe repentance. Mr. Billiken looked for a wife of good family, and got her. Mr. Billiken needed someone to care for his seven small children—but he didn't say anything about the children until after he had married.

It happened this way. Mr. Billiken had had a strenuous Summer in caring for the seven younger Billikens and he needed a rest. Leaving the seven in care of a trusty nursemaid, Billiken goes to the seashore, where he meets Mrs. Mary Moore, a winsome young widow, with whom he falls violently in love. Not thinking of the seven at home, Billiken proposes and is accepted.

Now it happens, as we have said before, that there are two sides to a story, and the price of deceit is oftentimes severe repentance. Mrs. Moore is the mother of six small children, but it did not occur to her to tell Billiken, or that he might object to her having so many.

Billiken goes home, looks his seven over, shakes his head dubiously, and decides to wait until after the marriage before telling the bride. Mrs. Moore also thinks it advisable to refrain from mentioning her offspring until after the wedding, and so both remain in the dark concerning each other's children.

The marriage takes place; Billiken goes home to make ready to welcome his bride to her new home. The seven ply him with questions regarding their future mother, until, conscience-smitten, he decides to take the whole tribe of them to Mary and tell her all about them.

When the new Mrs. Billiken returns to her home the six greet her with curious questions concerning their new dad, all expressing their desire to make his acquaintance. A little frightened, she bundles them all out of the house and starts toward her new home.

The families meet half way. The shock is a terrible one, of course.

"William," sobs Mrs. Billiken, "I have deceived you—forgive me!"

"Mary, neither had I fully explained," says Billiken, taking her in his arms and commenting on the side as he looks around at the small multitude, "Gosh—what a bunch of kids!"

The youngsters see the joke and forming a ring encircle the "Newlyweds" in the frolicsome game of "ring-around-the-rosy."

Deciding to make the best of it, Mr. and Mrs. Billiken, accompanied by the thirteen, make for the Billiken home, wondering despairingly how they will care for the throng of young folk.

BABY SWALLOWED A NICKEL.—"The baby swallowed a nickel! Send for a doctor, quick!"

There is nothing that so upsets the peaceful routine of happy domesticity as when some accident befalls Baby.

In this case, however, the trouble was all for nothing. Baby did not swallow a nickel. It was like this.

Every morning before young Daddy Brown leaves home he gives his three-year-old baby her daily allowance of five cents for her savings bank. Not being so favored, sister Nellie of six becomes insanely jealous and conspires to steal the baby's nickel the very first opportunity. She carries out the plan, and a few minutes later Mrs. Brown finds the baby on the floor in the library, sobbing her eyes out, the nickel missing. Baby offers no explanation when the frightened mother asks her where the nickel went to, and Mrs. Brown concludes that she must have swallowed it.

In the greatest excitement she calls the maid and tells her to send for a doctor, while she will go to the 'phone and call her husband. The maid rushes out, tells the butler and sends him off in an opposite direction. She meets the mailman on the step and he is pressed into service. The butler encounters the neighborhood policeman and he is urged to hurry for a doctor. The butcher-boy also volunteers to find a doctor, and last of all Mrs. Brown rushes out to summon medical aid.

It is not long before the M.Ds. arrive, one after the other, six of them. Baby is examined by each one; a funny consultation is held, the doctors all wrangling over how to get the nickel out.

The affair ends, however, when sister Nellie appears on the scene, a bag of candy in her hand. She finally explains that it was she who took the nickel and that Baby didn't swallow it at all.

The doctors leave in disgust and Nellie gets a spanking and is made to endure the torture of watching her baby sister eat the candy.

This little comedy, although touching on the farcical, is drawn true to life and should win the enthusiastic applause of every child and mother who views it. The photography is exceptionally good.

HIS REFORMATION.—Tom Carlton, leader of a band of Western bandits, tires of his life of crime and resolves to reform. Calling his band together, he tells them of his desire to be an honest man and advises them to follow in his steps. Although a recognized "road-agent," Carlton had never been convicted and went his way among the people without fear of arrest.

Carlton finds that a resolution to be good is the first and easiest step in the reformation of a sinner. He applies for work on a ranch, but is refused because of his shady character. He wanders about the country and finally applies for a job at a mine. He works there until he is recognized as the former bandit and is again driven away. Disgusted and in despair, he wanders away, resolving to return to the old life. Making his way along the stage road, he stops to watch the coach go by. It carries many passengers, all of whom appear to be exceedingly prosperous. He resolves to hold up the coach and, stealing a horse from a cowboy, he gallops off after the coach. By a short cut he heads off the stage coach and at a lonely spot on the trail, leaps from behind a rock and commands the driver to throw up his hands. All the passengers, panic-stricken, file down from the coach and line up in a row, ready to deliver their valuables to him. He does not see the old lady on the end, so busily is he kept watching the others, and with gun ready for instant discharge he exacts tribute from the travelers. The old lady at the end holds out her purse, when the outlaw drops his gun and staggers back.

"Mother!"

Tom Carlton, outlaw, drops on his knees, tears off his mask and hides his face in his mother's skirts. The poor old lady recognizes her son, drags him to his feet and puts her arms about him. The surprised tourists are stunned at the sudden turn of events, but move discreetly away while the poor old mother and her wayward son go to each other's arms.

GAUMONT.

(George Kleine.)

IN THE CONSOMME.—Mr. Sokeup is a short-sighted, apoplectic old gentleman, with a ravenous appetite. Getting impatient because his dinner is delayed, he bounces into the kitchen and orders the servant to serve the soup at once. Bridget accidentally drops a sponge into the soup tureen. Mr. Sokeup hastily proceeds to scoop the contents of the soup bowl into his plate, gulping down huge mouthfuls of the steaming broth. He swallows the sponge which Bridget had inadvertently dropped in. It commences to swell, expand and dilate. Physicians are called in and a rapid consultation is held. Various operations are attempted, but none afford any relief. The patient's life is despaired of. He is put to bed and left alone. At this moment two burglars happen to break in at the window of the sick-room, and, perceiving that the patient has noticed their presence and is likely to call for help, they rush at him and one of them plunges a knife into poor Mr. Sokeup's anatomy, right in the very spot where the sponge is located. The effect is miraculous. The distended sponge gives up the oceans of liquid which it has absorbed and a tremendous fountain shoots up and continues to play with unabated energy. The burglars are completely overcome. The doctors and friends rush in. Umbrellas are hoisted. Waterproof cloth is spread, and everybody is drenched to the skin. Mr. Sokeup is the first member of the party to recover. He now enjoys better health than ever.

THE BROKEN VASE.—Mr. Charles Robertson, a young man of social prominence, who is invited to dinner at the home of his future father-in-law, decides to present the old gentleman with a costly piece of china, knowing him to be a collector of bric-a-brac. Going to the leading crockery store in the city, he purchases a valuable vase, but as he is about to pay for it, the salesman lets it drop, breaking it into fragments. Charlie conceives the bright idea of buying the broken pieces cheap and does so, giving careful instructions for them to be wrapped up in such a manner as to look as if the vase had been broken by the delivery man on the way. Unfortunately, however, through accident or design, the china packer wraps up each fragment in a separate sheet of paper. This, of course, told its own story plainer than words to the astonished old gentleman, who, instead of expressing his gratitude to Mr. Robinson for his kind present, explodes with wrathful indignation and has the generous donor forcibly ejected from the house.

HOW TO GET A CITY JOB.—Tom Jones, a poor laboring man, is out of employment and aspires to a city job, to secure good pay and not too hard work for the rest of his life. He notices announcements posted on the walls of the town hall, stating that there are some vacant positions for street cleaners. He makes a personal application. There he is given a printed statement of the requisite qualifications for the job in question, which he takes home and studies. He finds that he must have a wife and four children. With all possible speed he marries and raises a family of the required number. Next, he must be able to show a school certificate of proficiency in his studies. This necessitates his attending school with his own children as fellow pupils. He shows great aptitude and graduates with honors. Then he must have been a noncommissioned officer in the army. This entails enlistment and long service, but he gets there all right. Finally, he must prove that he is a good Republican, which he does by parading the streets with his wife and children on Independence Day, waving flags and shouting lustily. After all this course of preparation he succeeds in passing the examination successfully, and we then see him seated at a table "celebrating" his appointment with some other successful candidates.

X-RAY GLASSES.—Grandfather gets a pair of magic spectacles, which he claims to possess the miraculous power of showing the tastes and inclinations of the person who puts them on. There are present at the time a large family gathering—father, mother, sons and daughters, and grandchildren—and each member of the party in turn puts on the spectacles. Then we see on the curtain all that is passing in the mind of the wearer clearly portrayed in each eye, just as if we were looking through opera glasses.

G. MELIES.

FORTUNE FAVORS THE BRAVE.—A young lad, the son of poor parents, goes out in search of a treasure which has been concealed for many years. He has been warned in advance that he will have to sacrifice much to come into possession of the fortune. Being full of spirit and ambition, nothing can hold him back, and he sets out. Luckily a genie guides him in the right direction and notwithstanding all trials and tribulations he gains his goal. He fights with dragons and other animals, who have killed many men seeking the fortune, but the young boy exhibits such marvelous strength and bravery that he vanquishes the defenders of the fortune. His efforts are crowned with success, and he returns home with enough gold to make his parents happy forever.

SEEIN' THINGS.—A young man who had been out all night wends his way homeward. Of course, his spending a whole night with "the boys" results in his drinking more than he is physically able to carry. When he arrives at the door of his house, he tries to find the keyhole. He imagines the lock to be on every part of the door. Sometimes he sees two locks and other times more. When he does finally find the lock and opens the door he tumbles into his apartment. There he gets a warm reception from his wife. Soon he imagines that all house furnishings are double. He sees just twice as many things as really exist. Even when the servant comes in he thinks there are two of them. Before long he gets into an argument with her and he chases her around the room. In trying to escape from him, she jumps from a window and he comes after her. He falls on the pavement below, while she falls on a hook and is seen hanging from it.

PATHE FRERES.

THE CROCODILE HUNT.—The swish-swish of the water, which flows along under the shade of the banana trees, is heard as the deft hand of one of the natives propels the low flat boat through the stream while the others with long lines of thick wire held tightly in their hands keep their eyes fastened on the water, anxiously waiting for a long lark pointed head to make its appearance. They have not long to wait. The waters in Java are filled with crocodiles of all sizes, and as soon as the dark object appears, with practiced hand the native snares the upper jaw of the lizardlike creature with his long thick wire line and drags him, along with several others caught during this trip, to the shore. There they are thrown in a heap on the ground, but before the natives have time to sort them out and arrange them on long sticks one of the wily fellows still alive and kicking undertakes to have a hand-to-hand fight with his neighbor lying alongside of him. When the natives become aware of the commotion they make a rush for the belligerent pair and after some difficulty succeed in separating them. In the next view the crocodiles are bound to long sticks by their legs and are carried off on the shoulders of the natives. The beautiful scaly skins of these reptiles so much in demand bring enormous sums.

LATE FOR THE RECITAL.—Professor Borceno is at his home composing some difficult masterpiece, while his daughter and her best beloved sit together, only wishing that papa would make himself scarce. His daughter knows he has an engagement to play at a concert and is looking forward to a nice afternoon with her admirer. They help the old man on with his coat and bid him a happy good-bye, but hardly has he been gone ten minutes before he is back looking for a roll of music which his daughter, thinking some old scrap paper, has thrown in the basket. The daughter's beau has to make a hasty exit out of the window, as her father has forbidden her to entertain young men unless he is at home. During the young fellow's enforced occupancy of the balcony he sees a curious female hanging out of her window and immediately begins flirting with her. The woman, pleased with the youth's attention, throws him out a sheet, which he catches and by means of which he climbs to her apartment. He is having a nice little visit with his new acquaintance, who is entertaining him with her violin, when a knock comes to the door and he has to jump out of the window again in a hurry. Who should the intruder be but papa, the professor, who, with his usual luck, has met with an accident on his way to the recital, in which his fine old violin is smashed to smithereens by an automobile running at full speed. Knowing the lady to be an amateur violinst, he has come in his distress to borrow her fiddle. She gives it to him and then goes to call her almirer back; but the latter has taken advantage of this opportunity to go down the improvised ladder to see his lady love below. She is overjoyed to see him and they are billing and cooing when papa comes on the scene again; he was just two hours late for the concert, so he has been discharged and comes in very much depressed in spirits. While he stands ringing at the door, dejection written all over him, the beau is quickly gotten into one of the maid's dresses and with an automobile veil tied around his head begs for alms as the master of the house enters; and the daughter, with pity in her voice, makes her father give the poor "woman" a generous donation.

THE SLEEPER.—Rap-a-tap, rap-a-tap-tap, the village drummer summons the country folk to hear a proclamation of a most interesting character. Professor Bunbar, the world-renowned hypnotist, has decided to honor the little old town with his presence. When they hear the news the good people clap their hands with joy and decide one and all to take in the show. They start out in an ancient looking vehicle, smiling and happy as children. Professor Bunbar at first fails to impress them with his wise look and airs, and they laugh heartily at his high-sounding speeches, but at the same time watch him with interest as he hypnotizes the lady who assists him. Big, jolly Nell, one of the most popular matrons in the village, sits with a mocking smile on her lips as the Professor makes mysterious passes over the woman's head. Soon a change comes over Nell, however, and her neighbors notice that her eyes have closed and that she is breathing heavily as if in a deep sleep. They all clamor for the Professor, who laughing at their fears goes over to Nell and breathes softly on her but with not the slightest bit of effect—Nell still sleeps on. The country people then get alarmed and each in turn comes and blows in Nell's face. But it is of no use—they have to carry her home, where she remains in a trance for months. Her husband, at his wits' end, finally has a bright idea; why not turn his misfortune to some account, and let the country-side come to look at Nell for fifty cents a head? What a thought! In a month's time they have moved into a magnificent house, richly furnished, with the money they made on Nell, who still sleeps on, notwithstanding the change in her fortunes. But one day as the weighty sleeper rests on her rich, beautiful bed and her husband sits at the table counting his money, Nell awakens and for a moment is stunned at the change in everything. But her hunger soon overcomes her curiosity and they have to give her dinner enough for ten before she is satisfied. The old husband, though, sees that this awakening of his spouse Nell is not quite such a matter for rejoicing as his friends would have him think. He has become interested in this "Sleeping Beauty" business, and realizing that there is much more money to be made out of it decides to impersonate "Nell, the Sleeping Beauty," himself. He carries out his plan satisfactorily, although one of his friends almost breaks the whole thing up by going into convulsions on seeing his old friend in dainty nightcap stretched out on the bed as the curious crowd take a look and with awe written on their faces slowly pass out.

A CONVENIENT LAMP-POST.—Soppington is unfortunate in not knowing when to stop when he takes a social glass with a friend, and this is why we see him a little bit the worse for wear being hastily and not very ceremoniously shown to the door of a well-known cafe. Two thugs who were witnesses of Soppington's ignominious treatment at the hands of the proprietor of the cafe, follow him as he picks himself up on the sidewalk and assist him to a nearby lamp-post, where they safely anchor him by removing his coat and then putting it on again, not forgetting to envelop the lamp-post as well as Soppington's poor bruised body in its comfortable folds. After having so solicitously seen to his welfare and having thoughtfully removed all his valuables in case any unscrupulous person should come along and rob the helpless man, the thugs start off and leave poor Soppington squirming and wriggling in a vain effort to get away. Finally, completely worn out and exhausted, he drops on the pavement and there becomes the prey of the most terrible hallucinations. The innocent-looking lamp-post becomes like an active volcano—long tongues of flame begin to leap out of it and the spectator is treated to a splendid pyrotechnic exhibition, the creation of Soppington's brain. The poor fellow sits helpless on the ground while a golden shower of rain pours over him. When this is over the flag pavement with its white and black stones turns into the keyboard of a piano, and Soppington's fingers growing to a convenient size to suit conditions deftly perform with most wonderful technique, notwithstanding the strained and uncomfortable position of their owner. When this is over the lamp-post begins to sway and our friend goes right through a window of the restaurant at the corner, but strange to say comes out again intact. His arms then lengthen out like huge loaves of French bred, and profiting by the advantage this gives him he stretches over and opens the wine store and helps himself to a bottle of good old vintage. Finally, the top of the lamp-post breaks off and the gas immediately ignites, and it looks as if our poor friend would be burnt alive; but the fire engines are on hand, and the last we see of Soppington he is being carried away by two officers of the law, still fastened tightly to the lamp-post.

THE BIGAMIST.—Horace Dufrane, a young medical student, meets in his student days a sweet, pretty girl with whom he falls desperately in love and whom he marries secretly. They are as happy as the days are long in their modest little home, and as time goes on are blessed by the sweetest of little baby girls. At this time Dufrane's parents (who knew nothing of their son's marriage) believing it time for him to take a wife, do all they can to bring about a marriage between him and the daughter of one of their wealthy friends. Now Horace, though truly devoted to his wife, is selfish, and seeing the difficulties in his path should he proclaim his marriage to the humble girl, decides to desert his wife and child and marry the heiress. Four years after their marriage he gets an appeal from his first wife, who has battled during this time against all sorts of hardships in an effort to support her little daughter and herself. Not having the money for her rent, she becomes desperate, and gathering her husband's photograph and other valued souvenirs of their happy life together, she writes him a note and tells him she can no longer keep up the battle. She carries it herself with the other treasures to the residence of the rising young physician. She leaves them at the door with the maid and then hastens to the water front to make away with herself. Fortunately she is seen as she plunges from the bridge and her rescuers bringing her to the shore take her to the hospital where as luck would have it her former husband is one of the attending physicians. When the latter goes in to examine the patient, accompanied by some of the younger doctors and nurses he starts as if struck and motions them to leave him alone on recognizing the sweet worn face of his first love, whom he deserted. Clasping her in his arms, he tries to revive her, but his repentance has come too late. With one look of reproach she passes away in his arms.

In the meantime in the physician's palatial home another drama is being enacted. When the maid hands the doctor's wife the bundle left at the door by the poor desprate creature, the former opens it and with a nobility of character not often seen decides almost immediately after reading the mother's last message, to adopt the child as her own. The scene at the deserted wife's grave where the true noble woman who supplanted her, holds the little motherless one by the hand, while the father, now repentant, strains it to his breast, is more than touching.

THE MIXED LETTERS.—Arthur has been caught by the little winged fellow again and as is always the case with this susceptible youth, his last enchantress seems to be the "only one." After writing a passionate love letter to his new love, he dashes off a few cruel lines to his old sweetheart to let her know that his love has grown cold. In his anxiety to arrange matters between the old and the new as soon as possible, Arthur gets the letters mixed and the old love's goes to the new love and vice versa. The mistake brings joy to the old love, who on receiving the passionate outpourings of her adorer quickly desses and decides to pay him a visit. When she bounces in on him as he is comfortably reading at home he is transfixed with amazement.

Of a truth, pandemonium is the result. The wives, horrified, with skirts drawn tight and ankles doing a Comanche war dance, such as was never danced before, rush to their husbands, beseeching them to exterminate the pests. At first, husbands are indignant and refuse, but upon further pleading

We Are Here to Stay

Gradually we are gaining the confidence of the moving picture exhibitors of Greater New York by our open business methods; exhibitors who heretofore, were skeptical as to the reliability of the Independent products: exhibitors who, time and again, have been buncoed and cheated by unscrupulous men operating under the guise of Independent film exchanges. It is a conceded fact that no exchange can expect to thrive, or even exist, unless it buys a quantity of new films each and every week and which is not being done by many so called Independent exchanges in Greater New York. Don't let them shove their old and worn-out junk unto you any longer. You don't have to because we stand ready to supply you with a real live, genuine up-to-the minute Independent service at the right price.

When she explains and shows him the letter he immediately realizes what has happened and rushing for the door thinks only of stopping the other letter before his angel one gets it. Now Arthur though weak where the fair sex is concerned shows a mulish determination when set upon accomplishing anything. At the post-office he is treated with very little consideration. They tell him the letter cannot now be stopped, as such a thing would be tampering with the mails, which is unlawful. Setting his teeth, Arthur goes to the station and through dogged determination gets into the mail train, but when it arrives at its destination he is discovered and thrown out in a most unceremonious way; all his pleadings being in vain. Tattered and torn, he follows the postman on his rounds, and at the very door of his loved one's home he falls on his knees and with tears streaming down his face begs for the letter, but the letter-carrier is adamant. The maid takes in the missive as the girl with her family are sitting together in the library. Just after it has been read and indignation and rage is depicted on everybody's countenance Arthur appears in the doorway, a cringing ragged pitiful picture. Needless to say the girl's father hustles him right off the premises, never giving him the faintest ghost of a chance to explain.

CHINESE AMUSEMENTS.—The cunning fat Chinese boys stand smiling waiting for the signal to start their stunts. The juggling done by the little fellows to the sound of the kettle-drum, is most clever. The little woman equilibrist does the most astounding things in the way of balancing barrels, tables, etc., on the soles of her tiny feet. The cutest fellow of all is the chubby little urchin who plays diabolo for us, followed by another wee chap wearing the most serious of expressions as he stands on a table and slowly raises one foot and presses that member to the side of his head as if it was the easiest thing in the world to do. The Chinese band is most interesting also. In fact, the entire picture is well worth seeing.

SPANISH MARRIAGE.—A laughable situation brought about by the meeting of a handsome Frenchman and a fickle Spanish girl, who returns to her old love after marrying the new.

The opening scene is a cafe in a hotel where some Spanish adventurers are gathered about a table drinking. Marie, the daughter of one of these adventurers, is sitting at a table flirting with her fiance, Pepito. But on the entrance of a stunning looking stranger Marie loses interest in her fiance and begins to make eyes at the handsome new arrival. Pepito pouts, but Marie soothes him with sweet words, as she knows it would not help her plans with her new admirer to have Pepito lose his temper. As time goes on, this little harmless flirtation between Marie and the foreigner becomes a serious love affair and the couple finally get married. But the very night of the ceremony we see the bride waiting at the door of their apartment looking anxiously down the hall as if on the lookout for someone, and when her husband questions her she answers with a wave of the hand that she's just expecting a friend. The husband is naturally annoyed at her indifference on the very first day of their wedded life, but when he sees that the friend is no other than Pepito he becomes justly indignant and a struggle ensues between the two men. Marie tries to interfere, but the butler appearing at that moment, at a sign from Marie's husband, pushes Pepito and the girl through the window right out on the greensward below. The picture is full of local color and gives one an idea how lightly these pleasure-loving people look upon the more serious things of life.

A BUNCH OF LILACS.—Two children are caught stealing lilacs from the park, but on showing that they were gathering the flowers for their dead mother's grave are not punished, but taken home and adopted by the kind-hearted veteran and his sweet-faced wife.

A little brother and sister, only recently made orphans by the death of their well-loved mother, are anxious to decorate her grave; but possessing no money with which to purchase flowers they make up their minds to appropriate some of the beautiful blossoms in one of the public parks. We see the poorly clad little ones hand-in-hand tiptoeing down one of the walks in the park, looking from side to side on the watch for the park policeman. Soon they come upon a lilac bush heavily laden with the sweet-smelling purple flowers, and rushing over they start to work with a will until in a very few minutes the little arms are full. Now the pathetic little pair have not, as they believe, escaped the attention of the old watchman; in fact, his curiosity has been aroused by their suspicious conduct and he decides to follow them. He comes upon them just as they have decided that they can carry no more of the beautiful blossoms and are preparing to hurry off to the cemetery. Angry at the idea that anyone should so despoil the city's property, the watchman roughly handles the little brother and sister. The former manages to wriggle himself free from the old man's grasp and rushes away, but the little girl is not so fortunate, and finally, with tears in her eyes, confesses to the kind-hearted old man that they stole the flowers for their mother's grave. Then pulling him gently by the arm, leads him off to the cemetery, where they find the little brother kneeling beside the mound, now completely covered with lilacs. This scene has such an effect upon the watchman that he takes the orphans to his own home, where his good wife agrees with him that they must adopt the children for their very own.

THE WOLF HUNT.—A Western episode. The wolf who steals a child leads the cowboys a wild chase before he pays the penalty with his life.

The last picture shows Mr. Wolf's fine head mounted on the stump of a tree.

LEGEND OF ORPHEUS.—A beautifully colored film of the ancient Greek myth, showing Orpheus in his descent into Hades in an effort to regain his dead wife, Eurydice.

Orpheus, poet and musician of Thrace, son of Apollo and of the nymph Calliope, possessed a magnificent voice with which he captivated not only the animals, and plants, but even the very stones. On returning to Thrace after the expedition of the Argonauts, in which he took part, he marries the nymph Eurydice. After some time he loses his wife, and applying to the King of the Infernal Regions in his despair he implores the latter to restore her to him. The Master of Hades being touched by the broken-hearted husband's appeal, restores Eurydice to Orpheus on condition that the latter will not try to look upon her face until he regains earth. Although the condition imposed is a most difficult one, Orpheus carries it out to the letter until they have almost regained the region of light, when, at the earnest request of Eurydice, he turns and looks at his loved one. Immediately she is torn from his arms, and his grief is terrible to witness. But on the intervention of Cupid she is restored to his arms and the grateful pair return to earth with joy in their hearts.

THE THREE NEIGHBORS.—How an undesirable suitor wins out with his sweetheart's father by restoring his stolen watch, which the young man finds when in the act of hanging himself.

A man and a girl occupying the same apartment house spend a good deal of their time hanging out of their respective windows billing and cooing to their heart's content. Another tenant in the same building, of a curious turn of mind, gets lots of fun hanging out of his window and listening to the lovers' nonsense. One fine day, however, the girl's father catches her flirting with the young man next door and takes her severely to task and sends her off to her room weeping. The curious neighbor hearing angry voices below decides that something interesting is transpiring, so lets himself out of his window, and when he reaches the one below peeps in to see what is going on. The girl's father is seated before his safe counting his money, of which there are great piles all around him. The curious neighbor's eyes glisten at the sight of so much wealth. The old man, with a smile of satisfaction on his old, wrinkled face, sits fingering the precious coin, when all of a sudden a sound from his daughter's room attracts him and, jumping up hastily, he leaves the room. This is the curious neighbor's chance. Without losing a minute he jumps in the window and carries off all the coin and notes he can carry and makes a hasty retreat to his own quarters, where he hides his ill-gotten treasure beneath the flooring.

Now the lover of the young girl on the ground floor is making an elaborate toilet preparatory to visiting her father and boldly pressing his suit. When he reaches the domains of his beloved one, he finds everyone in a great state of excitement. The miserly father has just discovered that he has been robbed and is frantic with grief over his misfortune. When he catches a glimpse of his would-be son-in-law at such an inopportune moment the sight seems to increase his rage, and he rushes at him and throws him out of the place. The disappointed and heart-broken lover returns to his rooms, where he decides to make away with himself, and we soon see him swinging to the gas fixture. In a twinkling, however, the gas fixture loosens and the ceiling comes down, and with it a shower of gold (the spoil of the tenant over him who hid the old man's money under the flooring). Dazed for a minute, he gathers it together and realizing in a sort of hazy way that this must be the old man's wealth that was stolen he hurries back with it to the owner, who, of course, has now only words of gratitude to bestow on him. But the lover does not want the old gent's gratitude; he wants his daughter, and he gets her as a reward for his honesty.

FORCED INTO MARRIAGE.—The atmosphere of the West permeates this picture of cowboys, bad men, mustangs and Indians. A vivid portrait of life on the frontier.

This picture opens with a cowboy's camp. A young girl belonging to the camp is seen going for a pail of water, accompanied by a child. As she leans over the stream to fill her pail, some "bad men" who are riding by grab her, fasten her securely to one of their horses and ride off. The child, however, escapes. The girl is carried off to a deserted cabin and tied to one of the posts which support the veranda, where the men sit drinking and playing cards. Before very long the wine takes effect and soon all but one are down and out. This one then carries off the girl to the house of a nearby dominie and they get spliced. In the meantime the kid has found his way back to the camp and the cowboys are soon on a "gumshoe hunt" for the bad men and follow their track to the deserted cabin, which they thoroughly shoot up, killing the two desperados who are left, but finding no trace of the girl and her companion. The two latter have subsequently settled down in their own home, where the cowboys finally discover them by accident, and though a fight threatens, all is amicably settled and great rejoicing ensues.

BROUGHT TO TERMS.—Couple by couple, a party of henpecked husbands, with their wives, call upon Mr. Brown, another who is domineered by his wife. Upon their entering Brown's residence, we note that each overawed husband is likewise overweighted with his muchly multiplied progeny.

Now, the object of these ladies calling on Mrs. Brown is to discuss the woman question, and the ways and means wherewith to rule their husbands in a manner even more effective than they have hitherto done.

With utter lack of ceremony, our gentlemen friends, still carrying their children, are unceremoniously rushed into a room adjoining that wherein the meeting is to be held. They are dejected at the treatment thus received, and while the wives are in debate as to the proper procedure to further intimidate their spouses, one of the gentlemen conceives an idea whereby, he tells his co-mates, he can subjugate these termagant better-halves. His friends are all excitement as he makes his hurried departure through a window. He rushes to the city rat-catcher's place nearby and purchases a trap full of rats, and immediately returns to his now semi-delighted friends, exhibits his rats, then cautiously opening the door between the two rooms, lets the rats escape from the trap among the still altercating and debating women.

Needless to say, the wives carried the children, for the rats had won the day.

MAKING IT PLEASANT FOR HIM.—Miss Van Astorbilt is a widow lady with a retinue of servants. She has long promised one of her cousins, a large youth who lives on a farm near Lonesomhurst, L. I., to have him visit her in her New York home.

The long expected day arrives. We see Reuben receive a telegram: "Dear Cousin—Call down at 3, and we will make it pleasant for you." But Miss Van Astorbilt is called away. The servants are instructed to act for her. This does not suit the servants, as they are preparing for the yearly Housemaids' Masquerade; they resent Reuben's intrusion, but decide to obey Madame and make it pleasant for him. And they do.

AN INDIAN WIFE'S DEVOTION.—We are first shown an Indian village on the vast plains of the West. Little Wolf, chief of a band of roving Sioux, has purchased a fine horse. When he reaches camp a half-breed member of the tribe is very much taken with the animal and tries to secure him, but the chief is obdurate. The half-breed finally offers his squaw, a saddle and two blankets to no avail. Then, in his rage at failing to make the trade, brutally ill-treats the wife, who stoically receives her lord and master's blows without resentment. The next day a ranch owner arrives at the Indian camp, and his offer for Little Wolf's horse is more alluring than the half-breed's, and he departs with the horse, to the half-breed's chagrin. Determined to make one more effort to secure the equine, the half-breed loads his squaw with a large sack of beadwork, and we next find them in front of the ranch owner's home. Again he fails, and in his anger attempts to carry off a jug of whiskey and an overcoat. The owner returns and the miscreant gets a sound thrashing. Revenge is his one idea now, and he takes it in a very cowardly fashion. Filled with remorse, he returns to his squaw, and in the confines of their narrow home tells her of his crime. The ranch owner finds a dead horse in his stable yard the next day, and also a piece of cloth that has evidently been torn from the sleeve of a coat as its wearer passed through the bars. One of his herders recognizes the cloth as having come from the coat of the half-breed. A posse is organized, and the camp is visited. The half-breed's guilt is established and the sheriff is sent for, a guard being placed over the half-breed in his tepee. It is here we witness the acme of devotion. The half-breed is cowering in terror, but his squaw has been thinking, and her brain has evolved a plan for saving her husband. "Quick, Fire Lightning, you must take my clothes, and as a squaw leave the lodge; I will be you, and when the white law comes he can take me to the jail corral." Imagine the sheriff's astonishment when he starts to handcuff the prisoner the ranch herders have guarded so carefully to find that it is the wife and the half-breed's clothes that he has arrested, while the culprit is far on his way to the Bad Lands, where pursuit is useless. The ranch owner refuses to prosecute the squaw.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine.)

BELLE OF THE HARVEST.—Harvesting operations and exquisite views of romantic rural scenery form the setting of this sound moral-teaching picture story of a peasant and his wife, whose failings almost result in the wrecking of a peaceful home. The vain woman is charmed with a shawl, which she purchases against the expressed commands of her husband; disobedience leads to an angry quarrel.

The man leaves home and become enamoured of a pretty girl, whom he had previously met in the harvest field. Love passages between the couple are detected, and the resultant village gossip reaches the ears of the peasant's wife. Taking her children she goes in search of her husband and proves the truth of the rumors. A dramatic scene follows. The wife confronts the pair, and states her case to the pretty harvest girl, who had never suspected the peasant of being already married. She firmly teaches him his duty, and the shutter falls upon a touching scene of reconciliation.

MARRIAGE OF LOVE.—So perfect in every detail that absolutely no explanation is necessary to a complete understanding of every phase of the story.

Briefly, we are introduced to the hero, a stalwart youth, in front of his father's home at a time when a wealthy neighbor is attempting to secure him as a son-in-law. The elderly man makes several proffers, finally even offers a large sum of money. The youth, however, refuses each proposal.

Next we see him with his sweetheart by a beautiful mountain stream where they are wont to meet.

Again he is at home, where his father and the neighbor again try to persuade him to marry against his will. After an angry discussion, he is disowned by his father, leaves his old parents, goes to the home of his sweetheart, and soon after is married.

Ten years of ill fortune pass, the faithful wife suffering cheerfully the pangs of poverty with him and their little daughter.

The film is brought to a beautiful close after his death by the little family being reconciled to his now forgiving father through the medium of the child's love.

FIGHTING SUFFRAGETTES.—Two ardent female voting enthusiasts, who are engaged in posting bills, get into an argument which leads to one challenging the other to a duel. Each suffragette secures her "second" and they then proceed to the gunsmith's store where they purchase revolvers and ammunition.

The proprietor of the store, grasping the situation, decides to avoid all possibility of bloodshed, so supplies them with blank ammunition. The duellists and seconds being women, and consequently unfamiliar with firearms, are none the wiser and take the blank cartridges in good faith.

We next see them assembled under a tree in a secluded corner of a park.

The "seconds" place the suffragette duellists in position and give the command, "Fire!" At the report of both revolvers each duellist thinks she has been struck and falls to the ground. This has the effect of scaring both seconds and witnesses into a faint so they all collapse. In this condition they are found and arrested by the police, who are attracted to the spot by the noise of the firearms.

CONSUL CROSSES THE ATLANTIC.—"Consul the Great," the human ape, of marvelously manlike tastes and actions, came to this country on the huge steamship George Washington, recently. His daily life and experiences are admirably and humorously depicted in scenes which command not only the approval, but the enthusiasm of every audience. Consul's aping of the manners and customs of civilized human life is vastly entertaining and most instructive. His repertoire is entirely covered in the film and all the famous acts are clearly shown. Read of the many things he does now: He takes an airing—Investigates the ship—Uses a pocket handkerchief—Swabs the deck—Climbs the rigging—Hems a handkerchief—Exercises on a bicycle—Makes free with the Stars and Stripes—Enjoys afternoon tea—Comes to grief—Plays baseball—Quarrels with youngsters—Rides roller skates—Has an elaborate lunch—Eats with fork—Picks teeth—Pours wine—Uses a table napkin—Has an after-dinner smoke—Prepares to retire—Bids us adieu—Kisses the keeper good-night.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE BRIDEGROOM'S JOKE.—The course of true love never does run smooth and it is the friends of the happy pair who generally prove the disturbing element. An expectant groom sends his bride-elect a box of flowers, but he is seen by four of his chums, who replace the flowers with a dog; a plain yellow "mutt" with a tangled ancestry and an unprepossessing appearance. He sends a note with it, "The enclosed is not more sweet than yourself," and when he comes to claim the kiss that is his due he finds a tidy little tempest brewing. Of course, explanations follow and the skies clear, but the incident is a hint of what the honeymoon is to be and be plans the undoing of the plotters. To his best man he sends a confidential note to the effect that he will be unable to leave town after the ceremony and will spend the night at a fashionable hotel. To carry out the deception he engages a room at the hostelry and the quartet of mischief-makers promptly hire the adjoining apartment. With the aid of their keys they enter the bridal chamber and remove the groom's suitcase, the chairs, the bedding and all portables. That night, after the ceremony, they hurry to their room to enjoy the discomfiture of the pair, but there is no sound from the adjoining room, and at last they open the door with the false key. They are received by the bellboy with a hose, and after being liberally sprinkled they are removed by the police. Meanwhile the newlyweds are crossing the ferry to the railroad station and wondering what is happening to the plotters. A delightful little comedy of unexpectedness played as only the Vitagraph players can handle this sort of real comedy.

DIRIGIBLE BALLOONS AT ST. LOUIS.—Aeroplanes have occupied the attention of the motion cameras almost to the exclusion of dirigible balloons, but these enter the field in this release and a series of views really remarkable will be shown. A Vitagraph operator attended the recent meet of the Aero Club of St. Louis, when the balloon races were started, and there caught Ivy Baldwin, Roy Knabenshue, Robinson and Leo Stevens in their dirigibles. Photographs were made of the men and

The Trick That Failed

In this subject the Biograph presents a very novel comedy idea. Nellie Burt, a pretty little girl, struggling for fame as an artist, is sought in marriage by a successful disciple of the brush and palette, but she refuses to think of marrying until she has sold her works and lots of them. The lover devises a scheme to make her famous, that is, to enlist the services of all his friends to buy her pictures, he furnishing the money. Things look bright for him until, through the awkwardness of his valet, she discovers the deception. Then it is all off.

Length, 645 feet.

In The Window Recess

A short subject, but one of the most thrilling. An escaped convict takes refuge in the home of a policeman, surprising the wife alone with her child. He seizes the little one and with a pistol at its head, hides behind the curtains in the window recess, threatening destruction of the child, should the wife reveal his hiding. The convict is finally surprised, overpowered and given into the custody of the prison guards.

Length, 337 feet.

Released December 2nd, 1909

The Death Disc

A Story of the Cromwellian Period

Oliver Cromwell, as Lord Protector of the English Commonwealth, is informed of the fact that three of his soldiers were discovered as adherents to the Roman Church, hence to set an example he condemns them to draw lots.—one to die and the other two to be released to warn their sect against further practices of their religion. This they refuse to do, preferring all three to die. He then sends out for a little child, the first his guards may meet. The child is brought and impresses Cromwell so, it reminding him of his own dead child, that he bestows on it a signet ring, promising to grant any wish the little one may hereafter ask. The child happens to be the daughter of one of the soldiers and selects the pretty red disc for its papa, which is the death disc. He is then to be beheaded but the child pleads in the name of the ring for his pardon which Cromwell cannot deny.

Length, 995 feet.

machines, the starts, the flights and the landings. The latter are the first pictures recorded by any motion picture of an aviation descent. The balloons are seen high in the air. Gradually they come down to earth and are received by a corps of United States Infantrymen stationed at the Jefferson barracks near St. Louis. The Army authorities detailed these men in pursuance of the Army policy of making the men familiar with the handling of balloons in war times. It is a marked departure in aviation that the pilots are now able to land their balloons at an agreed upon spot, and these pictures should attract widespread attention because of that fact. An additional feature of interest is the first motion photograph of two dirigibles in flight at the same time sufficiently close together to be caught by the camera in one field. The photography is unusually good and the Vitagraph makes a most important contribution to the picture history of aviation.

NO MORE BROKEN CONDENSORS

The CONDENSOR PROTECTOR solves all difficulties. Catches all light rays from arc and repels the heat. Absolutely protects the thin edges of condensor, the point of greatest danger. Acts as an automatic switch, preventing grounding and shorting. Serves as indicator for placing lamp in position. Adds to fireproof efficiency of lamp-house by filling all crevices around edge of condensor, preventing flying sparks from escaping. The ingredients in the protector have been selected after many months of careful research and experimentation. It was found necessary to import from Europe two varieties of plastic fire clay, alone, containing the necessary properties. These are scientifically compounded with other ingredients and chemicals, making the protector absolutely fireproof and a non-conductor of heat and electricity. Fits any condensor. Reduces breakage 90 per cent. Sent carefully packed, express prepaid, on receipt of $2.00. Further information on request.

POWERS CO.

A RUN FOR THE MONEY.—Golden Mint, an athletic American heiress, upon coming of age, is pestered by a multitude of titled suitors, encouraged by Mrs. Castor, her ambitious aunt.

Three of these fortune-hunters, a French count, a German baron, and an English lord, lose no time in pressing their suit.

Golden is used to her morning walk, and is often accompanied upon these constitutionals by Bob Manley.

The advent of the foreign nobility upon the scene interferes with these former pleasant excursions, and the three fortune-hunters lose no opportunities to win the prize, even during Golden's morning walk, and at the expense of their dignity, wind and energy.

The count and baron show extreme hostility towards each other, and, after several encounters, a duel takes place and results merely in a loss of dignity.

Golden, tired of these attentions, and with Bob's help, induces the three foreigners to run a cross-country race, suggesting that the winner will be considered Golden's accepted suitor.

The race results in many disasters to the contestants, and they are finally arrested as escaped lunatics, Bob having anonymously suggested this fact to the chief of police.

None of the contestants finishing, Bob, taking advantage of his flying start, induces Golden to award the prize to a plain American citizen.

NAPOLEON'S GAME OF CHESS (Le Lion).—The period is 1805. The scene, Austerlitz, where a few days before the battle the victorious French press forward on their march. In the village, Max, an Austrian lieutenant, pays a visit to the parson, with whose niece Max is in love. On his return to the ranks, he is captured by the enemy and condemned to be shot as a spy. But at night he succeeds in escaping, and after eluding his pursuers he arrives in a wounded condition at the house of the parson, where he is safely sheltered.

Meanwhile, Napoleon, who has installed himself in a cottage in the village, seeks temporary relief from his weighty cares, and desires to play a game of chess. He is informed that there is no one at hand who is acquainted with the game, but at length an aide-de-camp announces that he has discovered a renowned player in the village—the local parson. Napoleon, with a party of his officers, makes his way to the house of the divine, where, at the approach of the party, Max has been hastily hidden away.

The game commences. Napoleon intimates that should the parson win he may have granted any favor he cares to ask of him. Playing under great stress of excitement, the parson eventually proves victorious and Napoleon agreeably invites him to name his desire. Before the parson can reply, however, a number of French soldiers burst into the room, having tracked the fugitive by the blood drops from his wounds. The hiding place is discovered and Max is dragged forth before the stern Emperor. At this intense moment, the parson steps forward and makes an appeal for mercy. "Sire," he says, "you have left the choice of the stake at my discretion. Your Majesty, the stake is this man's life. I ask your mercy and that his life be preserved." The austere countenance of Napoleon shows the momentary indecision to which his inner thoughts give rise, and then relaxing, he presents the lieutenant Max to the parson with these characteristic words: "Debt of play, debt of honor; I pay."

JOHN FARLEY'S REDEMPTION (Eclair).—John Farley, to his mother's regret, is a ne'er-do-well fellow. One day he takes from a drawer the money paid as rent to his mother, the caretaker of the premises. He is the cause of suspicion being cast upon his innocent parent and her ultimate ejectment from her home and position of trust. The poor woman has to struggle on alone, and manages to eke out a bare existence by very rough work.

Descending deeper into the mire on the road to ruin, John one night proceeds with a companion to break into a house. Searching around the room, he has failed to discover anything of the slightest value, but is almost struck helpless by the sight of a portrait hanging upon the wall of the meagerly furnished apartment. With a shock he recognizes it as that of his father, and is so overcome that he drives his companion away, determined that he will never again commit such sins. While in an attitude of penitence, he is surprised by the entry of his poor wearied mother, who has returned from her daily toil almost worn out with fatigue. The influence of a good father has been sufficient to recall the better nature of John into activity. He discards his bad associates and becomes the support and comfort of his poor old mother for the remainder of her days.

GREAT NORTHERN.

A BOY HERO; or, The Fisherman's Son.—Fisherman Brown is one of the happiest men of the village, having two nice boys and a good wife, and especially his eldest son, Robert, who is his favorite. He is quite happy in spite of the dangerous way he has to make his living, and his business drives him out on the sea in every kind of weather. One day he has to go out, in spite of a heavy storm. In the evening, after the fisher fleet had returned, there was a great sorrow in his home, as he had not come back with the others. It would have been madness to go out on such a stormy night to try to find him, but his boy Robert would not go to bed without making an attempt to find his father. Quietly he makes his way down to the beach, takes a boat and rows out into the storm. In the distance he sees a boat upside down, and a man, who is holding on to the quay. After some trouble he succeeds in getting near to the wreck, and he takes the man off into his boat. He at once recognizes his father in the man, and proudly he rows back to the shore, where he had been missed. The fishing people were assembled on the beach, watching his daring experiment, and when he returns successful he is cheered by a large crowd. Both father and son are taken to their home, and the next day a government official arrives, bringing the boy a medal for saving the man's life, and the son is just the proudest boy in the world.

His Reformation

Another sensational Western picture. Photographically perfect. A Western "bad man," receiving a letter from his mother back East, resolves to forsake his evil ways and lead an honest life. He endeavors to get work, but is refused because of his shady past. Unable to make a living honestly, he returns to the old life, steals a horse and pistol from a cowboy and holds up the stage-coach. Imagine his remorse when he finds his mother is one of the occupants of the coach. However, she forgives him; the other passengers consent to his going free and make up a purse to give him a start in life. The wayward son, truly reformed, returns East with his mother to begin life anew. Not only a good drama, but a scenic wonder as well. Contains the choicest bits of Western scenery obtainable.

The Ranchman's Rival

(Drama)

Jim Watson, a cowpuncher, is engaged to marry the daughter of a fairly well-to-do ranchman, but the engagement is broken when the girl receives a proposal from a wealthy young Easterner. The Easterner's plan is a low and despicable one. He pays a Mexican greaser a few dollars to pose as a preacher and arranges to bring the girl to him to be married. However, the Easterner's wife arrives. Jim, the jilted lover, learns the truth and arrives at the scene of the "marriage" just before the ceremony. The Easterner is forced to confess to the girl his nefarious scheme. The girl, repentant and ashamed, begs Jim's forgiveness. He needs little coaxing, and restoring the engagement ring to her finger, takes her tenderly in his arms.

And Now What Do You Think?

Knowing that it would be folly to deny my exposure of their rotten secret in regard to exacting a penalty of ten per cent from exhibitors, the licensed exchange men are saying:—"Laemmle won't hurt us by giving that story away. Some of the exhibitors already know about the ten percent plan and those that don't know it won't believe it!" Their answer is a confession! Listen, Mr. Exhibitor:—If you have any doubt about the agreement to penalize you ten percent for switching your patronage from one licensed exchange to another licensed exchange, MAKE A TEST. And then put your thinking cap on. Ask yourself this:—If it were not for the Independent movement, what WOULDN'T the trust do to you? Mark you, the Independent movement is bigger, stronger, and better organized than ever. Yet in the very face of this powerful and winning opposition, the trust people make you submit to all sorts of humiliations and ridiculous taxations and penalties. If they do this under present conditions, what in the name of smoked herring and holy mackerel WOULDN'T they do if the Independent movement had never existed? Now can't you begin to see why the biggest and best film renter in the world turned independent? And have you any more at stake than I have? Think. Then act!

WHY—The Motiograph is the Best Motion Picture Machine

Because the Pictures are More Brilliant. The special patented Shutter is so arranged that it saves a lot of illumination otherwise lost.
Because Flicker is eliminated by the new patented Shutter.
Because the Pictures are Rock Steady when using a good film, and are restful to the eyes of your patrons. The result is because of accurate workmanship and excellence of design.
Because it has patented quick Rewind (one and one-half minutes) connected to main crank handle. No other similar.
Because it has the only perfect Fire-proof Shutter, automatic and absolutely reliable.
Because it has Enclosed Spiral Gears. They work smooth and wear longer.
Because it has a Perfect Take Up. Easy on the film and always reliable.
Because it has inclosed Framing Device. Wears longer, is quickly removed and patented.
Because it has "Wide Open" Lamp House, convenient for changing carbons, adjustment, etc.
Because it is absolutely Fireproof.
Because it has Double the Wearing Qualities possessed by other Machines.
Because it is almost Noiseless; runs more quiet than any other.
Because it has Heavy Pedestal Base, adjustable and patented.
Because it has more than 40 other points of special merit. Boston, New York, Chicago and San Francisco approved.

"OH YOU IMP!"

Eighth Imp Release, "The Two Sons"

This is a war story and a high class thriller. Some of the scenes are so gripping in their intensity that you forget you are looking at a picture and can easily imagine you are seeing the real thing. At least I did, and I'm no fudge-eating matinee man. The story deals with two brothers, one a brave fellow, the other an arrant coward; and their mother. One exciting espisode after another holds the deepest interest from the first foot of film to the last. The acting is simply great; the staging pluperfect and the photography brilliantly clear. These are not exaggerations. See for yourself.

PATHÉ FILM D'ART

LA GRANDE BRETÈCHE

By HONORE DE BALZAC LENGTH, 900 FEET

The picture is a striking example of the perfection of Pathe moving pictures. The scenes show the real actions of real and sentient human beings who feel the very spirit of the drama—the passionate revenge, poignant horror, the iron will of the woman who, to save her lover, risks her soul in a lie sworn upon the crucifix—her lover's gift. Every emotion is read on the mobile features of the actors. Every gesture is eloquent. Here indeed actions speak louder than words.

KINEMACOLOR.

Kinemacolor is to be shown in New York City by G. Albert Smith, F.R.A.S., inventor and scientist, who, with Charles Urban, F.Z.S., the president of the company controlling the process, have come specially to the United States, for the purpose of demonstrating the commercial application of a most interesting scientific achievement. The moving picture trade in this country will thus have an opportunity of witnessing on the screen photographs in natural colors made by a method that we have discussed at considerable length in these pages, and which has attracted great attention in Europe for the past two years.

This event must be regarded as one of the greatest possible importance in connection with moving picture progress. In the first place, it will be the very first time that moving pictures in natural colors have been shown on the screen in the United States. In the second place, the inventor, G. Albert Smith, will be personally present to introduce the process, and in the third place, in addition to the many subjects taken in Europe to illustrate the possibilities of Kinemacolor, we are given to understand that American subjects are also to be shown. The demonstration is to be given on Saturday, December 11, in the concert room of Madison Square Garden, in New York City, at 9 o'clock P. M. We understand that invitations have been issued to leading members of the film manufacturing trade, renters, prominent exhibitors, and generally those who are seriously interested in the process. Mr. Urban and Mr. Smith are laudably desirous of giving the utmost information and the fullest publicity in their power, and we have no doubt that the demonstration will constitute an event of the highest possible importance to the moving picture field. Should any of our readers who have not received tickets, desire to be present, and they will address us, we will endeavor to forward them a card of admission.

Kinemacolor, not only in our own pages, but elsewhere, has received mixed commendation and criticism. In this respect it simply shares the fate of all steps of a revolutionary nature which upset pre-conceived notions or opinions. The attitude of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD towards Kinemacolor, as editorially expressed in this journal of August 14 last, is that of friendly criticism based upon many years of study of the subject. Anybody with the smallest acquaintance of the science of color and its translation by photographic means will appreciate the analytical method we chose in discussing the practical aspects of Kinemacolor. Beyond that, it is not necessary for us on this occasion to say anything. But we go so far as to add that if, in the current vernacular, Kinemacolor "makes good" and fulfills all that is claimed for it, THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD in the utmost possible manner will give it every praise and recognition. This is no more than the due of Kinemacolor, or any other advance designed to advantage the progress, scientific and practical, of moving pictures. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD exists, as we have said, for the benefit of the industry as a whole and is always eager to record and applaud any definite step forward.

It is no exaggeration to say that the whole moving picture trade of the United States, as well as a large section of the general public, is looking forward to the Madison Square demonstration on December 11, which we hope will have all success.

The White Plague and the Moving Picture.

New York, amongst the great cities of the world, enjoys a deservedly high reputation for the drastic manner in which it is endeavoring to stamp out the white plague—tuberculosis or, as it is often called, consumption. In the first place the laws of the city are so administered that the danger of contagion is reduced to a minimum. We wish we could say the same of many of the cities of the old world as we say of New York, that it is practically a penal offense to spit in public or in a public conveyance. This alone puts New York City in a class by itself as regards the preventive means for suppressing tuberculosis.

There is in this city a National Association for the Prevention of Tuberculosis which is officered by leading men and women pledged to use all available means for stamping out the white plague. It has branches in every city and every large State. We are glad to learn that the educational facilities of the moving picture theater have presented themselves to the committee as a likely means for reaching the class of people it is most desirable to instruct and direct in the vital matter of how to prevent the dissemination of those germs which induce the tuberculosic state in the human being.

An educational campaign is about to be started throughout the United States and all moving picture exhibitors are invited to co-operate with the National Association. This they may do by exhibiting especially prepared announcement slides in colors having, in addition to the ordinary announcement, little legends bearing upon the "prevention better than cure aspects" of tuberculosis. These slides will be supplied to moving picture exhibitors at actual cost. Exhibitors should address the director of the educational campaign, J. M. Livingston, National Association for the Prevention of Tuberculosis, 105 East Twenty-third street, New York City.

Nor is this all. Early next month we believe that the Biograph Company will release a picture which, though it will contain the full amount of heart interest which the films made by this celebrated company are always noted for, yet will concern itself so closely with the melancholy aspect of tuberculosis that it will have a distinct educational and informative effect upon the hundreds of thousands of moving picture visitors who see the film. In other words, the film will have a purpose, that purpose being to arrest the public interest in the dangers of the proprogation of tuberculosis. At the same time it will tell people what is done and how it is done in the hospitals and other public institutions for alleviating the attacks of this dreadful disease.

In this respect, therefore, the moving picture screen once more asserts itself as an agency of high educational value, and we are glad to find not only that the National Association realize this fact, but that the Biograph Company is co-operating with a fine public spirit to the same end. We hope also that moving picture exhibitors throughout the United States will lend their support to the movement. This they can do without any fear of repelling their patrons, or diluting their entertainment with anything of an unduly morbid nature. The whole thing, indeed, may be looked upon in the light of an educational interlude which need not interfere with the visitor's enjoyment. We wish the National Association all success in their work.

Patent Law and the Patents' Controversy.

The legal mind is essentially one which deals with matters of fact. In all contested cases, matters of fact supply evidence for or against. It will be seen that according to the judgment rendered in the suit of the Motion Picture Patents Company vs. the New York Motion Picture Company, the plaintiff company's attorneys were lacking in evidence sufficient to justify the granting of the preliminary injunction in reference to the use of alleged infringing cameras. Of course this denial of the preliminiary injunction does not close the door to further action in respect of what the judge calls "the issue itself in the case."

Cases of this kind are both difficult to prosecute and difficult to defend. It is not an easy thing to obtain evidence of the use of articles alleged to be infringements of validated patents. We know one maker of films who keeps his camera locked in a room inaccessible to everybody but the photographer. The only way to get access to that camera is by smashing down the operating house —a somewhat drastic way of obtaining evidence which, perhaps, might not be useful when obtained. There is also the possibility that the instrument which is thought to be infringing is not infringing.

We have heard stories that evidence has been tendered by actors who have worked for Independent makers, a somewhat unreliable form of evidence, we should think. Undoubtedly infringing cameras are being used, but in order to satisfy the requirements of the court the evidence against the infringers must be specific and precise and there must be no question of difficulty of identification.

Judges, as we know, are very hard to convince in these technical matters. Usually the success of a plaintiff before a court is not facilitated by judges, who are naturally prone to view with disfavor all actions based upon alleged infractions of anything but the statute law of the land, whatever that may be. It is naturally very difficult to arrive at a just judgment in matters of fact, or as we might prefer to put it, matters of equity. In matters of law the case is far different. Hence it is that commercial cases very often terminate in decision satisfactory to neither party.

With regard to the legal aspect of this matter, ignorant newspaper writers and others may perahps be led to lay much stress upon it. The broad issue still remains, namely, that the holders of certain patents seem determined to defend their rights in those patents. They are disposed, moreover, to go their own way about the assertion of those rights before the courts. It is to be presumed that the Motion Picture Patents Company's attorneys know their business and are competent to advise their clients as to the steps to take and when to take them. Patent cases are frequently long drawn out cases. We have known them to last for years before being finally settled by the highest Court of Appeals. In the case under notice there are, therefore, all th possibilities of prolonged litigation.

Prudent people interested in these matters will not, it is to be hoped, lose their heads over the hysterical nonsense that is being printed over these cases, but will prefer to await the course of events, which is the common sense attitude to take. So far as information is available in the ordinary way, the Patents Company are not committed to any definite line of action or to any definite way or time of taking that action. Consequently nobody, probably not even the Patents Company's lawyers, can know what is likely to happen or when it will happen. We draw attention to the judge's decision in this case because it has a clear bearing upon the question of what kind of evidence is necessary, in order that an injunction can be obtained in similar circumstances.

Notes of the Trade.

The identity of a Mr. "Fulton," self-alleged to be a member of the "New York Herald's" staff, is a subject of much interest in moving picture circles just now. There is a Mr. Fulton employed on the "New York Herald," but he disavows any connection with the other "Fulton." The question is, Who is the "Fulton" that is not the real Fulton; and does he, or does he not, lay himself open to prosecution for personation? Moreover, what is the position of those who connive at the deception?

The French Consul at Havana has pointed out to French manufacturers what an excellent field for the sale of cinematograph films Cuba presents. The natives of that country patronize cinematograph shows very freely, and there are a goodly number of saloons throughout the country which draw large audiences nightly. America has tried to corner the trade, but is being slowly edged out by France and Italy.

A trip like this gives one a good line on the general conditions over the entire country, and close observation has shown a good future for the photographic craft next season.

Edison Progress.

A Visit to the Great Bronx Moving Picture Studio.

We have this year paid two visits to the great Edison moving picture making studio in the Bronx, which is illustrated in the accompanying cuts. The first time we were there, was in the cold and chilly Spring. Changes were imminent. The new managerial broom was in sight and the sound of promises and the "coming to be" was in the air. The second time that we visited this studio was two or three weeks ago, and then it was no longer a question of promise, but of actual performance. For the new broom had been exceedingly busy in the meanwhile. Metaphorically and actually speaking, the great studio, which is probably the largest of its kind in the world, or, at any rate, one of the largest, had been swept and garnished to such an extent that if we are hardly correct in saying that we did not know it, we can at least go the length of asseverating that what we saw entirely gratified our love of the neat, the orderly and the systematic in photographic work.

Now, what has taken place in the Edison studio is symptomatic of what is taking place in the quality of the company's moving picture work, as well as, let it be said, in the quality of the work of other American moving picture houses. Consider what was the state of the moving picture industry in this country exactly twelve months ago! All was confusion and, we might say, chaos.

The Edison Studio.

The Edison Studio.

Aside of the purely commercial aspect of matters, there seemed to be, amongst the American film makers, no definite standard of quality to which they could look up or by which they might gauge the qualities of their own productions. They were hardly competitors in the best sense of the term. They were certainly not competing in business methods and most emphatically they were not competing in the way of quality. Quality, in fact, was not much talked about. Mainly because, we go to the length of maintaining, it had not yet been persistently brought to the attention of the manufacturers by the MOVING PICTURE WORLD that quality of product was the only ultimate test of success in moving picture making.

But with the new order of things that happily came into vogue at the commencement of this year, the Edison Company, and especially the moving picture branch of that concern, were quick to recognize that as they had officially entered into competition with their fellow manufacturers of the United States it behooved them to put their best leg forward to justify the position thus assumed. For, in the history of the moving picture, the name of Edison is one of unquestioned renown. An Edison moving picture has as much popular esteem attached to it as an Edison phonograph. The consequence is that an enormous section of the public has come to regard the Edison moving picture as the ne plus ultra of this kind of product. And so it came about that in what we have called the new order of things the first thing to be attempted and accomplished was to put the Edison "house in order," up in the Bronx. And that has been done both inside and outside. Externally the premises are neatly finished and beautifully kept; internally, both in the working and office department, everything, to employ a well-known phrase, is in apple-pie order.

Our own criticisms of the company's work have, from week to week, borne testimony to the improvement in photographic quality which the Edison pictures have recently maintained. It needs no elaborate explanation of the means employed in order to bring about this end. This simply entails the use of what is mentioned in another article elsewhere in this week's MOVING PICTURE WORLD. The company is simply employing the scientific method for the making of the negatives and the positives. That is to say, the lighting, exposure, developing, the drying, and the general after-treatment of the pictures, as well as the handling of the sensitive film in the operations it passes through before it becomes a picture, have been attended to with minute care, accuracy and intelligence, in accordance with the best known methods of carrying on the work, mechanically, manually, or automatically. For here, after all, we have a common-sense definition of the scientific method in moving picture making, or, as we might otherwise express it, its intelligent application to the work in hand.

We give prominence to the photographic improvement in the quality of the Edison pictures, because we are alone in recognizing a fact which no other journal devoted to the moving picture in this country either does recognize or is competent to recognize, namely, that one-half the success of the moving picture in the public eye relies upon its photographic qualities. You may have an indifferent story indifferently acted, or there may be no story at all, or the subject generally may not appeal either to the taste or the comprehension of your audience, but you may rest assured that if the photograph is good, free from defects, and is intelligently shown on the screen, it will achieve a success on those grounds alone. We have observed this fact over and over again. We have observed that a beautiful translation of light and shade, or a nice piece of marine or landscape composition, or a good piece of grouping correctly photographed, and shown to the public, has not failed to interest them, though the narrative or dramatic properties of the picture have been somewhat obscure.

But the Edison Company, while paying close attention to an improvement in the photographic technique of their moving pictures, have not been idle at the other, and perhaps equally important, end of the production—that end of matters which is complete at the moment when the man at the camera commences to turn the handle of the instrument, namely, the presentation of the play or whatever piece has been rehearsed, to an imaginary public. In the first place, the acting staff of the company has been very largely augmented and something like a stock company organized to be permanently on hand for the many productions staged by the company in the course of the year. There are no less than four producers employed at the great Bronx studio. At times there are four, five, or we believe even more, companies simultaneously rehearsing their work, either in that studio or in suitable outdoor locations. In the interesting cuts illustrating this article will be seen two rehearsals in progress. It will be evident that the studio is a capacious one, and that there is every facility for the necessary scenes and for equipping, mounting, and dressing the pieces. In the larger of the two cuts the renowned French pantomimist, Mademoiselle Pilar-Morin, is seen rehearsing a part which she played in the noted film of "Comedy and Tragedy," that we reviewed in last week's MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

So much for the producing and acting staff whose work is earning so much favorable comment in the moving picture field just now. The producing and photographing ends of a moving picture play, however, would waste all "their sweetness on the desert air" unless the raw material of the best possible quality was not obtained for moving picture making. By the raw material we mean the stories, plays, or scenarios for the pictures. With all the manufacturers, during the past year, there has been an evident determination to obtain possession of good original stories for the films. That determination still has much to accomplish. The public at large is getting very seriously critical, not only of the photographs as such, as they are shown on the screen, but of the stories which are illustrated. So that any manufacturer who desires to keep in the van of progress must, in the nature of things, put on a good story well told, and well photographed. The Edison Company in this respect took the bold step of assuring themselves a good supply of well-written stories by what, to us, seems the most common-sense and the safest possible method. That is, by going to the best market for the goods. Personally, we have little or no faith in competitions, which are mostly patronized by the amateur and the dilletante. Nor do we think that the best work is discovered by advertising for it. Really good work sells on sight, so that those who either enter into competitions or reply to advertisements may reasonably be regarded as hardly in the first rank of competent workers.

It is to writers of the latter kind that the Edison Company have gone direct. They have engaged the services of E. W. Townsend, Carolyn Wells, Rex Beach to supply them with suitable stories for moving pictures. Moreover, they have recently entered into arrangements with Roy Norton and Richard Harding Davis whereby adaptations of their novels and stories may be available for moving picture purposes at the Bronx studio.

So that, all round, the Edison Manufacturing Company at its moving picture end, is about as well equipped to supply the public demand for good moving pictures as any other installation that we have come across. Moreover, the company is fortunate in having in charge of these departments a type of men of a progressive and at the same time sympathetic nature. Sympathetic, let us explain, towards the moving picture as a pure and enlightening source of public entertainment. Edison subjects nowadays deal very little with the sombre aspects of life, nor with the criminal, the salacious, or the risky. They are virile, healthy subects upon which not only men and women may look without mental fright or disturbance, but young children. We say also "young children" with some emphasis, for it is a fact that of the millions of people who daily and nightly look upon moving pictures, the larger proportion are young children, the future men and women of the country, whose minds, above all things, it is important should be favorably impressed by the artistic narrative, moral and educational possibilities of the moving picture.

Like ourselves, those in charge of the moving picture branch of the Edison Manufacturing Company are impressed by the enormous possibilities which the moving picture probably has before it. Like ourselves, they see a tremendous growth in favor of the picture with the public, which is evidently inclined to give the moving picture a constant allegiance that it denies to the ordinary theater. The final place of the moving picture in public entertainments is, perhaps, just now hard to determine; but it is satisfactory to note that a great concern like the Edison Company takes an altogether optimistic view of the future.

Finally, there is one respect in which we think the Edison Company is deserving of even heartier praise than we have allotted them for the intelligent steps of progress noted above. We mean in respect of the personnel of their acting staff. Their actors and actresses are all good people at the game—people who have acquired their knowledge and experience with such masters as Mansfield and Belasco. Indeed, in their pictures, we are glad to note the work of the careful actor rather than that of the irresponsible or casual amateur who has drifted onto the moving picture stage. And best of all was the assumption into their permanent staff of such a noted mistress of the pantomimic art as Pilar-Morin, whose work was singled out for our praise last week. This lady's work is already becoming favorably known to the great moving picture public of the United States and indeed of the world, and we think the acquisition by the Edison Company of this gifted artist a very notable departure. So notable indeed, that it is bound to influence other manufacturers in adopting a similarly progressive policy: that of having their pictures acted by capable, cultivated performers, instead of throwing on the stage the "cheap actor" or the "unfinished actress," which was so often done in the bad old days that have gone forever.

All those associated with the moving picture branch of the Edison Manufacturing Company may rest assured that the good work they are producing is being keenly appreciated by the public, and will be instrumental in keeping the company in the forefront of the world's moving picture makers.

A Coming Headliner.

LA GRANDE BRETECHE (Pathe).

Such a subject as this is plain to the meanest capacity in moving picture audiences, because it deals vividly with one of the tritest themes of the dramatists—irregular love and its punishment. But the fine setting of the picture relieves it of sordid or unpleasant aspects. A Spanish prisoner of war falls in love with the wife of his captor. All are of noble birth and position in the world, and as the incidents described by Balzac are supposed to take place in the year 1816, in rural France, there is every opportunity for beauty of costume, scenery, etc. The husband feigns to take a journey and returns to find his wife dallying with her lover in her room. The lover is hurriedly secreted in an adjoining apartment and then comes the husband's opportunity to take what looks on the screen a cold, diabolical revenge. There are some workmen in the house and these he engages to brick up the door of the room in which the lover is hidden, whilst the agonized and guilty wife stands by and watches the work done. Of course, in the book the wife has not given her lover away, nor has she given herself away, and in an ordinary stage play these facts would supply poignancy of situation and create an intensity of emotion not possible on the moving picture screen, where subtlety of motive, by-play, or what you might call the middle tones of emotion are hardly to be rendered. In this picture, therefore, the audience will see illicit love punished by a stern and unbending husband who knows very well what he is doing when he has the door bricked up. Of course, in time it kills the woman, who dies sending her farewell to her imprisoned lover, who also dies in his part of the picture. The picture is noticeable for the magnificent acting of the three principal character—the two men and a woman. The haughtiness of the Spanish prisoner of war is well rendered by the actor; the sternness of the husband, and the grace and charm of the erring woman, we might say the excusably erring woman—for hubby looks uncommonly unlikable—all this is illustrated with magnificent graphic force, so that as the audience looks on the picture they are let into the skin of the various emotions portrayed by characters whose faces show exactly what they feel. The story, it will be seen from our description, is not very complicated. There is no difficulty in following it, for it is simple, dramatic, and absorbing, and we should think would be much to the liking of moving picture audiences. Of course the photographic part of the picture is splendidly done. An exterior view of a promenade, where the various characters meet, and the unhappy attachment of the man and woman commences, is a fine effect of sunshine. La Grande Bretechc is a magnificent production.

LANTERN SLIDES.

Improvement in lantern slides has been marked of late. Not only the technical quality, but the artistic arrangement and the grouping of figures is much better than it was a year, or even six months ago. Slide makers are acquiring proficiency in this branch of the business and the many artistic pictures on the screens are clear proof of this fact.

In the songs it must be admitted that in a majority of instances authors give the slide makers little to work with. Many of the songs are the veriest trash. But that is not the fault of the slide makers.

Practical Talks to Operators.

II.—THE PROJECTOR AND ITS USE.—(Continued.)

By Arthur S. Newman in the "Bioscope."

Last week the importance of keeping the gate of the projector clean was pointed out. The gate must not only be kept clean and smooth, but special attention must be given to see that it is also in its proper adjustment. Among the newer styles of projectors are some fitted with gates differing considerably from the old and almost general form, i.e., the one containing the spring-plate (usually interchangeable) with its six springs; and the opposing guides with the hump or projection on each. The original idea of the "hump" was to cause the film to bend just before and just after the "masking" position, so that the film might lie flat whilst being in the path of the light rays, without being touched by any part of the machine, except just at the edges. If a piece of film be bent in one direction it cannot easily be also bent in a direction at right-angles to the first position at the same time. The old makes of films showed a great tendency to set in a curve, hollow towards the gelatine side, and it was for the purpose of overcoming this tendency that the hump was introduced. In order to focus the center and the edges of the film at one and the same time, it is necessary that the film should be fairly flat when passing the mask. A slight curvature with its hollow side towards the projecting lens would with most lenses be advantageous, but unfortunately the tendency to curvature is in the other direction when working in the front of the screen, and the front position is now the usual one. In the old gates, the springs themselves pressed directly upon the edges of the film; in the new ones the springs hold the film down by pressing on runners, or "skates," which are guided by rods, or studs. Sometimes the springs press directly upon the skates, and sometimes upon the rods which are fixed in the said skates. The skates present long smooth surfaces which fit accurately on the opposing guides, and by gripping the film at each edge cause it to set flat between the edges, although unsupported in the middle. Velvet, a material much used in the first days, has almost disappeared from the gates of projectors. Although it gave an almost perfect friction, steady and light, when new; it rapidly accumulated dust and dirt, and if not frequently renewed caused the films to scratch and tear up.

In order to know how to keep the gate in good condition it is necessary to understand the functions of the gate. It is, first of all, a guide to keep the picture from moving to the right or left during its passage through. Its second function is to flatten the film so that the whole of the picture can be focussed at the same time. Its third and most important object is to put enough drag or friction on the moving film to cause it to come to rest immediately the intermittent mechanism ceases to act. Should the pressure springs be too light, the film will have a tendency to run a little farther than it has been moved by the mechanism. If the amount of this over-shooting were always precisely the same, no harm would be done by having the pressure springs weak, but unfortunately friction is a force which is not susceptible of exact regulation, and the slightest variation in the thickness of the film, or of its condition as to dryness, will alter the drag of light springs, enough to allow the film to run forward by its own impetus at one moment, and to stop it promptly the next. It is, therefore, necessary to have these springs sufficiently strong to certainly stop the over-shoot every time. With the beater or "dog" machine this is all-important, because the gate tension is the only factor in bringing the film to rest. With the Maltese-cross and pin movements, the mechanism itself operates to stop the film as well as to move it, consequently the gate-springs only act in subduing vibration in the film, and in keeping the gears of the machine in contact, and minimizing back-lash or shake among the important moving parts constituting the intermittent mechanism. The gate-springs must therefore be strong enough; but they must on no account be too strong, or damage to the film will be the result. Luckily, owing to the tenacious nature of celluloid, there is a considerable difference of strength between the "too weak" and the "too strong" condition; still, to adjust these springs to a nicety requires careful manipulation. The best way is to start with the springs too weak, when the picture on the screen will have a large amount of faulty registration up and down, and if the gate be a wide one, or the film be narrow, it will be faulty in the right and left direction. Gradually strengthening the springs will reduce the "jump," and this should be continued, testing the machine from time to time till no further improvement is noted. An attempt should be made to keep all the springs about equally strong when the gate is shut. The gate supplied with "humps" must have its springs opposite to the humps less heavily sprung than the remaining ones, so that the tension on all may be even, when the gate is closed. Some of the latest models have screw adjustment to the gate-springs. These are quite easy to adjust by the method stated above, care being taken to fix the regulating screws firmly as soon as the desired position has been determined. When the machine in use is fitted with a gate, the springs of which press directly on the film, the operator should be alive to the fact that celluloid and gelatine have the power of cutting hard steel at quite an alarming rate, and the springs should be periodically examined to see how far wear has proceeded, and whether the springs by wearing thin and becoming weak are allowing the film to over-shoot and spoil the quality of the picture. The springs should be replaced by new ones long before the time when they will wear right through, as should this occur the remaining parts of the spring being of razor sharpness, may shear about 3-16th of an inch off the edge of the film, from end to end, ruining the film, and causing great danger of fire because some of the shearings may come to rest in the gate.

PHILADELPHIA NOTES.

Several exhibitors are indulging in a practice which is no credit to them and can cause them any amount of trouble. I refer to Independents who are professedly independent enough to not pay the $2 license to the Motion Picture Patents Company, but are not independent of heart, as they show licensed films in their places, as if they were acknowledging that the Independent manufacturers produce inferior pictures. I also refer to the licensed exhibitors, who pay their licenses, yet show Independent films in their places, as if they could not get a good enough supply from the licensed exchanges.

I have investigated several places to be sure that the complaints were not spite work on the part of jealous exhibitors. I will not mention the theaters I visited as I wish to give them a chance to mend their ways before they are officially reported to either the Motion Picture Patents Company or to the N. I. M. P. Alliance. I do not know of the penalty provided by the Alliance, but I do know that any licensed exhibitor who shows Independent films, will have his license revoked as soon as the case is reported to the M. P. P. Co. In one of the theaters I saw on the screen, "Fisherman's Bride" of Selig with "A Close Call" of the Centaur. Mr. Exhibitor, take warning.

I said in previous letters that the Quaker City is wide awake concerning moving pictures. I told of some of the wonderful cinematographic palaces to be found on Market and other well-known streets of Philadelphia, yet I had to go to the lower part of the city to find out how we New Yorkers are far behind the times. Yes, I visited South street, which is the east side of Philadelphia, the street crowded with push carts and pedlers, the mecca of the second-hand stores, the market for the negro, Italian, Polish, etc., and there, near Sixth street, I found the Hippodrome.

It is a specially constructed building and, if my eye did not deceive me, it is over 100 feet long by at least 40 feet wide, of very high ceiling, handsomely finished with rich plaster mouldings and ornaments, admirably lighted and well ventilated. The floor has a good incline, offering a good view from any part of the house, and the chairs, regular opera chairs, are arranged in three rows, providing two large aisles in conformity with the laws of Pennsylvania. A well-fitted stage, on which a play can be staged, gives the last touch of a real theater. Plenty of exits and a fireproof booth, in which the operators have plenty of room to move. Everything is pleasing and inviting. Such a moving picture theater would be an ornament on our Fourteenth street of New York.

The Circle, the Empire and other such houses, which would be classed in New York as good show places, have been forced to stop to make room for the better class of houses now building all over Philadelphia.

I do not like to tell it, as I do not wish to injure the Independent movement, but although I want to be fair and impartial, I have to acknowledge that the majority of those new cinematographic palaces are licensed houses.

Central City, Neb.—B. Smart and Wellington Connors have sold the Lyric Theater here to A. L. Lindsey.

Pontiac, Ill.—Frank Schuster will open a new moving picture theater at Monmouth.

Yorkville, Ill.—J. C. Kelly, of St. Charles, is planning to open a new moving picture show here.

Green Bay, Wis.—The Chicago Amusement Company will open a new moving picture show here.

THE LAMP HOUSE.

By F. H. Richardson.

On that much abused ground of "public safety," recommendation has been made to the Washington, D. C., authorities that the following regulations be adopted concerning arc lamps used in projection of moving pictures:

"Arc lamps used as a part of moving picture machines must be constructed entirely of metal, except where the use of approved insulating material is necessary, and must be inclosed in a substantial box or lamp house made of iron or steel not less than one-thirty-second of one inch in thickness, assembled with substantial iron rivets, and equipped with one door on the side for access to the lamp mechanism. This metal door must be mounted with substantial spring hinges, so designed that the door will automatically close, and the opposite side of the door must be equipped with a substantial spring catch lock. There must be no other openings in the lamp house or box, excepting small ventilating holes not greater than one-eighth of an inch in diameter and located only at the sides and back of the lamp house. There must be no openings in the top or bottom of the lamp house, and no unprotected openings in the front end, the front end being that toward the lens."

The writer's attention is drawn to this matter from the fact that the proposed regulations contain the usual percentage of concentrated nonsense and absurdities found in similar laws in other cities.

In the first place, the assembling of a lamp house with "substantial iron rivets," or any other kind for that matter, is wrong. It is wrong from the fact that such a lamp house would buckle and open at the seams in very short order. The seam which is folded over on itself and pressed down is the only proper one for a lamphouse under any circumstances. "This metal door (wonder if Mr. Wiseman thought the manufacturer would make it of paper or wood unless restrained by the insertion of the word "metal") must be mounted with substantial spring hinges," etc.!

Umph! Shouldn't we be grateful that they allow any door at all?

But it is to the last portion of this particular bunch of condensed wisdom I wish to pay my respects. Apparently unprotected openings ⅛ inch in diameter are allowed in the sides and back of the lamp house for ventilation, but no holes for the lamp handles are to be allowed at all. Also there must be no openings in the top or bottom of the lamp house.

Now let me say right here, that so far as openings in the rear of the lamp house be concerned there is about as much danger of fire from that source, even though the entire rear of the lamp house be open, as there is of the north pole being chopped up for kindling wood to build a fire under the Washington legislative kettle. Further, holes, properly protected, in the top of the lamp house are fully as safe as would be unprotected holes in the side of the lamp house, and their elimination will simply operate to induce greater condenser breakage. As a matter of fact, with modern take-up devices there is practically no danger at all from a film fire emanating from the lamp house so long as the immediate front of the arc be protected. The particles of carbon either are heavy enough to drop straight down on leaving the arc or else are too volatile to set anything short of gasoline ablaze.

The whole gist of what I am trying to get at is this: why in Heaven's name don't the gentlemen who undertake to issue instructions to practical moving picture men learn something about the practical end of projection before they undertake to set themselves up as Solomons?

THE LENGTH OF FILM SUBJECTS.

By An Exhibitor.

In the judgment of the writer, the editorial of The Moving Picture World, in a recent issue, concerning long subjects, is timely and should receive very serious consideration by the manufacturers. There are too many thousand-foot subjects, also there are too little short (400 to 600-foot) comedies. While there has been a phenomenal improvement in the matter of perforation and photography of late, it would seem that there is too great a percentage of drama and tragedy. Manufacturers should remember also that the moving picture show is essentially the poor man's amusement and the average working man, or at least a very large percentage of him, is not educated up to the point of understanding or appreciating high class stuff founded on classic poems and similar subjects. By this I do not mean that these splendid pictures should be eliminated, but I do assert that they should be comparatively few. Give the great public that which they can readily grasp and understand if you wish to hold their fickle fancy. The writer is fairly well educated, but of late he has run several films which he could not fully enjoy simply for the reason that they were founded on some poem or historic incident with which he was not at all familiar. Usually these films are beautiful in detail and photography, but one is left to wish he knew what in thunder it is all about anyhow.

A few such subjects is well, but too many is bad. Comedy the public demands and a very large proportion seems to thoroughly enjoy the old Essanay slap-stick variety. Time and again the writer has, with an average audience, run a high-class comedy, thoroughly enjoying it, while the audience sat silent, save for an occasional giggle, following it with one of those absurd, knock-'em-down-and-drag-'em-out "comedies," with which he was thoroughly disgusted, with the audience in a howl of laughter.

And there you are! Aside from vicious things the public must be given what it wants and enjoys at least a part of the time, and it would seem that the time to discard the silly comic is not yet.

Two subjects to the reel are popular, both with the exhibitor and the public, so let us have plenty of them, Mr. Manufacturer, if you please.

THE FUTURE OF THE WARWICK.

Rumor has been particularly free with the name of the Warwick Trading Company (London) of late. We found Mr. J. W. Smith not at all perturbed by the various statements circulating in the trade, but fully satisfied by the business at present being done by the company and by the prospects for the future. That the latter are more than ordinarily promising will be seen further on in this article, and we should first give prominence to Mr. Smith's emphatic contradiction of the statement that the Warwick Company was changing hands, or that fresh directors have been elected. The board remains exactly as it was twelve months ago and the business will be carried on exactly as in the past, except for the fact that Mr. Smith, who has been acting as assistant manager, has now been put in general charge of the business as manager, and that, in addition to their own films, the company will in future sell a number of the best Continental makers' films as agents.

"We shall handle exclusively in this country," said Mr. Smith, "the subjects of the makers for whom Messrs. Raleigh & Robert—the Continental Warwick Company—are agents in Paris, and these subjects with those of our own make will afford a regular weekly output of six films of all classes. Among these makers are Ambrosio—author of the remarkable 'Nero' film issued this week—Stella, and many others, everywhere recognized as being in the first rank, and with the improvements we are making in our own product, I am confident that we shall have a weekly list of films second to none in the trade for variety and quality."

"What improvements are intended in the Warwick films?"

"Well," said Mr. Smith, "we shall not rest satisfied until we have brought our pictures right up to the level of the Continental makers. To show you that we are not sparing pains in this direction, I may tell you that Mr. W. C. Jeapes has rejoined the company as engineer, with the intention of devoting practically all his time to finding improvements in the dark room apparatus and to undertake research work in the photographic department so as to secure a steadier picture and better quality. Although he has only been a short time at work, several important modifications in our cameras, perforators, printers, etc., have been made at his suggestion, and one or two trial subjects made by the new system are really winderfully steady and clear. I do not, however, want to say too much about this at present, perferring to wait until we are prepared to place the results before the showmen.

"Anything new about the Cinephone?"

"No, except that we are pushing it with all the vigor we possess, and that we shall in future issue one or more new subjects every week."

Supplementing our chat with Mr. Smith by a call upon Mr. Jeapes, we soon had evidence that the Warwick have secured a gentleman with unusually good qualifications for the work he has undertaken. Mr. Jeapes holds we should not care to say how many patents in connection with various trades, and joining the film business in its very early days, soon turned his inventive talent to account by producing an arc lamp with a greatly improved carbon holder—this improvement has now been adopted by practically every arc lamp maker. Later he produced a projector giving a remarkably steady picture, which was used successfully in some of the most popular halls in London.—The Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

I began these paragraphs last week with the remark, "Color is in the air just now." When I wrote I was to some extent drawing a bow at a venture. I was basing that opinion simply upon the records—the printed records of what was happening in this matter in various parts of the world. But since the last number of The Moving Picture World was printed and circulated I have been in personal touch with many men in New York City, men of international importance in the worlds of science and of the moving picture, and I am agreeably astonished at the amount of real interest, real intelligent interest which exists in the matter. This question, then, of the making of moving pictures in natural colors has passed out of the domain of mere ill-informed journalese and has assumed the aspect of a practical problem being attacked by practical men.

It is astonishing how wide the field is for careful investigation and research in this matter of the making of moving pictures in natural colors. Last week, it will be remembered, I pointed out that the two methods now before the public—the Friese-Greene process and the Urban-Smith process rely more or less upon the Clark-Maxwell theory of trichromatics for their rationale. The process which is to be shown in New York City next week, and of which, by the way, let it be said I have not yet seen specimens, may be called, for convenience sake, a physical process or rather a chemico-physico process, in that it does not depend for the production of color upon pigmentary means. In other words, the silver salt which forms the image is not in itself changed in color, but is colored before it reached the screen by filters and color in the light. This, I think, gives the process the character of a chemico-physico process.

But it has been overlooked by experimenters in the making of moving pictures in natural colors that there is still a great tract of almost virgin ground for them to traverse in the chemistry of the subject. And by the chemistry of the subject I mean direct experiment on the silver itself, so that either by light action and development alone, or by suitable supplementary means, your final deposit in the film will be a natural color one.

Now all this, of course, to present-day workers in this field must look very speculative indeed. Some of those, indeed, who read this may put down this paragraph with the conviction that I am drawing on my imagination in the matter. Not so, however. I have in mind a series of very beautiful experiments published twenty-three years ago in the "American Journal of Science" by Matthew Carey Lea, a renowned American chemist who lived in Philadelphia. To Carey Lea, as anybody acquainted with the science of photography will readily agree, the world owes some indebtedness for many useful practical discoveries in the way of making gelatine emulsion; developing; printing, and the like. Lea was a man of great culture and philosophic mind, and in the course of his experiments he attacked the natural color problem in a profoundly original way—in such an original way that it showed he was a man of far-reaching ideas.

Carey Lea took metallic or pigmentary or deposited silver, as it is usually called, in other words, silver reduced by a photographic developer and light, and he changed that silver by organic means, that is to say, by the addition of an organic substance to it, heating and other treatment—he changed that black silver into a variety of colors which he called silver lakes. He got blue, red, yellow, pink, and green. He so altered the constitution of metallic silver that instead of being a simple monochromatic substance it exhibited all the characteristics of a polychromatic body. In other words, it reflected all the spectrum colors to the eye.

Nor was that all. Lea also carried out another series of very beautiful experiments which, though they have an indirect bearing on this color problem, have an even wider interest in that they point to the perfect feasibility of the transmutation of metals. In other words, the changing of the baser metals into gold. Lea took metallic silver and by a combination of chemical experiments he so changed the optical or rather visual appearance of silver that it looked like gold. Indeed, I believe—and here I would like the reader to feel that I am writing entirely from memory—indeed, the physical properties of silver under Lea's hands underwent a total change.

The first named set of experiments of Carey Lea's were received at the time with great applause. So far as I can recollect they were never duplicated, because twelve or fifteen years ago people began to take up the Clark-Maxwell trichromatic theory, which holds the field in practice just now. But there stands Carey Lea's records and experiments for all men to take up and follow. I saw some of these color-silver pictures in London and I was much struck by their beauty. As we have it on excellent authority that there are many persons in this country experimenting on moving pictures in natural colors, no doubt they will thank me for these references. Let them, then, turn up the "American Journal of Science" for the year 1887—not overlooking 1886—and they then will find Carey Lea's magnificent articles on allatropic silver, the photo chlorides and collodial silver. This information, as I reminded the reader of this column last week, is available at any scientific library.

Here in Lea's work we have a definite finger pointing towards the feasibility of moving picture color photography in the direct or pigmentary way. In other words, that your film itself may be made to record color, which is getting down to the very foundation of the problem. I am sick and tired of hearing that this and the other man of business is spending or has spent tens of thousands of dollars in the work, and not getting any results. I am sick and tired of hearing that these men who have caused this grossly sinful waste of good money are nothing but quacks, empirics, and charlatans, ignorant of such splendid experimental work as Carey Lea's and others; ignorant of the first principles of chemistry and physics, and ignorant of the very meaning of the word "color" or " light" or the inter-relation of one with the other. I am sick and tired of reading of all this pitiful waste and unblushing fraud with good experimental work lying dormant and qualified men ready and willing to carry out the work.

I have heard of one company in New York City which has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in this foolish quest. I call it foolish because the men who have wasted the money are ignorant of what has been done before. There is yet another company which I am credibly informed has wasted thousands of dollars within the last few months and is wasting it at this moment because it is being deceived by an empiric. I have had men come up to me in New York City and tell me what they have been attempting and who, when I have asked them a few question on the subject, have shown such amazing ignorance of it that I am surprised they have deceived even a schoolboy. But that is the way of the world. It is too often the case that the empiric flourishes whilst the men of worth and knowledge are overlooked in the mad race for fame and money, which is one of the characteristics of the age.

THE PATHE FILM D'ART.

An impression having got abroad that Pathes have ceased releasing the pictures of the celebrated film d'art kind which have been so popular with the moving picture public this past season, we take the opportunity of removing that impression by a definite statement to the contrary. The Pathe films d'art will be released as hitherto. They are, as most of our readers are aware, made in Paris by an organization formed especially for the purpose. The actors and the other talent in this organization are now at the command of Messrs. Pathe, who are busily engaged in making the photographs for early releases in this country. A film d'art is a popular feature with several companies who make a specialty of it, and the Pathe has a place of its own which it will continue to occupy.

THE LUX FILMS.

In a few days the Lux films will be placed in the order of regular releases. Our next number will contain a critical review of some of the pictures.

EDISON MANUFACTURING COMPANY ANNOUNCES GRAND OPERA RELEASE.

On December 24 the Edison Manufacturing Company will release the first of the series of their Grand Opera subjects to be presented during the winter season. "Faust" is the subject chosen for the first release and as unusual pains and expense have been gone to in order to give the opera a fitting dramatization much is expected of this film.

THE LUMIERE COMPANY.

A wrong impression has spread abroad that the Lumiere Company, of Lyons, France, are now producing moving picture films for exhibition. Mr. J. E. Brulatour, the American agent for the Lumiere products, is also agent for the films of Theophile Pathe, of Paris. In advertising these films in this country the name of Lumiere-Pathe was linked, which gave the impression that the two French concerns were united. As a matter of fact, the Lumiere factory at Lyons manufactures exclusively the sensitized product, and has no connection with the Theo Pathe producing plant in Paris. We are glad to make this explanation in justice to the Lumiere Bros., as the beautiful photography that we have seen in some films that were issued by them several years ago is not visible in the work that is now being done by the Theo Pathe concern. The lovers of the beautiful in photography would certainly like to see the Lumiere concern again enter the producing field, and there is a rumor to that effect.

The Cherry Mine Disaster, the greatest calamity since the San Francisco earthquake, is the subject of a most remarkable set of slides, taken on the grounds by the staff photographers of the Chicago Examiner, and the exclusive rights secured by the Brayton Manufacturing Company of Chicago. The set consists of 36 slides of exceptional photographic quality, giving the most realistic account of the disaster in all its horror. They show the work of the rescuers as they bring to the surface those fortunate ones who were rescued alive, as well as those who have been restored to their families lifeless and distorted by hunger and a horrible reality of being buried alive. Pictures of wives and children, parents and friends of the unfortunate crowding about the mouth of the mine anxiously waiting for news of the dear ones, ever hopeful against hope that the cruel fate may have spared their lives, standing in line waiting for soldiers to march them along the row of ghastly remains, trying to identify their own. Words can hardly describe or even give a fair idea of the scenes; they must be seen in order to fully realize the intensity of the tragedy. The Rice Cherry pictures are exhibited in all the leading theaters on State street, among others the Bijou Dream, Premier, Boston on Madison street, and others. The slides are copyrighted and can only be secured through the Brayton Manufacturing Company of Chicago.

Levi & Company, inc., 24 Union Square, New York City, whose Perfection song slides are so popular in the moving picture theaters of the country, are making an offer to exhibitors which the latter should take advantage of. The Levi Company offer the exhibitor a free song slide service. In order to ascertain the particulars of that offer exhibitors are invited to call at 24 Union Square, New York City, and investigate the terms of the offer for themselves. We know them, and the offer strikes us as an exceedingly attractive one which no up-to-date exhibitor would dream of refusing. The Levi Song Slides are well worth the money ordinarily charged for them, but when they are to be had free they become very tempting indeed to an exhibitor anxious to minimize his expenses. We take this opportunity of saying that the good quality of the Levi slides has increased greatly during the past few months, and we notice that in the various moving picture houses in which they are shown they are always highly appreciated.

A SONG SLIDE EXCHANGE ON FOURTEENTH STREET.

A complete and right-up-to-the-minute song slide exchange in the vicinity of Fourteenth street, New York City, has at last become a reality, the Novelty Slide Company having opened a branch office at 10 East Fourteenth street, Room 25. This office is well stocked with the very latest illustrated song slides, travelogues, and lecturettes. A full line of "Novelty" announcement slides is also carried on hand, as well as other "Novelty" moving picture specialties. Being centrally situated in the moving picture district, this exchange offers every convenience to the busy exhibitor, operator or illustrated singer. Each and every customer is assured of prompt, courteous treatment, combined with good service; full information concerning rates, etc., is cheerfully furnished to all interested, upon application.

Pharaoh Decrees Death of Male Children.

SCENE FROM "THE LIFE OF MOSES."

The above scene, from the film of "The Life of Moses," gives a faint idea of the fine photographic quality and scenic beauty of this Vitagraph series of Biblical pictures. Probably no undertaking by any film manufacturer is so unique in character and outstanding in importance. It may give an idea of the great pains taken to make this series of pictures the best that the art can produce when we learn that the work is often done over again. The negative for the second series in the "Life of Moses" was discarded after the first print was seen on the screen and all the scenes had to be taken over again at enormous expense. It ought to silence those critics who say that the licensed manufacturers are not competing with each other, as well as with the whole world, when we say that the slight blemishes causing the rejection of the negative would have been overlooked a year ago. Yes, indeed, quality is the competitive standard of to-day.

Following the "Life of Moses" other Biblical characters will be taken up, and it looks as if the Vitagraph Company will have the important field of religious pictures all to themselves.

* * *

A company of Vitagraph producers will leave for the picturesque and unphotographed islands of the West Indies in a few months. The object is to secure natural settings for some fresh and stirring stories.

Comments on the Week's Films

"Judgment" (Biograph).—Someone has said that even though a murderer or other criminal is never punished by the law he is punished by his own conscience in the fate which pursues him to his death, regardless of what the world may think of him. This excellent picture from the Biograph studio is based upon a supposition of that character. It is a Western drama, filled with the rush and whirl of the life of the plains. With it is woven a love story upon which is based the drama. An innocent man is accused of a murder and lynched to get him out of the way and obtain a girl's consent to marriage. But even though the murderer succeeds in eluding justice and in having the punishment for a crime fastened upon an innocent man, he cannot free his own concience from the influence of the crime, and eventually, with his partner, hurls himself to death over a precipice. This tragedy has nothing mawkish about it. There is no foolish shedding of tears or any sentimental attempt to free one criminal or to influence those most interested. It is a picture of what remorse will do for a man who has committed, or who has been instrumental in having committed, an awful crime. He is fitly punished, but by the hand of fate, which is far more relentless than the hand of man in this instance. The dramatic situations are numerous and are well interpreted, while the photography is clear. The details are worked out with fidelity and there is a convincing character to the whole picture which carries strong weight with the audience.

"The Mixup at Court" (Gaumont).—A picture which is amusing in its incongruity. It concerns an irritable nobleman who orders a wandering musician thrown out of his castle. But the tramp discovers that he strongly resembles the nobleman, and acquiring some of the nobleman's clothes he goes to the king's court and poses as the nobleman. He deceives everyone, the only difference being that where the nobleman is irritable and fault-finding the impostor is amiable and attractive. In the midst of the festivities the real nobleman appears and denounces the disguised tramp as an impostor. To prove his own claim he sends for his old nurse, who says he has a birthmark upon his knee. But to everyone's astonishment the disguised musician displays a similar mark. It ends in the real nobleman being kicked out of the king's court as an impostor because they preferred the man with the good nature.

"The Village Scare" (Gaumont).—A quiet country village is thrown into a terrible uproar by the sudden appearance of an animal which has a wolf's body, but is covered with feathers. After they have consulted a very learned professor and he has told them what a fierce animal this is, the entire population turns out to hunt the beast. The picturesque scenery through which this hunt carries them is attractive. But everybody is relieved when they discover that it is only the mayor's dog, to which the children have applied a coat of feathers. The film is very amusing, and the actions of the brave (?) policemen and others while hunting the supposedly fierce brute are finished bits of acting.

"Chinese Amusements" (Pathe).—A reproduction of some of the amusements of China, which afford an accurate representation of the more common and attractive amusements as seen in that great empire. The work is excellent, like all the work on the Pathe films, and the picture has proved a strong attraction wherever it has been shown.

"Mixed Letters" (Pathe).—Arthur mixes his letters and envelopes with amusing results. All through the picture he is chasing the wrong letter, and without any question is going some. The picture is amusing and shows what funny results may come from making a mistake. It is technically up to the Pathe standard and will prove a fun-producer on all screens.

"Jean Valjean" (Vitagraph).—The fourth and last film de luxe from this house dealing with the incidents from Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables." It depicts the closing scenes of the story and concludes with the death of Jean and the marriage of Cosette. The characters are all accounted for, and while the story has been altered in some degree to give it more dramatic force and to clarify it somewhat for the silent stage, it is sufficiently accurate to enable one to trace it without difficulty. The film is complete in itself, though it is the concluding one of the excellent series which has attracted so much favorable comment from lovers of the novel and from the enthusiasts in motion pictures. It is needless to repeat the story. Almost everyone has read the novel and understands what these interpretations mean. The acting is up to the standard of the former pictures of the same subject and the photography is clear in most instances. The escape through the sewer is well managed, and there are other scenes in which the dramatic situations are fully developed.

"A Trick that Failed" (Biograph).—While this film is set down as a drama, it is really a comedy drama, and contains some amusing situations, which do not conclude with entire satisfaction to at least one of the parties involved. Here is a girl who is a deplorably bad painter, but notwithstanding the fact that her art dealer cannot sell any of her work, she persists in carrying him more and more, each one apparently worse than the one preceding. Two artists are desperately in love with her, and when one proposes she tells him that she will not marry him unless she can sell her paintings. He conceives the scheme of supplying money to buy them, and sends his valet and others to make the purchases. She is told of her good fortune, receives her money and hurries away to tell her lover, only to discover a pile of her paintings in his studio. Angered at being fooled in that way, she dashes out of the house, and accepts his rival, who proposes to her that night. If anyone could conceive a more satisfactory complication for a motion picture, he is a good one. This picture is as good as any light comedy the Biograph people have ever produced, and it leaves the audience in good humor, though as much cannot be said of the artist who loses the girl he wanted. Such a drama as this, with a bit of piquancy interlarded, seems to be acceptable to a large proportion of motion picture audiences.

"In the Window Recess" (Biograph).—Here is a strongly dramatic picture and one which has an irresistible appeal to most who see it. An escaped convict rushes into a policeman's home, catches the child, hides in a window recess, and threatens to shoot the child if the mother tells where he is. The officer comes in, sees the convict's hat on the floor, and begins upbraiding his wife for receiving company. She, mindful of the convict's threat, dare not tell, but the officer, maddened by his wife's silence, dashes into the window and seizes the convict so suddenly that he has no opportunity to carry out his threat. The film is dramatic, the facial expressions upon the various countenances clearly depicting what is passing in their minds. The company has developed the dramatic possibilities as far as they could, making of this an interesting picture and one that will remain in the memory.

"Brought to Terms" (Selig).—It has been said that it takes this house to think up some absurd picture which will create roars of laughter and prove a travesty upon some subject. Here is a group of husbands huddled in a room with their numerous progeny, while their termagant better-halves discuss methods of more effectually subjugating these unfortunate individuals. One has a brilliant idea. He makes a hurried exit through a window, purchases a number of rats, returns, and cautiously opening the door, allows the rats to escape into the room where the women are vociferously determining what shall be done further with their husbands. The meeting breaks up forthwith and the women carry home the children. The rats carry the day without as much as a word of argument.

"Making It Pleasant for Him" (Selig).—A comedy drama from Selig which clearly portrays the adventures of a country chap who falls into the hands of the servants of his city cousin, who has instructed them to make it pleasant for him. No use trying to explain the different methods utilized in this interesting process. The most that can be said is that they succeed admirably in obeying the injunctions of their mistress, and the unsophisticated Rube has the time of his life.

"A Life for a Life" (Lubin).—A pathetic drama which depicts the agony of a heartbroken girl who is untrue to her vows and falls in love with an officer after she is engaged to a fisherman. When the waves bring back the young fisherman's body she finds that he is the one she loved, and throwing herself across his body she dies with him; thus the two lovers are united in death. It is useless to undertake any extended criticism of this film. Anything which depicts the struggles arising from trifling with the affections scarcely admits of criticism, beyond the general statement that the delineation seems to be reasonably accurate. The dramatic possibilities are well worked out and the story is told with clearness of acting which helps in the understanding and appreciation of it.

"A Bunch of Lilacs" (Pathe).—A pathetic little drama, showing two orphans arrested for stealing lilacs from a public park to decorate their mother's grave. But their story causes the veteran watchman to take them to his own home, where they are adopted as his own. The picture thus ends happily, albeit the sombre beginning brings the tears. The unfortunate thing is that such scenes are far too numerous in real life. And undoubtedly these pictures do much good in bringing scenes like this to the attention of those who never seem to discover what is going on around them. The photography is clear and the reproduction of the lilacs is so natural that one almost imagines the sweet perfume fills the theater.

"Spanish Marriage" (Pathe).—One of those pictures which depict a phase of foreign life that seems wholly foreign to America and American ways. Here is a girl who marries a Frenchman, leaving her Spanish lover, only to leave her French husband and go back to her Spanish lover. It gives a clear idea of how lightly some of the more serious phases of life are considered by these pleasure-loving people. There are some scenes of beauty in the film and the action is quite in harmony with the subject. It is entertaining, and in a degree instructive, illustrating characteristics which are difficult to understand in this country.

"A Rose of the Tenderloin" (Edison).—A delightful study of life in that famous section of New York known as the Tenderloin, where all that is bad seems to dwell, but where warm hearts beat within rough breasts and the cry of anguish or the stroke of sorrow is met quite the same as it is everywhere else. Edward W. Townsend knows his subject. He knows the life of which he writes, and in this picture he has produced a story, simple and interesting and strong—strong with the heart interest and the human pathos which makes all stories of this character universally loved. Here are the types which frequent the Tenderloin—the gambler, the outcast woman, and the betting crowd of young men who apparently never knew a care or sorrow. And when the woman dies and leaves a beautiful little daughter, a gambler takes her to his home to care for her. But her wealthy relatives take her away. He, though allowing her to go, does so only because of a clause in her mother's last letter which appeals to his better nature and convinces him that it is better for the child. Even here among the shadows there are lights, lights of love, and devotion which shine quite as brightly as they do in the more favored portions of the city. The parting between the gambler and the child, leaving him heartbroken because the only ray of light his life ever knew was going out, is touching, and cannot fail to moisten the eyes of all who see it. The picture is strong in the pathos of human life and because of this carries an irresistible appeal to every person whose blood flows red.

"Belle of the Harvest" (Urban).—A drama of rural life which will probably attract because of its beautiful rural scenes rather than any special merit contained in the play itself. The two peasants almost wreck their happy home through their individual dealings, but fortunately the difficulties are all straightened out before anything so serious actually occurs. The depiction of rural scenes is masterly, and while there is much in the acting that is commendable, there is no reason to change the opinion originally expressed, that the picture will stand upon its merits as a picture rather than upon the character and quality of its acting.

"Marriage of Love" (Urban).—A film of unusual beauty. The title correctly describes it, and the acting of the characters, with all their surroundings, illustrates this one thought. It is useless to attempt a criticism. There are some pictures which cannot be criticised, and this belongs to that class. It illustrates exactly what its title indicates. A stronger statement of its character and its quality could not be made. Audiences like such pictures, and this is no exception to the rule.

"Why They Married" (Vitagraph).—A series of pictures representing weddings and their results. One girl married for money and lost her husband and her money within the first year, leaving her penniless and alone. Another married a sporting man and before the year ended was washing to support herself and furnish him money to bet on horses at the poolroom. Another married to reform a drunkard, with the usual result, even though she is surrounded by every evidence of luxury and comfort. Another married because she loved Jim, and when he discovered that his salary had been raised he rushed away to tell her and place a ring upon her finger. And a year afterward there was a little one and the home was as bright as could be with the three people in it. The lesson is obvious, and is so plainly worked out that anyone can recognize its truth. The simplest things of life are the best, and unquestionably are always truest. The film may well be studied by prospective brides, and grooms, too, for that matter. It contains much of interest to them both, even though it is veiled under sarcasm in some places and tender love stories in others.

"In the Consomme" (Gaumont).—A rather coarse comedy which never fails to bring shouts of laughter. That a man can swallow a sponge which will soak up a large quantity of liquid may be wholly incredible, yet the way it is worked out here is sufficiently funny to make everybody roar, though while this is true there is a certain sense of impropriety in the final scene, where the liquid is spurting in streams from the man's body. These somewhat broadly humorous pictures are among the most attractive in the motion picture field, and wherever they are shown are certain to brings rounds of applause.

"The Broken Vase" (Gaumont).—While the picture presents a somewhat humorous turn, the fact that one man undertakes to present another with a broken vase is scarcely as funny as it is insulting, and when the economical donor is thrown out of the house everyone can fully sympathize with the man who does it.

"The Heart of a Clown" (Edison).—A picture in which comedy and pathos are blended. A fun maker, filled with anxiety and fear over the illness of his daughter, appears in the circus ring and performs his part to the satisfaction of the audience. But the revelation of the pathetic side of the man, that side which tells the story of parental solicitude, is tender and appealing. It is interesting and, perhaps, in a certain sense, is a remarkable interpretation of the heart of a man. The audience is glad, however, when the film ends happily and the clown is free from his anxiety and fear when he departs for other fields to give his show.

"The Wonderful Electro-Magnet" (Edison).—An ingenious scheme for attracting the crowds. A motion picture man uses it with surprising results and a young minister does the same. It attracts passers whether they will or not, consequently amusing complications arise and the fun is hilarious without being offensive. It is one of those trick films which seem satisfactory and which develop funny situations regardless of the environment or the uncertain element which sometimes controls people's actions.

"The Bridegroom's Joke" (Vitagraph).—A delightful bit of real comedy, played with all the skill of the Vitagraph actors. A bridegroom succeeds in turning a joke upon four of his friends by sending them on a false errand and when they enter the room to see why the bride and groom have not appeared are liberally sprinkled with the hose. It is impossible to adequately describe such a picture. But the humor of the situation is contagious and everybody laughs at the discomfiture of the four mischief makers.

"Dirigible Balloons at St. Louis" (Vitagraph).—Interesting pictures made at the last meeting of the Aero Club, at St. Louis, when Ivy Baldwin, Roy Knabenshue, Robinson and Leo Stevens were photographed in their dirigibles. There expert operator as well as electrician, also a member of are pictures of the men, the machines, the starts, the flights and the landings. These last are the first pictures ever made of a descent and are, therefore, of great interest. This feature is of especial interest, since it proves that the pilots are able to land their balloons wherever they choose. Another interesting point is the picture of two balloons sufficiently close together to be photographed at the same time. Altogether the Vitagraph people are to be congratulated for their contribution to the pictured history of aviation.

"Consul Crosses the Atlantic" (Urban).—Story of a wonderful man-like ape which recently came to this country. This film depicts his daily life on board ship and his actions are so man-like and entertaining that it seems well nigh incredible that a monkey could do so much. Nevertheless, here is the motion picture reproducing before the eyes of the assembled multitudes the life this ape led and showing so clearly that it seems almost as though the ape were actually before one what he did and how he did it. For this reason the film is unusually entertaining and is educational as well. The intelligence displayed is little short of marvelous and the fidelity with which the scenes are reproduced is sufficiently accurate to be satisfying. It may be interesting to know that this interesting film was secured by Mr. Chas. Urban himself, who happened to be crossing the Atlantic on the same steamer as Consul and was not premeditated.

"Fortune Favors the Brave" (Melies).—Here is a story which will please the boys and others who firmly believe that nothing is impossible for those who are determined to succeed. A boy starts out to obtain a treasure which has defied the efforts of many who have attempted a similar thing. But nothing daunted he keeps on, slaying some of the monsters in his path and frightening others away, until he succeeds in securing the treasure and returns home with sufficient gold to make his people wealthy all their lives. While this may be more or less of a story, unquestionably it is in a degree a true transcript of the life of the average man. He who goes forward regardless of the dangers that lurk in his path, and brushing aside the monsters that beset him is certain to win. In the long run his success is assured. And while this film may have been intended to be entertaining only unquestionably it teaches this important lesson.

"Seein' Things" (Melies).—Everyone who sees this picture will have to laugh, even though he may object to making sport of the weakness of a man unfortunate enough to be addicted to too much liquor. When he undertakes to locate the keyhole in his door there is fun and when he begins to see things double it increases and when he chases the one servant, thinking there are two, it becomes fast and furious. And the last final plunge through the window is extremely funny because the servant is seen hanging from a hook, while the unfortunate individual whose eyesight was multiplied strikes the sidewalk. While photography and technical quality are both satisfactory, the value of this picture as an influence upon young people and others may well be questioned. Sometimes this influence is subtle and invisible, but perhaps none the less strong.

"Two Sides to a Story" (Essanay).—Billiken is a widower. He seeks consolation at the seashore and discovers it in a widow who looks young and winsome. He proposes and is accepted. But Billiken is absentminded. He neglects to say that he has seven small sized Billikens at home. And what is even more strange the winsome widow is also absentminded and forgets to mention the six young people at home. After the ceremony their consciences arouse themselves, shake off the stupor into which they had fallen and the two start from their homes to seek forgiveness for the palpable deception. They meet half way and both look with consternation upon the multitude of youngsters. The little folks appreciate the humor of the situation and encircle their elders in a vigorous game of ring-round-a-rosy. They decide to make the best of it and depart for the Billiken home, followed by all the young people. The facial expressions when the mutual discovery is made are interesting. The picture as a who is full of life and activity and develops a good deal of fun before it closes.

"Baby Swallows a Nickel" (Essanay).—Here is a comedy which is almost a farce, but is in reality drawn true to life. The baby didn't swallow a nickel. Her older sister took it to buy candy, but the mother inferred that she had swallowed it because it was missing. The doctors come by the half dozen and the gravest sort of consultations occur as to the best way to secure the nickel. But the sister appears at this juncture and holds up a bag of candy which she confesses was purchased with the lost nickel. The sister gets a spanking. The doctors leave in disgust and the spanked sister is forced to endure the unspeakable torture of watching the baby eat the candy. It is all very funny and the photography is so clear that every object shows clearly and distinctly.

"The Wolf Hunt" (Pathe).—A picture illustrating a Western episode. A wolf leads the cowboys a wild chase after having stolen the child. But he loses his head and after the thrilling runs it is worth something to see his head mounted upon a stump. The race seems true to life and has numerous thrilling moments in it.

"Legend of Orpheus" (Pathe).—A beautifully colored illustration of the old Greek legend. It will be remembered that Orpheus was the one whose music was so forceful that it compelled everything, even the stones, to follow him. He seeks in Hades for his wife, Eurydice, and is permitted to take her back to earth, provided he will not look upon her face until they reach the earth. He keeps his vow until they are almost back, but because of her supplications he turns to look at her and immediately she is torn from his arms, but by the intervention of Cupid is restored to him and the happy couple remain long upon earth. While this film is all that could possibly be desired so far as technical work is concerned there is some question as to whether it is understood by a majority in the average audience. Perhaps they enjoy it as a picture, but they scarcely appreciate its significance or its legendary value as a myth of the olden time. Not that the work is entirely lost, still there is a feeling that something which is filled with riotous action is appreciated more fully than this film. The educated will see this and understand it, while its artistic excellence will appeal to them, but the proportion of such people who see films is small, yet is daily increasing, and perhaps the fact that such firms as the Pathes reproduce such legends as this will have a strong influence in improving motion picture audiences.

"The Sleeper" (Pathe).—A hypnotist puts a farmer's wife to sleep for six months. The farmer turns the incident to good advantage and reaps a harvest of shekels from it. The film has some funny incidents and some that possess little point. As a whole, however, it is an amusing picture, and like all the Pathe productions the photography is clear and good.

"Her Generous Way" (Imp).—Charity carried to excess might develop into something like the generosity illustrated in this film. Here is a woman who actually gives away the money obtained from her husband for a new hat. Seems incredible, doesn't it? Yet this is done so naturally that no one seems to take it amiss or think it is anything extraordinary. And her extreme generosity develops such a series of amusing incidents that the audience is kept in good humor throughout the entire thousand feet of the full reel. It is a dangerous experiment, by the way, to undertake to stretch a comedy like that, but in this instance it has been done with success. The photography is improved, as compared with previous films from this house, and the entire picture keeps the audience in laughing humor from start to finish.

"The Legend of the Good Knight" (Eclair).—A great improvement dramatically and photographically upon many pictures brought out by this house. The story is simple. A knight rescues a young queen from the hands of two ruthless lords who plot to dispose of her and rule her kingdom. In all the scenes excepting one the photographic quality is above the average. One outdoor scene is seriously marred by halation, and it would be worth while for the house to reproduce it and put it in again. It is too bad that an otherwise excellent piece of photographic work should be marred by this one scene. The setting is picturesque, being about an old castle which shows the marks of age and the evidences of decay. The acting is better than the usual picture from this house. The leading part is acted by Harry Baur, from the Odeon, Paris, and in the main the other characters are quite up to his standard, or, as they would say in the theater, the other characters support him well. Taken altogether, this picture is entertaining, and when the two lords are thrown down the open trap by the vigorous knight the audience applauds roundly.

"A Girl's Cross Roads" (Great Northern).—A story of a downward career in a young woman's case which ends in a low dive, with madness and death in a hospital. So far as the technical quality and the acting are concerned, this picture need not be criticised. But sometimes as one sees these pictures one wonders to what purpose they are made. They are not entertaining, and the chances are very strongly against anyone who has begun such a career being turned back by a reproduction of the probable end in a motion picture. Often it seems like a waste of effort. The same money and time and ability bestowed upon a picture that would amuse the audience would do more good in that direction, at least, and it is probable that the moral influence would be quite as great.

"The Love of Little Flora" (Itala).—A somewhat thrilling story of a girl rescued from the cruelty of a traveling showgirl's life by a young man, whom she worships, but realizes she can never have because he already belongs to another. She flees from him and returns to the old life, but his appearance in a box at the performance so unnerves her that she falls from the trapeze and is fatally hurt, dying in the arms of the man she loved. Photographically this is an improvement on most Itala films previously released, yet in places some blurring results from permitting the actors to come too close to the camera without changing the focus. The interiors are reasonably clear. The acting is in harmony with the subject, but seems a bit uneven and jerky in places, which might be remedied by a bit more deliberation. As a whole, however, the picture is quite satisfactory.

"Miracle of a Necklace" (Le Lux).—This picture deals with one of those delicate subjects connected with the church that one almost hesitates to undertake to say much about. The substance of the story is that a starving musician entering a church to offer his devotions before the Virgin, is given the necklace suspended around her neck. He disposes of it to obtain money with which to buy food; is arrested, tried, convicted and sentenced to execution, but before the headsman can do his work the Virgin appears and places the necklace again around his neck, and assists him to escape before the officials recover from their consternation. Whether it is wise to undertake to devolp a subject so intimately connected with a religious belief of millions of people is a question which will never be decided. In this particular instance nothing is done that is in any degree sacrilegious, and perhaps a film of this character will exert a beneficial influence upon many who see it. The acting is dignified and quite in harmony with the subject, and this is admorably contrasted with the frenzied appeals of the prisoner. The photography is an improvement over much of this firm's previous work, nearly the whole film being clear and correct in tone. Apart from the particular religious note the film is to be commended. This each individual must settle for himself.

JUDGE CHATFIELD'S DECISION.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT,
Eastern District of New York.
MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY, vs.
NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE COMPANY.
Nov. 23, 1909.
Richard N. Dyer, for complainant.
Emerson R. Newell, for defendant.
CHATFIELD, J.

The complainant has brought an action upon an adjudicated patent, with respect to a certain form of camera, alleging that the defendant is wrongfully using another style of camera, but with certain attachments, which the complainant shows are similar in character and use to those as to which the patent above referred to was held valid and infringed. For the purposes of this application for a preliminary injunction, the defendant has not controverted the validity of the patent, nor questioned the similarity of the particular style of camera claimed to be an infringement, to the camera enjoined in the adjudicated case. It has confined its opposition to a denial of the allegations of infringing use with any camera belonging to or used by the defendant. A re-argument was had, and further affidavits were submitted to explain certain matters connected with the trial of a shutter, offered for sale at about the date in question. But the whole issue now comes down to a flat allegation on the part of the complainant, by two witnesses, to the effect that, on a certain day, one of the defendant's representatives was taking pictures with a camera, which the affiants allege was similar in all respects to the one alleged by the complainant to be an infringement, and a statement by one of those affiants as to seeing, in a safe at the defendant's office, a camera which appeared, from external observation, to be the sort of camera the use of which is alleged by the complainant and denied by the defendant.

Assuming that the complainant is charging use upon other occasions than those as to which the immaterial disputes have arisen, and assuming that the defendant has a camera, and has made use of the camera, which was thought by the persons making the affidavits to be an infringement, the question ultimately depends upon whether the defendant should be compelled to exhibit this camera, or whatever cameras it may have, and in default of so doing, whether a temporary injunction should issue.

It is also urged by the complainant that an injunction against infringing use will not interfere with any lawful business on the part of the defendant, if it is not infringing. The defendant opposes being enjoined by protestations on general principles, and by innuendo on the ground that the complainant company is pursuing this method for the sake of harassing the defendant and causing it expense. The defendants, while protesting against submitting its cameras for inspection, categorically denies the allegation that it has a camera of the particular kind which is alleged by the complainant to be an infringement.

This Court is unwilling upon application for a preliminary injunction, to decide even contingently or temporarily upon affidavits, what is substantially the issue itself of the case. It is not apparent that irreparable injury will be sustained while such a case as this is being tried, and the defendant does not seem to be of the elusive character which might require immediate action in order to prevent the risk of futility of any further determination.

This Court is not of the opinion that its process, in the form of injunction, should be issued, or be held against a party, possibly innocent of wrongdoing, merely upon the theory that, if innocent, no business operations will be in terms forbidden. The possibilities from advertising such an order, and of far-reaching and unfair consequences, outweigh the benefit, unless the Court is sufficiently satisfied that wrongdoing is shown, and is willing to issue an order forbidding the acts which it believes are wrong.

Motion for preliminary injunction, therefore, will be denied, but in view of the definite commercial character of the matters, this Court will listen to an application for a provision in the order, if the complainant so elects, requiring the defendant to give security, not to prevent the issuance of a temporary injunction, but to cover any instances of possible irreparable injury, if a decree should be obtained at final hearing. The amount of such bond can be determined upon the settlement of the order.

AMONG THE SHOWS.

By Oliver, Jr.

Brooklyn is rapidly becoming moving picturized; by that I mean, moving picture theaters are springing up all over this part of the greater city. Only recently a picture show at the corner of Hicks street and Atlantic avenue has been opened. It is called the Atlantic Moving Picture Theater. It cannot, with propriety, be called a theater, as the space it now occupies was formerly used as a store room. However, this place is proving to be a success for the manager, as every night it is crowded to the doors. It opens at 3 o'clock in the afternoon and gives a continuous performance until 11 P. M. The theater is above a saloon, and to go inside one has to mount a flight of stairs. This sort of picture house is not an ordinary sight in large cities, especially in a city like New York, where most of the houses are of a picturesque and attractive appearance. Of course we do not want to be too critical of the store show. The place is as clean and up-to-date as could be expected. If the proprietor erected an elaborate theater, something under the style of Keith & Proctor, the Dewey, the Fair, and the like, and charged ten cents admission, it would not be a paying investment for him, because the inhabitants of the vicinity would not patronize it as often as they do. The admission price is five cents. The performance consists of five different subjects—some are a week old, others a month or so—and an illustrated song. The Vitagraph film entitled "Launcelot and Elaine" was greatly appreciated and applauded. So was a comedy by the Gaumont Company under the title of "The Policeman's Wedding." The other films consisted of two Pathes and another from the Gaumont factory. Levi's set of slides, entitled "You've Got Me Going, Kid," was also much appreciated, and the audience joined in the chorus. Levi & Co. certainly deserve commendation for this set of slides. The photography and coloring, with the exception of a few minor blemishes, were excellent, and if we did not see the manufacturer's name on the title slide, it would be hard to tell from what high-class manufacturer it came.

The theater is visited by regular and transient patrons, who consist of about equal proportions of men, women and children. They are applausive and appreciative, and their coming to this theater every night indicates that a place of this form of amusement was greatly needed in this section of Brooklyn. The pictures are changed daily, and the manager sets aside a certain afternoon and an evening when souvenirs are given out to the ladies holding a card, the number upon which corresponds with the one attached to the souvenir.

The theater holds somewhere between 250 and 275 seats. The ventilation is good, and the operator runs his pictures steadily. The room is kept lighted by green and dark yellow lights during the performance. As the floor of this show is not inclined, the screen is elevated about five or six feet, so that people seated in the back can see the pictures.

The Royal Theater, located at the corner of Willoughby and Jay streets, Brooklyn, N. Y., which was formerly a burlesque house, has for the past year and a half given to the public moving pictures, vaudeville and song slides. It is situated in the heart of Brooklyn and is proving a paying investment for the managers. Its doors open at 1 P. M. and it gives a continuous performance until 11 P. M.

On my recent visit the theater was so crowded that I could not find a seat, but was given one by a courteous attendant, who upon inquiry told me that I was just in time as the entertainment was beginning on its second run. The first film was a Pathe, entitled "The Burglar in the Trunk." It was well received.

A feature of this theater is the talking pictures by the Royal Stock Company. A Biograph subject, entitled "Eradicating Aunty," was the picture talked with. Although this film is not of late issue, it certainly took well and was much applauded. The voices did not synchronize well with the characters on the sheet, but this had no displeasing effect upon the audience. This film also deserves commendation in regard to the acting and photographic quality.

The admission prices are 10 and 25 cents, and we are given a two-hour entertainment. The house is neatly kept, the ushers courteous and the pictures and slides were well shown.

Recently I visited Keith & Proctor's house on 125th street, New York City. This theater is always crowded to the doors and my friend and I had some difficulty in finding seats. The entertainment of this house consists of moving pictures, a travelogue and illustrated song slides. A comedy subject by the Lubin Company, entitled "The Blue Garter," pleased the audience very well. So was another Lubin comedy under the title of "Found in a Taxi."

The young man vocalist sang with perfect harmony to a beautifully colored set of slides by the Scott & Van Altena Company entitled "Underneath the Big Magnolia Tree." It was the best colored set of slides that we have seen in a long time, and the Scott & Van Altena Company deserve to be praised on their work.

A lecture on "The Land of the Midnight Sun" was successful. Although certain classes of people do not care for lectures, this one was appreciated here.

H. A. Spanuth, of the Dandy Film Exchange, 10 East 15th street, New York City, besides, as we announced last week, making a specialty of an up-to-date film service, is also featuring the Graphoview. This is a $25.00 outfit which shows moving pictures in the home, school or college, and therefore makes a bid for family use. An efficient machine of this kind should have a wide sale and we therefore recommend all interested to call on Mr. Spanuth at 10 East 15th street, New York City, and see a specimen. In the Moving Picture World during the past year, and indeed in this present issue, we put in a plea for the manufacture of a machine designed to bring the moving picture into the home circle. The Graphoview should do this and as there is a wide demand for machines of this character, no doubt the Dandy Film Exchange will be kept busy supplying the demand.

KALEM FILMS

Issue of Dec. 10, 1909

THE RALLY ROUND THE FLAG

LENGTH 955 FEET

"THE RALLY ROUND THE FLAG" will wind up the year 1909 for the moving picture theatres of the United States in a blaze of glory. It is the greatest, grandest and most impressive war picture ever turned out, and old G. A. R. men who have seen it say that it has the civil war atmosphere and spirit down to such an exactness that they can imagine that they recognize themselves and their comrades in the thrilling battle scenes which are the big feature of the film.

The story is satisfactory alike to the Blue and the Grey, for it depicts the heroism of both sides.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THROUGH THE BREAKERS.—Biograph story of the slaves of society. Undoubtedly the cardinal sin of society's devotees is neglect of the home. The obligations are so compelling that the undivided attention of its members is induced to the entire disregard of all things domestic. The earth sustained no two happier beings than Mr. and Mrs. Nostrand, when God's greatest gift, their first born, was bestowed. Life's vista seemed bathed in sunshine as their whole thoughts were centered in the little one. In fancy they saw it grow from infancy to girlhood and on to young womanhood. But, alas, how often do these anticipations go awry. Becoming more and more engrossed in the social whirl, they give the child over to the care of the governess, until eight years later we find the father's time entirely taken up at his club, while the mother devotes hers to whist parties. Alone, neglected and forlorn, the child, crushed in spirit, becomes seriously ill. The father is now alarmed in the child's behalf and insists that the mother stay at home and care for it. He reasons that that is what the little one most needs. He is the first to reproach himself for negligence, and tries to point this out to his wife, but she is not as perceptive, and attends the child in rather a half-hearted manner. She does not consider the child is as ill as they would make her believe, and chafes under the forced and, in her opinion, unreasonable demands. Nervous, tired and longing for diversion, she defiantly attends a fancy dress soiree. During her absence the child becomes worse, and the doctor tells the husband the end has come. Dispatching a servant for the mother, the doctor endeavors to keep life in the little form until she comes, but in vain, for the pure soul has departed when she arrives. The tie is broken, the husband leaves, and she now realizes how false and hollow is the world in which she had been living. She sees nothing beyond but expiation. But how can she expiate this sin of neglect? Her child dead, her husband gone, life is mantled by gloom. At the grave of the child we see the poor woman, with bruised heart, breathe forth prayers of contrition, when the husband, drawn by the same impulse, approaches. Softened by the same grief they are reunited, each blaming themselves for their own sorrow.

THE REDMAN'S VIEW.—The subject of the Redman's persecution has been so often the theme of story that it would appear an extreme exposition of egotism to say that this production is unique and novel, but such is the case, for there was never before presented a more beautiful depiction of the trials of the early Indians than this. It shows how the poor redskin was made to trek from place to place by the march of progress which was ever forging its way into the West. Tranquil is the existence of the Kiowa tribe which our story involves until the approach of the conquerors, the white men, who claim the land that had long been possessed by this tribe of Shoshone family. On this eventful day, Silver Eagle and Minnewanna plight their troth by the side of the mountain brook. They have hardly returned to the wigwam of the chief, Silver Eagle's father, when an Indian rushes up with the news that the paleface is coming. The little settlement is thrown into a panic of fearful anticipation, for they have endured many bitter experiences. Their fears are realized, for the white men appear and order the poor Indians to move. This they do with stoicism, and packing up their effects they start on the long trek. Minnewanna, however, is detained by the men to act as a slavey. Silver Eagle is at first inclined to remain by her side, but his sense of duty toward his father, the chief, who is very old and feeble, forces him to go with him. From place to place they migrate, only to be urged still further on by the relentless persecutions, until from the brow of a lofty mountain they exclaim, "Oh! morning sun light us on to a better land; a land where we may rest our heads." In the meantime little Minnewanna has tried to escape, but she has not gotten far when apprehended and brought back. The long journey proves too much for the old chief and he succumbs to the ordeal. As he dies the tribe chant the song of death. He is then interred according to the custom of the tribe. A bier is erected on stakes and covered with moss and leaves. On this the body is placed with his head to the east, a fire to light his way and food that he may not hunger. The son, Silver Eagle, now that his duty is fulfilled, dashes back after his little Indian sweetheart. His endeavors to steal her away are discovered and several of the men are about to despatch him, when another, more altruistic than the rest, interposes and bids the young brave take his squaw and go in peace, and we last see them with bowed heads at the bier of the chief. This subject portrays rather a new treatment of the Indian story, its poetic beauty being no small feature.

THE KEEPER OF THE LIGHT.—There have been many silent dramas produced whose themes are laid about the wave-swept shores that shield some lonely lighthouse and whose stories deal with the simple, uneventful lives of the rugged folk, the daily routine of whose duty begins and ends with the custody of the light. Unromantic though their existence may be in itself, there are occasional rifts in the routine that stand out all the more prominently because of their infrequency, and that afford material for the most powerful dramas because of the consequent impression, and often radical changes, they make in the lives of these plain, susceptible people. That this theme has not been worn threadbare is proven by the unusual strength of our new drama, "The Keeper of the Light," which breathes of life and love, hope and despair, hatred and forgiveness, reunion and happiness—all centered in three principal characters, whose field of action is the lighthouse shore and the deep, mysterious ocean that encompasses it. The picture abounds in dramatic scenes, each filled with that irresistible charm of unfathomable mystery that the awe and majesty of the ocean holds for us all. In the very simplicity of the story lies its chief charm.

An old lighthouse keeper's daughter falls in love with a fisher lad to whom her father objects. In the midst of a stolen interview the unhappy lovers are discovered by the father. Hot with anger at his daughter's disobedience and filled with unreasoning rage he turns the vials of his wrath upon the lad, and with bitter words drives him from the scene. Overcome by the excess of his emotions, the old keeper falls helpless with a paralytic stroke. The young fisher lad, discouraged and disheartened, ships on a long voyage. The lovers part, and on the lonely rocks we see the sweetheart waving her lover a sad good-bye as the ship sails away. Then follow weeks of silent waiting while the fisher lad plies his trade on the mighty deep and the maid performs the duties of the lighthouse, with a wistful eye ever turned toward the path of her lover's departure. In the silent watches of the night, as the pale moon sends its silvery rays across the troubled waters of the deep, we see the fisher lad tearfully kiss his sweetheart's farewell letter, his lips breathing a silent prayer for her welfare. A storm breaks upon the coast and, while the old lighthouse keeper sits helpless in his chair, the daughter flies the danger signal. A vessel is seen in distress. It goes down and, lantern in hand, the girl searches the shore for any unfortunates that might be washed upon its rocks. Stumbling over the rocks she finds her lover lashed to a spar, wave-swept and drowning. She assists him to the lighthouse where the father, his end drawing near, gives them his blessing before the light of day is forever closed to his eyes.

A silent drama, as simple and powerful in scene as it is absorbing in action, depicted by a capable company of artists and its effectiveness increased by a wealth of photographic quality such as is seldom found—such a film is "The Keeper of the Light," which we are confident will be received by trade and public with the appreciation it merits.

MY LORD IN LIVERY.—For several years "My Lord in Livery" has been one of the most successful comedies produced by amateur dramatic societies throughout the country. In reproducing this little play on a film the Edison Company have a picture that the thousands who have seen or played in the piece will be anxious to see.

The story runs as follows: Lord Thirlmere discovers his friend, Lord Tommy, kissing his sweetheart's photograph and makes him a wager that he will be able to secure one of her rings. The wager is laid and Lord Thirlmere sets out for the young lady's house. Before he arrives at her home she receives a letter from "A Devoted Friend" informing her of the wager and warning her that he is to gain admittance to her home disguised as a servant. Miss Sybil and her two chums decide to have a little fun at My Lord's expense, by disguising themselves as servants.

Unfortunately for the success of the experiment, Miss Sybil's father has that day engaged a new butler who, when he arrives, is mistaken for Lord Thirlmere; and when the real Lord Thirlmere arrives and gains admittance by bribing the new servant to change places with him, he is mistaken for a burglar and the police are sent for. The police arrive just as Lord Thirlmere obtains a ring from the thoroughly frightened Miss Sybil, and is about to leave. As he is being led off to jail Lord Tommy arrives and—well, the rest is easily guessed.

WHAT THE CARDS FORETOLD.—Very few people can resist the temptation to have their fortunes told, though they may scoff at the idea and claim that they don't believe in it.

Old Mammy Sue not only liked to have her fortune told, but believed implicitly in "What the Cards Foretold." One day she purchased a book instructing her how to tell fortunes by cards, and proceeded to tell her own. Now, any fortune teller will tell you that it is bad luck to tell your own fortune, and Mammy believes it now. The cards told of laughter, merriment, confusion and of money changing hands. It all happened just as the cards read, but the laughter and merriment were not Mammy's, although she was a most important contributing factor. She also figured pretty prominently in, and perhaps caused much of, the confusion. She was there when the money changed hands, too, but it didn't come Mammy's way by any means—it went to pay her fine at the police station. The laughter and merriment, as told by the cards, can be taken in two ways: One, that it was enjoyed by the other characters in the picture, with the possible (?) exception of one; and the other, that it was intended for the laughter of those who witness this very amusing film, which is one unbroken succession of comical situations from beginning to end.

THE HOUSE OF CARDS.—Frederick Remington, the celebrated delineator of types of the Western plains, has said that the knighthood of America lies solely in the character of the Western cowboy; and that fact is true, for one finds nothing quite so distinct and vivid in the history of America as these riders of the plains, who fought and rode, loved and hated, robbed and lived on the very edge of civilization. Here one finds a life that is big with the bigness of the mountains, rough and rugged as their shadowy canyons, wide and broad as the trackless plains, but with it all a grandeur and nobility that comes not from the roar of the city, but from the silence of nature. Men whose very lives hang loosely from their belts by tiny pockets filled with lead of death. These men of the West are brave, strong, rugged men. Whether good or bad, they are not weak.

The Edison picture of the "House of Cards" has to deal with just such men. The story revolves itself around a Western cowboy who has been sent to the town of Cedar Gulch to deposit gold in the bank for his boss. Arriving too late in the night to dispose of the gold, he seeks out the pretty daughter of the gambling-house keeper who has given her heart unto his keeping. While waiting for the bank to open in the morning, he becomes fascinated with the sight of the money being won at a gambling table, and starts to gamble with his boss's money. Luck is against him, and scarcely before he realizes it he has lost all. Ruin, disgrace, and prison or lynching stare him in the face. Only seeking to get back what he has lost he tries to rob the gambling house at night, and here he comes face to face with the little girl whom he loves. He confesses to her his crime and shame, and the woman's love spreads forth its hands to shield him. She seeks out Rattlesnake Jim, the Sheriff of Cedar Gulch, who also is in love with her, and implores his aid for her unworthy lover.

A warrant for the cowboy's arrest reaches Jim while she is at his cabin and he struggles manfully to follow its mandates to the letter, but his love for the girl causes him to swerve from his strict path of duty and he decides to give the guilty man a fighting chance. Either he or the cowboy must quit Cedar Gulch at once. In other words, one of them must die. To live and not do his duty is a thought that has never entered Jim's mind. So these men of iron and nerve fight a novel duel in the Sheriff's lonely cabin, at which he has ordered the cowboy to report. Baring their arms to the elbow they sit at opposite sides of a table, calmly waiting for a great, poisonous rattlesnake to rise from its bed, which opens in the center of the table, and choose its victim. Slowly it uncoils itself upon the table with fangs darting in and out, it rears its head, the men watching its every move in fearful silence. At a moment when it seems that the awful suspense will be ended by a deadly strike fate interferes, and though justice miscarries, yet Cupid's arrow finds an unsuspecting but not unwilling victim in the person of the lion-hearted Sheriff, whose manly conduct, in contrast with that of her lover, reveals to the girl his true worth.

All this is told with a wonderful dramatic strength and power, and one never loses interest for a moment. It holds the audience silent and tense during the progress of the novel dramatic situation at the close. Few Western stories have more real and genuinely dramatic situations or a higher type of acting than that presented by the Edison players in the silent drama, "The House of Cards."

A PAIR OF SLIPPERS.—Cupid loves a good joke occasionally and in this picture Ralph Lubber is the chosen goat.

Lubber buys a pair of dainty slippers for his lady love and on his way to deliver them stops to see an old friend, Mr. Rex. Rex is alone, Mrs. Rex having left to visit a friend, leaving implicit instructions that hubby is not to stir from the house until she returns.

Rex is delighted to see his old friend, Lubber, but their chat is interrupted by the ringing of the telephone. Rex answers it; some one wants Lubber at his office immediately.

Lubber, explaining that he will be back in an hour, hurries out, leaving the box containing the slippers on Rex's writing table. A short time after Lubber leaves, Rex becomes lonely, jumps resolutely into his hat and coat and leaves the house, despite Mrs. Rex's injunction.

Mrs. Rex comes in immediately after, finds the slippers and the impersonal but highly colored note accompanying them.

"Dearest Anna:

"Accept this little gift as a token of my love. Hope they are the right size.

"Your Sweetheart."

Mrs. Rex's indignation knows no bounds. So Rex has been deceiving her—the brute! A happy thought comes to her and she sets about to have revenge on her supposed rival. She removes the Here's More Inside Dope!

Right on the heels of my exposures of the rotten secret of certain licensed film exchanges comes the story that the next move of the Patents Company will be to permit but one film exchange to each State in the Union! Can you see what that will mean? Can you see how a new little trust will spring up in each state? How the wheels within wheels will grind those of you who are not financially strong enough to stand the strain? Not content with penalizing you ten per cent tor the privilege of switching your patronage trom one to another licensed exchange, the trust people hope to drive each state's exhibitors to one source of supply and make them take what they can get or be eternally dodblasted! This can lead only to one thing in small towns where there are but two or three theatres. The weaker exhibitor in town will be forced out of business. This is the dream of the trust—the thing they are scheming, planning, working, fighting for! Are you going to let yourself be caught in any such pocket, or are you going to shake off the galling fetters NOW and build up a business that they cannot harm? Be independent! Use the magnificent independent films that are now flooding the market. Advertise your independence to your patrons and they'll rally to your call, just as the independent exhibitors of America are rallying to mine. Don't pay that ten per cent! Don't pay any license fee. Don't pay a cent for any thing but the films you get. Write and tell me your experience with the "ten per centers!"

OHIO NOTES.

By W. C. Kunzmann.

The Grand and Globe Motion Picture and Vaudeville Theaters, Cleveland, Ohio, controlled by the Grand Amusement Company, with H. E. Michel in charge, have placed an order for two new, up-to-date Powers No. 6 machines, latest model, to be installed at each of the above named theaters within the next week. Both these theaters are playing to capacity business nightly, no expense being spared by the management of these theaters, the best of vaudeville always selected and latest association pictures shown. Mr. Paul Collins is chief electrician and operator at the Grand; Mr. Chas. Steinhoff is in charge of the booth at the Globe. Both these gentlemen are experts in their line, also members of Operators' Union, Local 169, Cleveland, Ohio. Mr. Michel states extensive improvements will be made in the near future at both these theaters.

The new canopy arch placed in front of the Orpheum Theater, East Ninth street, Cleveland, Ohio, is to-day the most talked of and attractive front in Ohio. Mr. Peckham, manager, has spent several thousand dollars on this improvement. Hundreds of attractive electric bulbs, together with four flaring arc lamps, light up this beautiful front at night so that it can be seen for many blocks off. This theater is playing to capacity business at each performance.

Mr. Harry Wilson, secretary of Moving Picture Operators' Union I. A. T. S. E., Local 169, Cleveland, Ohio, has introduced scales of operators' wages here; same were accepted at the meeting of theater managers. Cleveland has over a hundred picture houses, only two of which are using non-union operators. Mostly all machines in Cleveland are run by electric motors. All theaters in the downtown section are using two machines, chief and assistant operators, there being no delay in the shows from the time the doors are opened until last performance at night. Every large city in the United States ought to have an organization of union operators. It does away with the would-be operators, as none but experienced men who can pass an examination can join this union. One- third of the picture houses throughout the country to-day that are closed up on account of poor business came from poor results of a cheap operator, who was nothing more than a four weeks' experienced crank turner, as they call them. The success of a picture house lies in a good operator, in fact more than any other attachee in any up-to-date house; therefore it is up to a wise manager to get a good operator, pay him a good salary to give him good resutls, and you are bound to have a successful, paying house. This has been proven right here in some of the run-down theaters in Cleveland, and I think it is good advice for other theater managers to follow.

Dalilke & Porter, who have successfully conducted the Garden Theater, West Twenty-fifth street, Cleveland, Ohio, for the past three years, will close down for a week to make extensive improvements. The front will be remodeled and decorated in gold and white trimmings with hand painted panels, and opera chairs will be installed in the interior. An order has been placed for a new baby grand piano, at a cost of $1,000. This will be the only instrument of its kind to be used exclusively in a picture house in Ohio. These two hustling managers are always on the lookout to give their patrons the best in the picture line. They have secured the services of Mr. Elmer Wismore, a famous tenor, to sing illustrated songs and direct the orchestra. The latest model flickerless Gaumont machine will be installed. Bill Horn, who has been connected with the Gaumont Company here, will have charge of the booth.

Mr. Chas. Reark, manager of the Theatorium, Sandusky, Ohio, entertained the newsboys of that city Thanksgiving morning. The program consisted of four reels of latest pictures, also two illustrated songs. Mr. Schuhart, the vocalist at this theater, is spending a few days with his parents at Newark, Ohio. Mr. Geo. Upp is filling his position during his absence.

Mr. Howard Codding, operator at the Brilliant Theater, East Fifty-fifth street, Cleveland, Ohio, has resigned his position to take charge of the booth at the new Corona Theater, Prospect street, Cleveland, Ohio. Mr. Codding is an Operators' Union, Local I. A. T. S. E., 169.

Mr. Frank Ging, who had charge of the booth at the Star Theater, Sandusky, Ohio, last season, has taken the management of the Jewell Theater, Fremont, Ohio.

dainty slippers and puts in their place a pair of old, worn-out shoes belonging to Rex.

An hour later Luhber returns and unobserved enters the Rex library, gets his parcel and is again on his way to the home of his affinity.

The parcel is delivered by the maid, the box opened, and "Dearest Anna," stung by the insult in the rude joke, hurries down to personally demand an explanation.

Luhber is thunderstruck. His sweetheart throws the shoes at him and runs out of the room.

Let us return to Rex. He has returned and his wife is berating him for his unfaithfulness. Rex tries to explain, but the irate little woman will suffer no explanation.

In the meantime, like a man, Luhber has taken things into his own hands and forced his beloved to give him a moment's hearing. He is sure that Rex has played the joke on him and if Anna will but accompany him to the Rex home a satisfactory explanation will no doubt be obtained.

They arrive at the Rex home in the midst of the melee and poor Rex is rescued. Explanations follow. "All's well that ends well," and the affair ends in a hearty laugh.

THE BACHELOR AND THE MAID.—A brisk little comedy and a fitting reel-mate to the more elaborate "Pair of Slippers."

Robert Caldwell, a traveling salesman, and a bachelor, arriving at his home station, flirts with a charming young lady at the baggage window. He has the pleasure of assisting her into a cab and looking after her larger baggage, then goes to his rooms, having previously ordered his own trunk sent to his house.

In this transaction he gets the baggage checks mixed and the lady's trunk, almost identical to his, is sent to his rooms while the young lady receives his.

He does not find the mistake until after some difficulty the trunk is opened and a beautiful array of feminine lingerie comes to view. With a proper amount of shocked modesty he covers them up again and searches other compartments in an effort to find some clue to the owner. A photograph of the girl whom he had met at the railway station clears up the mystery and, calling an expressman, he tells him to take the trunk to the young lady's house.

He accompanies the expressman and explains about the mixup. Finally he tells her that he loves her and asks her to marry him. She agrees.

The expressmen wait patiently for the other trunk, until tired of waiting one of them ventures up to the young lady's parlor. The young lady blushing a little, explains that the other trunk will not be moved and consequently his services will not be required. With a knowing wink, the expressman withdraws, leaving the happy couple together.

THE RANCHMAN'S RIVAL.—Jim Watson, cow puncher, big, brusque man of the plains, falls in love with Annie Morgan, the daughter of a fairly prosperous Western ranchman. After a short courtship Annie is won and plans for the marriage are made.

Annie and Jim quarrel and at this most opportune time, Walter Milton, a wealthy young Easterner, honks into town in his big four-cylinder touring car, becomes enamored of the pretty Annie and lays plans for the frustration of the happy romance.

Milton contrives to obtain an introduction and invites Annie for an auto ride. He laughs at her efforts to resist the temptation and she finally yields.

It is the old story of the lure of the gold that glitters. Annie is persuaded by Milton to return Jim's ring and to wed him. Jim is sent away broken-hearted, but resigned in the belief that Milton can make her happier.

Milton's intentions are the lowest and most despicable. He arranges with a Mexican "greaser" to pose as a "preacher" and perform the fake ceremony. A clergyman's suit and hat is furnished the Mexican to lend dignity to his lank form, and Milton then drives back to fetch Annie.

In the meantime Jim has decided to leave the ranch and, bidding good-bye to his old-time pals, bundles up his few belongings, throws his saddle over his shoulder and starts on the long hike to the railway station.

A smartly dressed young woman, a rarity in Jonesville, is pacing up and down the railway station when Jim arrives. As he passes her she looks up and, a little embarrassed, questions him.

"I beg pardon, sir, but do you know Walter Milton—my husband?"

The big Westerner looks at her kindly.

"Walter Milton—" then as the truth dawns on him "—your husband!"

Explanations follow. Milton left El Paso in the auto for an extensive tour and was to meet her at Jonesville two weeks later. She has arrived somewhat ahead of the time set.

Jim tells her to wait, then borrowing a horse, rides at breakneck speed back to the ranch. He traces the auto to the Mexican's shanty, arriving just in time to prevent the wedding.

Without any explanation Watson forces Milton and Annie into the auto and orders the chauffeur to drive back to Jonesville.

When they arrive at the station Milton is forced to confess to Annie and the rightful Mrs. Milton his nefarious scheme.

Jim leaves the trio and saunters over to the postoffice and general store.

A short time later, repentant and ashamed, Annie comes to him and begs forgiveness.

Jim's big heart melts and he takes her in his arms and restores the ring to her finger.

GAUMONT.
(George Kleine.)

LISTEN!—Mr. Narrytiv, a chatty, fussy old bachelor, is busy in his apartments rearranging his furniture and bric-a-brac. While moving a heavy suit of armor, he knocks it over and gets a painful hump on the head.

He hurries off to the drug store to get some liniment for his wound, but on his way out he meets the janitress. In his attempts to illustrate to her how it happened, he gets another bruise right on the same spot where he got hurt the first time!

Now he rushes out in the direction of the druggist's, but he keeps on meeting acquaintances, stopping them and telling them how he got his humps. Every time he does so, he manages to get hurt again, until finally, in his efforts to illustrate the occurrence to a park policeman, by using a statue to demonstrate with, he receives such severe injury that he vows he will never tell his tale of troubles again.

TOP-HEAVY MARY.—Mary is decidedly a "heavy-weight" and is advised to reduce her avoirdupois by learning to ride a bicycle.

She accordingly takes lessons from an expert cyclist and of course meets with many mishaps. This film must be seen to be appreciated, as it is so full of funny incidents that words cannot do justice to it.

IN A PICKLE.—Professor Mooner is seen at work in his study, writing a learned article. So absorbed is he in his thoughts that he absentmindedly pours the contents of his ink-well over his papers. He goes out of doors clad in his underwear. Then he sits on a baby asleep on a bench in the park. At table he mistakes the tablecloth for his table-napkin and upsets everything onto the floor. He takes a bedroom occupied by a newly married couple for his own room and makes himself at home. The rightful occupants throw him out, as a robber. Finally he finds his own apartments and after filling his oil-lamp with water instead of kerosene, he puts the lighted end of a cigarette into his mouth.

DAUGHTERS OF POVERTY.—An old laborer is in charge of keeping the country roads in his district in good order.

He lives in a cottage with his two daughters, Jane and Annie. Annie, the younger one, falls in love with Walter Hudson, the son of a wealthy manufacturer, who lives in the neighborhood. She has a meeting with her lover one day and is discovered by her father, who in a fit of furious rage drives her out of his cottage.

He takes to drink, his work is neglected, and he is threatened with discharge unless he reforms at once and restores the roads to their original good condition.

This angers him still more, and, knowing that his expelled daughter will pass along a certain road in an automobile with her lover, he places a tree across the path in order to wreck the machine and kill his daughter.

The other daughter, Jane, observes her father's actions and endeavors to remove the tree. This she cannot do, so she stands in the way of the approaching motor car. The occupants do not see her until they are too near to stop and the poor girl is seriously injured by the machine.

Her sister, Annie, is so terrified that she refuses to return to her lover's home and this has the effect of bringing him to the road laborer's cottage, where the young manufacturer formally demands Annie's hand in marriage.

The father finally consents and all ends happily.

THE GEISHA WHO SAVED JAPAN.—The picture opens at a time when the activities of the royalists began to harass the Shogun. Seated in the garden of the royal palace is Nitchi, a young Japanese boy, awaiting the return of the Shogun; as he approaches Nitchi crawls forward and presents a petition for the release of his father, who has offended the Shogun by failing to bow before him. The Shogun, enraged, orders his spies to sieze Nitchi and burn his eyes out with red-hot irons. Matsuda, a leader of the young royalists, witnesses the act of cruelty, and burning with indignation, draws his sword and vows he will consecrate his life to the cause of revolution. He brings Nitchi before the little band of royalists, who determine to assassinate the Shogun and thus rid Japan of a tyrant. They are about to draw lots, but Matsuda declares that he alone will do the act. On a royal feast day the assassination is attempted but fails, and Matsuda is enabled to escape by the aid of Nitchi's sister, Mimosa San, the Geisha dancer, a favorite of the Shogun. Matsuda falls in love with Mimosa and visits her at her home, where he is followed by spies of the Shogun, who demand that she deliver Matsuda up. She declares he is not there, but they search the house. She outwits them and flees with Matsuda; they are followed and overtaken. A terrific combat occurs between Matsuda and the spies. He is almost overcome, when Mimosa rushes in and receives a glancing blow on her forehead, disfiguring her for life. Matsuda lifts her up in his arms, but she begs of him to escape, as his life belongs to Japan. He places her in the care of an old woodchopper and flees.

Ten years later. Matsuda, now a Governor, is holding a reception. Through an accident he recognizes Nitchi and inquires of him about his sister. Nitchi informs him of her whereabouts, and Matsuda sends a messenger for her. When Mimosa arrives he shrinks back in pitylug horror at the scar which disfigures her face, but remembering how she received it, he folds her in his arms and tells the assembled guests that this is his promised bride whom he had lost, and for whom he had been searching for years. While the guests applaud, Mimosa San hides her face in Matsuda's shoulder, for all her troubles have reached a happy end.

RALLY ROUND THE FLAG.—Scene 1.—Out in one of the broad fields of their father's farm the two Fletcher boys, John and Jim, are busy helping the farm hands harvest the corn. In the distance we see approaching their cousin Mary. She gaily waves her apron to summon all to dinner. The farm hands pile into the wagon, all but John and Jim. They glance at Mary and after a word together call to her. Mary starts back to join them. In a few words John tells Mary how both he and Jim love her and how they have decided to tell her and give her the opportunity to choose between them. Mary glances first at John then at Jim. Her face grows serious. She tells them she cannot choose, that she loves them both equally. Why can't they go on as they have before, just affectionate brothers and sister? But the boys tell her that it is impossible and urge her to choose. She still refuses and turning starts slowly after the retreating wagon.

Scene 2.—All is excitement in the little village near the Fletcher farm. The recruiting sergeant has set up his tent on the village square. Mounted on a box Colonel Loyde is urging the assembled crowd to enlist. At first the response is slow, but soon a young farmer pushes forward and signs the roll. Up through the crowd come the two brothers, John and Jim. Jim signs first and John follows. Soon the recruiting sergeant is almost swamped with volunteers as the wave of patriotism sweeps over the crowd.

Scene 3.—The day has arrived for John and Jim's company to depart for the front. The old mother weeps over her boys that she may never see again. After bidding both parents a fond good-bye the two boys move down to the gate, where Mary is waiting for them. Mary kisses them both good-bye and as they start slowly down the road stands watching them sadly for a second then hides her tears in her handkerchief.

Scene 4.—Since early morn the two opposing armies stretched out in a long battle line have been struggling desperately. The Union standard bearer staggers. A Confederate grabs the flag and as he waves it in triumph the victorious rebels toss their hats and cheer. But their success is only momentary. Crash goes a mine skilfully laid by the Unionists. And now the Colonel rides forward with the order for a general charge. Up jump the boys in blue and dash forward. Here are the two brothers. Jim begs some cartridges from John as they move forward with their comrades.

Scene 5.—Beyond a wooded ridge the Confederate rear line supported by a battery is still holding its position. Out from the wood dash the victorious Unionists. In a few moments the Confederates are in retreat but every inch is hotly contested ere it is given up. Here come John and Jim still fighting side by side. John has taken the standard from its wounded bearer and now carries it forward. The Confederate standard bearer reels and drops his flag, but ere it has reached the ground Jim has it in his hands. As he stands waving it a bullet from the retreating enemy reaches his heart. He falls into John's arms dead.

Scene 6.—All night long after the battle the work of caring for the wounded continues. The dead are being placed in silent rows and the mournful work of identifying them has begun. Down across the field comes John sadly making his way amongst the dead and dying. He is searching for Jim's body. Ah, he has found it. Tenderly he lifts the head that since early childhood has lain nightly on the pillow beside his.

Scene 7.—The war is over. At the little village all the town people have gathered to do honor to the returning hero, brave Captain John Fletcher. Colonel Loyde adressing the assembled crowd, tells of John's brave deeds on the field of battle, of the pride of the village in him and how they have purchased a sword for him. He buckles it around John's waist. John steps forward and in a few modest words thanks his neighbors. As he finishes his father and mother embrace him while the crowd offer up cheer after cheer for him.

Scene 8.—The celebration is over. This has been a happy day. In a faltering voice the old father asks about Jim and how he died. John tells of that last charge, how Jim went up the hill and forward with the flag and fell lifeless in his arms. While the mother sobs Mary's hand slips into John's and his arm goes around her waist. The old father glancing up sees the two young people in loving embrace and gently tells the mother to look, for although they have lost Jim, they have a son and a daughter to cheer their declining years.

WE BUY NEW FILMS EVERY WEEK

—not once in a while—that's why our service gives satisfaction to the exhibitor doing business with us.

Good Service, Quality and Satisfaction are the three important factors most essential to the success of the exhibitors: "GOOD SERVICE", by which is meant good judgment on the part of the exchange in the selection of your program; judgment that will guarantee you a variety of subjects most pleasing to your patronage. "QUALITY" means new, "BRAND NEW" films selected by a connoisseur familiar with the needs and exact requirements of the exhibitors of greater New York. With good service and quality must necessarily come "SATISFACTION" and unless you get these two things you are bound to be dissatisfied.

How much longer will you fall for the junk that is gradually dwindling your business away to a mere nothing? Why not try service from a "REGULAR" Independent exchange: an exchange buying the best of the entire Independent output, and buying it each and every day: an exchange that comprises GOOD SERVICE, QUALITY and SATISFACTION.

THE FATAL BALL.—Exterior of miner's cabin; Nellie sitting on stump at right, tying a bunch of wild roses, which are scattered all around her; a kitten comes out of cabin and jumps into her lap; she pets it and then places it on her shoulder. Philip, her father, appears at doorway, and watches her fondly during this piece of business; then comes forward and places his hands over her eyes. Business of guessing who it is. Finally she throws off his hands and turning around, she embraces him fondly. They suddenly draw apart and assume a listening attitude; the girl clings to her father in terror; he leads her to cabin, which they enter. Philip reappears immediately with gun, motions to Nellie to lock door, assumes listening attitude, and walks rapidly down path to left.

Out on the plains; single tree in center. Philip near tree, shading his eyes with his hand, peering down road to left; raises his gun to shoulder and shoots, then turns and runs off right. Enter band of Indians on horseback, with captive, Clyde Darrow, bound with lariat; they dismount and tie him to tree; then gather the fallen branches and pile them around his feet, apply torch and dance war-dance around victim.

Cowboy quarters on Bar X Ranch; cowboys playing cards, etc., their horses tied nearby. Enter Nellie on run; excitedly tells them of the Indians and their captive, pointing back from whence she came. Cowboys drop their cards, scamper to their horses and mount. All ride off in the direction of Indian band.

Indians dancing around burning captive; shots heard in the distance; Indians cease dancing and scamper for their horses, shooting meanwhile at the advancing cowboys. Hand to hand battle. The Indians are finally defeated and retreat, followed by cowboys, while Philip, who has dropped off horse, kicks aside the burning branches, cuts the prisoner free, throws him over his shoulder, and takes him to his cabin.

Interior of miner's cabin; Clyde reclining on bed, his head bandaged and his arm in a sling. Nellie is sitting beside him, and he takes her hand and kisses it. Then he thanks her for her tender nursing, and tells her he loves her; she shyly drops her head and answers that she returns his love, then buries her face on his shoulder. They draw apart as Philip enters. Clyde takes Philip by the hand and thanks him for saving his life. Nellie kneeling beside the bed.

Kitchen of miner's cabin; Philip on chair, Nellie placing dishes on table; comes over, stands behind Philip's chair, smoothes his hair and kisses him. Enter Clyde with letter in his hand, which he gives to Philip to read, meanwhile telling him that he must leave them.

LETTER.

Denver, September 1, 1909.

My dear son Clyde: Your letter stating that you are better, received. You must hasten home at once, to get ready for your wedding to Emily, which you know takes place in two weeks.

With love, YOUR MOTHER.

Nellie starts forward as her father reads letter; goes to Clyde, and entreats him to say it is not true; kneels at his feet and begs him to stay. Philip looks on wonderingly, then comes forward, lifts Nellie to her feet, and motions Clyde away. Exit Clyde. Nellie whispers to her father that Clyde has wronged her under promise of marriage; she hides her face on his shoulder, and sobs violently. Philip starts back angrily, takes pistol from belt, and makes a move as though to follow Clyde, but Nellie takes pistol from his hand, meanwhile shaking her head sorrowfully, and pointing upwards. Philip pushes her aside and rushes out.

Exterior of cabin, bench in front, and chair beside it. Clyde sitting on bench, smoking cigarette. Philip enters from cabin, advancing angrily on Clyde, who rises from bench and faces him. Philip tells him he'll make Nellie his wife, or he will kill him. Clyde snaps his fingers in Philip's face and turns his back to him, as though he did not care, and Philip, overcome with rage, picks up the chair and knocks Clyde down with it. Nellie rushes out from the cabin into her father's arms, just as Clyde, raising his gun, shoots at Philip. Nellie, being between the two, receives the bullet, and falls dead in her father's arms. Philip, in agony, calls on her to speak to him, then lays her on the ground and feels her heart. Realizing that she is dead, he falls prostrate on her form, sobbing bitterly. After Philip has recovered from his paroxysm of grief, he looks around to take vengeance on her murderer, but finds he has left the cabin but has left his gun behind. He picks up the gun, and kneeling beside Nellie's body, he raises his right hand to heaven and swears that the gun which killed his Nellie should send the fatal ball that should pierce the heart of her murderer.

Rocky pass in the mountains; camp of miners in foreground. Miners gathered around a fire, telling stories. Suddenly Philip enters, gun in hand, and peers eagerly into faces of the miners; then shakes his head sadly, and turns to go away, when one of the miners calls him back, and asks for whom he is seeking. He tells them his story, and the miners tell him to search through their camp, and if he finds his man, to kill him according to his vow. The miners all line up in a row, at back, and Philip goes along line slowly, peering into each bearded face, until he comes to the last one; then he utters a yell of rage, pulls the false beard from miner's face, and reveals the face of Clyde, who tries to escape, but Philip drags him to center, forces him to his knees, and tells him to ask Heaven for mercy, for he is going to kill him. Clyde draws revolver with his free hand, and shoots Philip, who staggers back into the arms of two of the miners, while the others prevent Clyde from escaping. Philip slowly sinks to his knees, then picks up gun, which he has dropped, slowly raises it to his shoulder, takes aim at Clyde, and pulls the trigger. Clyde falls, face downward, on the ground and Philip falls dead in the arms of the miners.

PATHE FRERES.

FROM THE EGG TO THE SPIT.—A most fascinating film. The history of a chicken from its formation in the shell, its life and growth and its final destination.

This film tells the life of a chicken in a picturesque and instructive way. In the first picture we see the germ as it develops in the egg during the period of incubation, until the little bird, already gaining in strength, tired of its captivity, breaks the shell with pecks from its tiny beak and as it rolls out shakes its soft fuzzy down in the pure sweet air and bristles all over with happiness at its newly found liberty.

In the next picture begins its life of young chicken, and we see it a dependent little ball of yellow fuzz peeping and pecking at the feet of its big comfortable vigilant mother. In the following scenes we see it when eight days old, fifteen days, and then six weeks, and finally a proud cock wearing the most brilliant plumage. Some beautiful specimens of the crested birds and Houdan class are seen in this film.

Thanks to the soft barley mash diluted with milk with which the chickens are gorged (the food being thrust down their throats by means of a tube) fowls that are raised on a farm like the present become fine fat juicy subjects for the spit—a sad ending, however, to the happy life of a chicken.

A CASK OF GOOD OLD WINE.—An amusing picture in which two carters engaged in delivering a cask of wine fill themselves up and empty the cask. The wine is replaced with water and the cask delivered, with ludicrous results.

Mr. and Mrs. Star receive word from a rich old relative that he has sent them a cask of his best old vintage, which he hopes they will not fail to enjoy. The Stars are delighted at the good news and are looking forward to tasting the fine old beverage.

In the next picture we see the cask being taken from the freight car and loaded on to a truck, after which the truckmen jump up and ride off. On their way they come to a toll-gate and allow the toll-gate keeper to take a good taste of the fine old wine as toll—first removing the plug. After the gate-keeper has had enough the truckmen decide to take a taste, with the result that they both become so inebriated that it is with difficulty they regain their seats on top of the wagon. Every now and then they have to stop and pull out the plug again, the wine tastes so awfully good, and take another drink. Finally they lose the plug, and one of them endeavors to stop up the hole with his finger, with very unsatisfactory results. The wine pours out down the gutter and people from everywhere come with buckets and glasses to get a little of the good old stuff. At last when it is all gone the maudlin truckmen go to a hydrant and fill the barrel up again with good pure water, and finally deliver it to the Stars' residence. When it is safely lodged in the cellar Mr. Star takes out the plug and fills a bottle for the dinner table, and it is only after taking two or three good swallows that he discovers it is nothing but water. The rest of the evening is spent by the Star family in denouncing their rich relative, and the latter often wonders why his ungrateful kinsmen have never acknowledged his cask of wine.

THE LADY'S COMPANION.—A young woman holding a position as companion to an old Marchioness, won the love of her employer's son and they have been married secretly, as the young man knew that should his mother learn of his marriage to the young girl she would cut him off without a cent. Before the lady's companion had entered the services of the Marchioness she had been deeply in love with a worthy young man in her own station in life, and when the Marchioness' son supplanted this former lover in the girl's affections the jilted one's jealousy and disappointment were such that after a time he decided to let the Marchioness know of the deception her son had practiced.

One fine day, therefore, he conducts the Marchioness to the farmhouse where her son's child has been put out to board and the old lady comes upon the happy pair fondling their little daughter to whom they are both devotedly attached.

Of course the old lady, wild with rage, disinherits her undutiful son on the spot and decides to leave her entire fortune to the young man who has made known to her the deception of her own flesh and blood. The jilted lover therefore, fearful that she should soften and change her mind at some future time, decides to make away with her as soon as possible so as to secure the fortune. The old lady falls ill and when her little granddaughter is brought to see her she undergoes a change of heart and pardons her father for the grief he has caused her, and, unbeknown to her beneficiary, destroys her last will and leaves all to her son. The young man, seeing that the old lady's feelings have changed in her son's favor, drops a little poison in the old lady's medicine and then accuses the son of trying to poison his mother. The son is arrested and would probably have had little chance of proving his innocence had not his little daughter seen the wicked man pouring the poison in her grandmother's glass, and it is on her testimony that her father is acquitted and the real culprit punished.

IMPOSSIBLE TO GET SLEEP.—Mr. Scuppy's alarm clock goes off long before it is time for him to get up and awakens him with an awful start. Enraged beyond endurance, he rushes over to the timepiece and smothers its unwelcome voice and then crawls back into bed again. But hardly has he touched the pillow when a terrible crashing sound is heard at the head of his bed and soon a workman's hammer is pushed right through the wall. The plaster flies all over the would-be sleeper, who, grabbing his pillow, rushes out on the little balcony outside his window and fixes himself comfortably for a nap. But he is just beginning to doze when, Splash! a deluge of water hits him squarely in the face. Stunned for a moment, he glances skyward to see what the trouble might be and finds to his disgust that the female on the floor above is watering her plants. No sleep here, he must move again! This time he will seek an absolutely deserted spot, so goes down to the lake where, seeing a hammock strung out over the water, he climbs the tree to which it is attached and swings himself into the comfortable bed. We hold our breath for a moment as he awkwardly attempts to get settled in his new resting place, for it looks very much as if he will land in the water; and this is where he finally does land, for the hammock is not strong enough for his weight and he goes right through it. Fortunately he can swim and we watch with anxiety intermingled with amusement his frantic efforts to get back to land. On reaching terra firma he rushes around still in search of some place to lay his poor weary head, and seeing a haystack he creeps under it and all that can be seen of him is his feet. The latter attract the attention of an over-zealous policeman passing that way, who promptly catches hold of the protruding pedal extremities and soon brings to light poor, unfortunate Scuppy, whom he carries off without any parley to the station house. The prisoner is immediately conducted to a cell, its only bit of furniture being a hard, unattractive looking cot. But Scuppy's eyes gleam with happiness when he sees this cot, for here at last he can find rest. So, throwing himself with a sigh of relief on the hard piece of furniture, he finally gets his much-wished-for nap.

THE EVIL PHILTER.—Beautiful indeed is this richly colored picture of times long gone by. The opening scene shows the beautiful Irene de Roannes taking her harp lesson from her teacher, Lorenzo, who is deeply in love with his handsome pupil and hopes one day, notwithstanding the difference in their social positions, to claim her as his bride. The old music master is doomed to disappointment, however, as the Marquis de Roannes, the girl's father, has already arranged a marriage for his daughter Irene, and the poor old teacher is heartbroken when he gets the announcement of the betrothal.

We must remember that the incidents in this story take place way back when witches and magic and all that sort of thing were looked upon very seriously. The disappointed lover therefore decides to go in search of a philter of love, a charm to excite the grand passion in the bosom of his pupil, as he cannot bear the thought that she is to belong to another. Weird, indeed, is the scene, showing a sort of tavern frequented by a rollicking crowd composed of highwaymen, dancing girls, clowns, fortune tellers, etc. An old sorceress, who looks for all the world as if she stepped out of one of the old fairy books dear to the heart of every child, approaches the music teacher as she sees from his expression that he is in trouble, and noticing his rich garments believes there might be something in it for her if he is seeking aid through witchcraft. The professor, seeing her hideous old face, pushes her aside, but when a businesslike old wizard comes up to him and offers him a philter of love provided he delivers up to him his soul, the professor promptly consents, little thinking what it means, so anxious is he to win the love of his pupil. The philter works like magic. As soon as the girl has inhaled the fumes she draws near Lorenzo and plainly shows that love for him has awakened in her breast. Lorenzo, of course, is delighted to see how well the charm has worked, but his happiness is of short duration, as evil spirits soon make his life not worth living. Wherever he goes, wherever he turns, up pops some hideous-looking creature and finally we see the unfortunate man, after enduring all sorts of torments, swallowed up in an abyss from which issue flames and brimstone, showing that it is the abode of the Evil One himself.

MASQUERADER'S CHARITY.—It was the night of a masque ball at one of the foreign embassies, and everybody that was anybody was invited. The fantastically dressed guests drive up, one after the other, mount the marble steps, and pass into the brilliantly lighted hall. No one has time to stop for a moment and offer a word of comfort or a few pennies to the half-starved little flower girl who stands at the entrance offering her wares for sale. Nobody but a big, burly policeman, who pushes her back roughly, telling her that she must not annoy the guests. The poor little mite, seeing now that there is no chance of getting a few pennies, hides her pinched face in her arm and weeps as if her little heart would break. One of the guests, a rich banker, whose carriage has to wait in line, notices the little girl, and going over to her questions her, but her wan face and ragged dress tell the tale; so young, and still already called upon to take up the struggle against want and poverty. Taking the little one gently by the arm, he conducts her to a nearby shop, where he procures food. A queer pair indeed they make as they pass on arm-in-arm, he in his satin and bells and she in her rags. On the way she tells of the little sick brother at home with no food and no one to care for him. When they leave the shop, therefore, she takes her kind friend to the poorest of attic rooms. In one corner is a little heap of old rags which the banker finds to be the little sick brother. The little sister arouses the poor weak boy, and telling him of their good fortune, helps him over to the improvised table, on which the kind gentleman is arranging the food. The little tots eat ravenously while their benefactor stands by with tears in his eyes, but at the same time wearing a smile on his lips, as he has already made up his mind to adopt the pretty little couple for his own. He therefore takes them to his magnificent home and hides them in a wardrobe while he goes in search of his wife. He tells the latter of his night's adventure, and opening wide the wardrobe door lets her see for herself. She does not hesitate for a moment, but clasping the little waifs in her big motherly arms, takes them to her heart at once.

BEAR HUNT IN RUSSIA.—Our operator was fortunate to be on the ground when an interesting bear hunt took place in far-away Russia, that land of snow and heavy coated animals.

We watch the hunting party as they start out in their sleighs early in the morning, muffled up to the chin in heavy fur coats. The snow looks so white and beautiful in this land of long, severe winters, one envies these huntsmen for the day of sport that lies before them. When they reach the forest they look around for Bruin's footprints and soon come upon his tracks. Men and dogs follow them, and soon the beaters have the huge beast within range of the huntsmen's rifles. A bullet well aimed hits the bear and he staggers but decides to sell his life at a high price, and falling upon one of the men, sinks his teeth into his arm. The others rush to the assistance of their companion and one of them, making a tourniquet, stops the flow of blood from the wounded member. He is then carried back to the camp by some of the party.

Bruin, whom the dogs have now pretty well exhausted, is still fighting them off as they jump around him, snapping and howling. We see, however, that his strength is almost spent, and soon, after giving two or three groans, the magnificent fellow breathes his last. The hunters hurry over to him, and calling off the dogs, fasten his feet to a pole and carry him off to the camp, a fine specimen for their first day's hunting.

EXPLOITS OF A COWBOY.—A bit of the West cowboys, lassoes, bucking ponies and all. An unusually fine exhibition of dexterous handling of the lasso is given in the first part of the picture. This particular cowboy certainly has perfect control over the rope and when he lassoes man or beast he has them in a net for sure, as shown in the near view given of the cow puncher and pony he has just caught. The bucking broncho in this picture is a fine specimen of its class, possessed of all the "buckiness" that is coming to him. The cowboys attempt vainly to get a saddle on the little fellow's back and just when they seem to have finally accomplished the feat he humps himself just at the psychological moment and sends saddle and boys flying. In the end, however, he is conquered and the triumphant rider swings himself into the saddle, but before his body touches the latter the little vixen is off like a shot—the plucky Westerner sticking on, however, as if glued to his back.

WILLYBOY GETS HIS.—Willyboy, just home from college for a short holiday, starts out for a stroll. His clothes he knows are of the latest cut, and with his handsome face, killingly stylish way of walking and swinging his stick, he is not surprised at the glances of admiration directed at him by all the girls he meets. Just as he turns a corner he collides with two queens of fashion and, bowing to the ground, begs them to excuse his awkwardness. They reply so sweetly and are altogether so charming that Willyboy decides to turn back and follow them. They are highly amused when they see the conquest they have made and throw smiling glances every now and then over their shoulders. They finally enter a bake shop and are hardly seated at one of the tables when in comes faithful Willyboy and takes a seat right next to them. He looks very demure, indeed, just as if he happened in there by the merest accident, and ordering the first thing that comes into his head, finds himself compelled to eat a half dozen of the richest chocolate eclairs while he waits for the girls to finish their lunch. When they leave the store he follows right along, feeling anything but comfortable, however, after his heavy lunch. Their next stop is at the dentist's—but great indeed is his consternation as the young ladies beg the dentist to attend to him first as they are not in a hurry and can wait. Willyboy is game, however, and actually has two molars and one incisor extracted while the girls in the waiting room shriek with merriment at the trick they have played on him. When the operation is over he passes out with his handkerchief to his poor mouth and is astonished to hear the girls tell the doctor that they will put off their engagement until another day. He follows them to their home, where they invite him in and offer him some cigarettes. Now just at this particular moment smoking is the very last thing that Willyboy feels like doing. Anything but well when he left the bake shop, the teeth extracting completely finished him, and consequently after the first few puffs of the strong cigarettes provided by his chance acquaintances, our poor hero feels as if he were on the high seas and the vessel was doing a terrible lot of rolling.

THE ENGINEER'S DAUGHTER.—In a small railroad town out West, there lives an engineer of many years' experience. Jim Brake is his name. He lives in a little cottage, occupied by his daughter, Kate, his son, Will, and himself.

One Summer's day, two strangers, out for the sport of hunting, met Kate, and asked her the way to the nearest road inn. Upon receiving answer, they pass on.

Somewhat abashed, Kate hurries to the railroad junction, where she meets her father and brother. They are met by the same two hunters. Upon being introduced, with village-bred hospitality, old Brake invites them into his little home.

Now, John Hugh, our city hunter, of unstable character, easily succeeds in winning the affections of Kate. This in no wise pleases her father, yet she steadfastly clings to the man who seems to be her all on earth.

Shortly after her avowal of love there occurs a railroad accident, wherein her father is fatally injured and her brother is crippled for life. She is summoned to the scene of the mishap, and together with the man she thinks worthy of her love, accompanies the two injured ones to her home.

Just about a month later, Kate and Will, as beneficiaries under their father's insurance policy, receive a check for five thousand dollars. Cognizant of this, Hugh urges them to invest this amount in shares of the Claymore Mining Stock.

Now, Hugh's object in securing this money becomes apparent, that of winning the heart and hand of Ann Kelps, the daughter of a wealthy Chicago merchant. His infatuation for the engineer's daughter no longer exists.

The money in his possession, and determining to sever all association with Kate, he writes the following letter:

"My Dear Kate:—

"It grieves me to inform you that the Claymore mining investment was a failure, and your money, as well as mine, has been swallowed up. As I am left penniless, I cannot support a wife. Our engagement must terminate. Forgive and forget me. JOHN."

Overcome with this unexpected and disastrous state of affairs Kate determines to seek a position for the subsistence of the two. Apprising her brother of this, she sets out on the same quest that so many have sought for and failed to attain.

Let us follow her in her search for employment, and we will see that eventually she secures a position as maid to a wealthy old lady from the East at the very home where John Hugh is wooing Ann Kelps.

Kate sees and recognizes him. After a time, he meets her and attempts to make some satisfactory explanation. In that he fails and is finally denounced by her to Mr. Kelps, his wife and daughter.

Knowing that the game has gone against him, Hugh finds himself in a decidedly unenviable plight. Old Kelps offers him the alternative of restoring the money of Kate and her brother, or serving the thief's penance in jail. He surrenders the money to Kate, who joyfully hastens to her home.

THE HEROINE OF MAFEKING.—Another stirring picture story with the Boer War in the background. The interest centers around the lives of two members of the British nobility: Lord Arthur Ralston and Lady Mary Grey. Lord Arthur and Lady Mary are betrothed and the wedding is to take place in Mafeking. As Lord Arthur's regiment is quartered in South Africa indefinitely, rumors are rife of coming conflict with the Boers and on the very eve of Lady Mary's embarkation from England Lord Arthur cables her as follows: "Our wedding here out of question—WAR CERTAIN—postpone until my return." Lady Mary reads the cablegram and proves to have a will of her own. "Father, he is in danger, my place is by his side—I am going to South Africa to marry the man I love." A few months pass. The war has begun and Mafeking is filled with soldiers. Lord Arthur and Lady Mary are to be married at St. Paul's. We see the church crowded with English officers, their wives and the friends of the dashing colonel. Just as the ceremony concludes, a Boer shell crashes through the side of the edifice, scattering death and destruction among the assembled spectators. Lord Arthur carries his bride to a place of safety and rushes to the barracks and takes his place at the head of his regiment. One of the most sanguinary battles of the war is reproduced. Cannon Kopje stormed and captured early in the siege was the key to the whole position, as it allowed the Boers a commanding point from which they could shell the besieged town without fear of reprisal. An order comes to English headquarters: "Cannon Kopje must be retaken." A stubborn resistance is met by the English, but the Boers are at last driven back, but at what a cost. The last drop of water has been drained from the canteens—the wounded beg piteously from thirst. Lord Arthur sees that the end of human endurance has been reached. He calls for a volunteer, and sends the following appeal: "Commissary Department, Mafeking: My men have fought here twelve hours without water. Unless it reaches us soon we must surrender." The water cart is brought to the well, the native workmen start to fill it, a shell bursts twenty feet from the pump. Lady Mary is ministering to a wounded officer in a rough bombproof when the news comes of her husband's plight. She reads his appeal herself, taking the note from the nerveless grasp of a young officer that is killed by a bursting shell almost at her feet.

The scenes that follow depict the courage a woman may display when she finds the man she loves is in danger. At the point of a revolver she forces the natives to fill the waiting cart with the life-giving water those gallant soldiers must have if they are to live. Then taking the reins herself, she drives through the line of the Boer fire and reaches the trenches to fall fainting into the arms of her husband. Then later we see the army of relief wading the Tugela on their way to save Mafeking.

"London, three months later"—Lord Arthur has been wounded and with his wife is home on a furlough. A message from Lord Roberts comes announcing to Colonel Ralston that he has been promoted to the grade of Brigadier General for bravery at Mafeking.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

CAPTURING THE NORTH POLE.—Baron Munchausen, the great explorer and sportsman, whose adventures are always more astounding and marvelous than those of any other traveler, starts on an expedition to discover the North Pole.

He reaches the polar seas after a journey through the ice-pack and meets the "Spirit of the North," a beautiful female, who presents him with the Pole Star.

The gallant Baron hitches the Pole Star to his sleigh and starts across the ice straight for the pole. Upon his arrival there he finds a huge white bear in possession, guarding a very substantial-looking "pole."

By means of hypnotism our hero gets the bear "under the influence" and makes it assist him to saw down the pole with a two-handed lumber saw. Then the Baron and the bear each shoulder one end and return with the trophy to civilization. The arrival of the triumphant explorer with his bear, carrying the pole, at once convinces the most skeptical and the Baron is declared to be the true discoverer of the North Pole.

THE SECRET CHAMBER.—Eleanor is in love with a sergeant of the guards, but her parents urge her to wed Hubert de Salvigny, a wealthy bachelor, living near by, who offers the parents a handsome sum of money if they will consummate the marriage.

The seagcant tries to interfere but is insulted by de Salvigny, whom he therefore challenges to a duel.

One of de Salvigny's servants treacherously impedes the sergeant's movements, thus placing him at the mercy of his adversary. Eleanor appears on the scene and in order to save the sergeant, whom she loves, she consents to marry de Salvigny.

Some little time afterwards Eleanor, who has now become mistress of the castle, discovers the entrance to a secret chamber. Feeling curious, she enters it and finds a vault containing piled up jewels and valuable articles of all kinds, which convinces her of the fact that her husband is a highwayman. As she comes out of the exit from the secret chamber, which leads out-of-doors, she finds her husband with a band of armed men, discussing the details of a profitable expedition. She turns to retreat, but makes a noise in doing so, thus arousing the suspicion of the robbers. One of them thrusts his sword into the dark recesses of the cave and wounds Eleanor in the arm. The brigands go away without discovering her presence and she, after informing the police, falls in a faint to the ground.

The robbers, led by de Salvigny, find Eleanor's tracks and soon reach her. They are anxious to put her to death, but de Salvigny prevents them. A furious fight is the result. De Salvigny falls and Eleanor is about to be killed when the police and the guards arrive in force, led by Eleanor's sergeant lover. The brigands are routed and Eleanor throws herself into the arms of her former fiance.

THROUGH THE BREAKERS

A STORY OF THE SLAVES OF SOCIETY.

Undoubtedly the cardinal sins of society's devotees is neglect of the home. The obligations are so compelling that the undivided attention of its members is induced to the entire disregard of all things domestic. Mr. and Mrs. Nostrand were no exception to the rule, and although they held for their young child the most sincere parental affection, still they suffered it to the care of the maid, while they spent their time at the whist party or the club. The little one alone and forlorn, crushed in spirit, becomes seriously ill, and the father, now alarmed, insists that the mother remain at its side, but she does not realize the child is seriously ill, and so attends a fancy dress soiree. In the course of the evening she is apprised that her child is dead. Rushing home she finds she has not only lost her child but her husband, who leaves the house in a fit of despondency. Both, however, are driven by the same impulse to the grave of the baby, where they are reunited. Length, 974 feet.

RELEASED DECEMBER 9, 1909.

THE REDMAN'S VIEW

A STORY OF THE AMERICAN ABORIGINES.

The subject of the red man's persecution has been so often the theme of story that it would appear an extreme exposition of egotism to say that this production is unique and novel, but such is the case, for there was never before presented a more beautiful depiction of trials of the early Indians than this. It shows how the poor redskin was made to trek from place to place by the march of progress which was ever forging its way into the West. The white men, coming on a tribe of Kiowa Indians, force them to move on and keep the sweetheart of one of the young braves, who is the old chief's son, to act as a slavey. The young man recognizing his duty towards his father, leaves his sweetheart. The poor redskins are driven from place to place, until at last the old chief dies and, chanting the song of death, they prepare his bier. It is erected on stakes covered with moss and foliage. On this he is laid, with his head towards the East, a fire to light his way and food that he may not hunger. The young man's duty fulfilled, he hastens back for his sweetheart, whom he rescues. We last see the couple bowed before the bier of the old chief. The scenic and poetic beauty of the subject has never been excelled. Length, 971 feet.

THE CARTER PRESS PEABODY MASS.

Special Quotations for Large Quantities

first scenes show the Egyptian court and King Pharaoh commanding the slave drivers to beat the Hebrew toilers who show signs of rebellion. Pharaoh notices this and, calling his scribes, orders that a decree he published that every man-child horn to the Hebrews he killed.

Scene 2.—The parchment is prepared and is read in Pharaoh's court in the presence of Pharaoh's daughter, who hears and pleads in vain for his clemency.

Pharaoh's Decree.

Every male child that is horn to the Hebrews shall be cast into the river.

Scene 3.—The Egyptians ruthlessly proceed to carry out the decree and seize the male children from the arms of the Hebrew mothers.

Scene 4.—Here we are shown the interior of a Hebrew dwelling. The child Moses is in a cradle and his mother is bending over him, utterly unconscious of the cruel edict of King Pharaoh. The sister of Moses is shown attending to household duties and she takes a pitcher and goes to the well to draw water. There she learns of the slaughter of the innocents and hastens back and tells the mother of the cruel scenes she has witnessed. They decide to hide the child Moses by the river, and the cradle or ark is covered and carried between them to a marsh, where they plaster the outside with soft mud to keep out the water, and placing the child therein, his sister remains nearby to watch what will become of him.

Scene 5.—"And the daughter of Pharaoh came down to wash herself at the river; and her maidens walked along by the river's edge; and when she saw the ark among the flags she sent her maid to fetch it. And when she had opened it she saw the child; and, behold, the babe wept, and she had compassion on him." Pharaoh's daughter fondles and pets the crying child and decides that she will keep him for her own. The sister of Moses approaches and suggests that she call a nurse of the Hebrew women and she, of course, called the child's mother. "And Pharaoh's daughter said unto her, Take this child away and nurse it for me and I will give thee thy wages. And the woman took the child and nursed it."

Scene 6.—Pharaoh is informed of his daughter's caprice and demands to see the child. He orders it away, but his daughter embraces him and pleads so hard for the life of the child that he consents and gives it his protection and blessing. A fitting ending is a picture of the mother and sister of Moses again fondling their own and giving thanks to God for their unexpected good fortune.

A LESSON IN DOMESTIC ECONOMY.—Scene 1. — Accusation — Condemnation. — Bridget, in the kitchen, loses her temper as the groceryman, the milkman, the iceman, etc., call and pester her for payment of their bills. Driving them out of the kitchen, she gathers up the bills and brings them to Mr. and Mrs. Newhouse, who are seated at breakfast. They accuse her of extravagance in her housekeeping and she flings off her apron and leaves the house in high dudgeon, taking care to leave her address in a prominent place.

Scene 2.—Experimentation — Irritation. — Hubby goes to business and wifey bravely tries to do the household cooking and cleaning. She places a chicken in the oven and while she is shaving some other interesting experience she detects a burning smell and opens the oven to find the chicken done to a cinder.

Scene 3.—Cremation—Lamentation.—Hubby returning, slips on the soap which his wife has left on the front steps. He is about to chide her, but finds her weeping in despair and manfully peels off his coat and assumes charge of affairs. They manage to get something to eat.

Scene 4.—Collaboration—Conflagration.—Hubby and wife try washing and get caught in the wringer. He has some sad experiences in hanging out the wash and, while ironing, he leaves an iron standing on one of his wife's dresses, burning a hole through the dress.

Scene 5.—Recrimination—Desperation.—They each accuse the other of incompetency. He points to the cinder chicken; she points to the burned dress, and they both agree to send for Bridget.

Scene 6.—Inspiration—Investigation.—In their distress they spy the address of the employment agency which Bridget has been careful to leave, and no time is lost in getting into telephone communication.

Scene 7.—Vindication—Restoration.—Mr. and Mrs. Newhouse are again seated at the breakfast table enjoying a truly meal. Bridget majestically stalks around serving the dishes, while Mr. Newhouse, in his exuberation, slyly slips her a handsome tip to show his appreciation.

A DAY WITH OUR SOLDIER BOYS.—A sprinkling of patriotic scenes in any program or play is always the cue for a burst of applause, hence these subjects are popular with exhibitors. The patriotic ring is well supplied in this Vitagraph film of scenes in the daily life of a company of United States soldier boys. We see and almost hear the bugle call of attention, the morning set-up drill, the soldiers at their ablutions, the march to the breakfast table and the mess room. Visitors come and go and greet the officers and watch the men at a splendid calisthenic drill. We are shown an excellent photographic rendering of a company of soldiers under heavy marching orders, on dress parade and at big gun drill. The lighter vein of a soldier's life is shown by such sports as blanket tossing, running the gauntlet, ducking and other forms of mild punishment. A short and lively picture of military camp life that will surely be widely appreciated.

GAMBLING WITH DEATH.—The first scenes are laid in the palace and beautiful grounds of Count Flambeau, a scion of the French nobility. The Count's beautiful and only daughter, Marie, whom he regards as the apple of his eye, is wooed and won by the young and dashing Viscount Darcy, while Roskoff, the confidential secretary to the Count, who secretly loves his master's daughter, shows his displeasure and hatred of his successful rival. The depth of his passion is shown by his kissing of the veil which the young lady has left behind, and when she returns and discovers him in the act he declares his love for her. She turns from him with contempt, and as her father enters the room she informs him of the presumption of his servant. The Count denounces the schemer, who rushes from the room vowing vengeance.

Roskoff is next seen joining a party of revolutionists. He is blindfolded and led to their secret meeting place, where he takes the oath of allegiance. Exciting speeches are made against the Royalists, with cries of "Down with the Nobility!" and Roskoff slashes a portrait of the king and is chosen a leader of the revolutionists.

Meanwhile the Count seals the betrothal of Marie and Viscount Darcy and gives them his blessing. While they are in the midst of their happiness a messenger enters with a letter to the Count which causes consternation.

Roskoff spies and learns of the movements of the Royalist party and leads an attack in which the Royalists are routed, the Count slain and Viscount Darcy escapes and flees to the palace, where he tells of the disaster and the death of the Count. While he is speaking they hear a tumult and see a mob of revolutionists approaching, with Roskoff at the head, determined upon the death of his rival. There being no opportunity to escape, Father Lorraine hastily suggests a ruse and, seizing a knife, he slashes Darcy's wrist and smears the blood on his face and breast. He commands Darcy to lie still and feign death while he lights candles and places them around him, and, when the villains enter, the priest and Marie are bending in prayer over the supposed dead body. Roskoff approaches and attempts to speak to Marie, but the priest waves him aside and he exits with a gleam of satisfaction on his face. Just as Father Lorraine and Marie begin to think that their ruse has been successful, Roskoff enters again with men bearing a coffin and gives orders to remove the body. The priest and Marie are stunned, but their protests do not avail, and Darcy's body is lifted into the coffin, which is nailed up and borne away by the villains for burial. Roskoff leaves guards at the door, but the priest enables Marie to escape by a window and she arrives at the cemetery in time to prevent the grave diggers from covering up the body of her lover. She bribes the grave digger to open the coffin only to find that Darcy is really dead, and she falls fainting across his body. Father Lorraine also arrives on the scene and he is vainly trying to revive the broken-hearted Marie when Roskoff rushes up, having discovered her escape from the palace. Roskoff is about to approach Marie when Father Lorraine arises in his wrath, and pointing to the two dead bodies, seizes Roskoff's hat and dashes it to the ground, while he calls down curses on his head. The villain slinks away as the priest begins to offer up a prayer for the dead.

THE SONG THAT REACHED HER HEART (Raleigh & Rhert).—The daughter of Squire Malcolm and young Lieuteuaut Burleigh are desperately in love, and the engagemeut is ultimately ratified by the conseut of the parents. Amidst the charm of sylvan surroundings, the young lieutenant pays court to his lady-love, to whose pleasure he never tires of miuistering with the music of his voice, aud the harmonies he coutrives upon the guitar. Their blissful moments are onc evening disturbed by the arrival of orders for the young man to immediately join his ship. Reluctantly the lovers part, full of hope for their next meeting. Something of a tragedy, however, forms the next thread of the romance. An accident during some gun practice results iu an explosion and the destruction of the ship. In the newspaper, Dorothy reads the horrifying news that all lives have been lost. The shock robs her of her reason, and a double cloak of sorrow is thrown upon the lives of her family. Lieutenant Burleigh has, however, succeeded in swimming to a rock, from which he is rescued. Sufficiently recovered, he visits the squire's homestead, where the news of Dorothy's sad condition is made known to him. She fails to recognize him, although by all the tender art of a devoted lover he endeavors to bring back to her wrecked hrain memories of former days of gladness. Onc evening he is prompted to serenade his love, and at the first few bars of the melody he pours forth she starts as in recognition of some dim remembrance. Gradually passing with his guitar to their old-time seat in the grounds, he lures her on with an almost breathless anticipation of her returning reason. The strains of music begin to make a pronounced impression upon Dorothy, the climax arriving in a welcome burst of tears.

THE PAINTER'S IDOL (Eclair).—In search of inspiration, the painter, Lucas Del Rebbio, takes a ramble hy the river-side, and has an adventure in preventing a young girl from ending her life by drowning. Perceiving in her a certain form of beauty, he arranges for her to pose as a model for his picture. The charms of the young girl make an impression upon him, and becoming fascinated, he eventually declares his love to her and arranges a great feast to celebrate their betrothal. During the festivities, however, the susceptible nature of the painter becomes influenced by an attractive dancing girl who has been invited to entertain the guests. Believing himself to be unobserved, he seeks her society, but his betrothed becomes aware of his actions. Disguising hrself as a cavalier, she visits the tavern where her lover holds his meetings with the dancing girl, and openly poses as an admirer. In a great rage the painter appears and fights a duel with his unrecognized rival, who gets the worst of the encounter and is left helpless by the river-side. Dragging herself along by a great effort she endeavors to seek some shelter, but sinks exhausted upon the steps of a church, from which she is carried by good-hearted monks to the home of the painter. Unconscious that his betrothed had in any way been connected with his adventure, the latter retnrns to his studio and prepares to put the finishing touches to his great picture. His lady-love, although weak and ill, resumes her position as the model, but in the midst of her posing she is seized with faintness. She is tenderly lifted by the painter from the rostrum upon which she has fallen. Recovering for a few moments, she discloses the facts of the duel, and the sorrowful painter, with the full force of his error borne home to him so severely, listens as she utters with her last breath, " 'Twas I, you fought. Forgive me for playing the spy upon you. I loved you with all the devotion of my soul."

THE DOUBLE SIX (Raleigh & Robert).—At the conclusion of a domino party, host and hostess, together with their two gentlemen guests, rise from their seats preparatory to leave-taking. One of the guests, while the others are bidding each other good-night, takes advantage of his host's forgetfulness in leaving his keys on the table, abstracts the front door key and places it in his pocket. He then leaves the house in company with his fellow guest. In the absence of his parents, the hosts' little child becomes misbievous and hides a domino, the double six, iu the cash box in a cabinet. Outside the house the two guests part, the thief accidentally dropping his scarf, which the other picks up for him. Everything is in darkness, and presently the thief, fully masked, comes in and gropes his way to the cabinet. With a jimmy, he very soon has the door open, when suddenly he is snrprised hy the master of the house. A struggle ensues, during which the thief overpowers bis host and decamps with the cash box. Arriving at his rooms, he forces up the lid and abstracts some notes, letting fall, unnoticed, the double-six domino. Frightened lest the crime should be brought home to him, he hides the notes behind a picture, burns the cash box and throws the jimmy out through the window. The host, meanwhile, is soon discovered in his helpless condition, and the thief's scarf, wbich he clutched during his struggle with him, gives the police a clue. A domino is also fonnd missing, and with these two pieces of evidence, the police proceed at once to the thief's lair. Confronted with his own scarf, he feigns complete ignorance of the whole affair bnt the detective, nnknown to the culprit, discovers tbe missing domino in tbe apartment. The thief is taken to his host's house and charged with tbe theft and assault. The child, confessing his mischievous prank, provides the necessary liuk in the chain of evidence for the conviction of the thief, who unconsciously took with his ill-goten gains the silent, but ao fatal an accuser, the "double-six."

MARVELOUS SHAVING SOAP.—Mr. Stocksey is attended hy his harber, whose attention is divided hetween the chin of his client and the attractions of the housemaid, whose duties bring her to the apartment. The barber's hand, becoming nervous, loses its deftness, and Stocksey receives a nasty gash before the shaving operation has becu completed. In pain and disgust he kicks the barber out, and proceeds to business with his face in bandages. The next day his notice is attracted to a salesman proclaiming the wonderful properties of a new shaving soap, by the use of which the barber and his razor may be entirely dispensed with. Purchasing a box of the new compound, he arrives home, and gleefully explaina the virtues of the new soap. But that box of soap spells trouble for the Stocksey bousehold when the two precocious hoys discover it. Sprinkling the soap upon mats, hrooms, grandpa's beard, grandma's hair, etc., they finish up by trying it on the dog. Hair vanishes immediately upon the application of the soap and a pair of bellows, and a series of laughable incidents characterizes the whole of the proceedings connected with Stockey's box of marvelous shaving soap.

MACBETH (Produced by Cines & Co.).—The play opens with the scene on the wild heath where the three witches appear to Macbeth and Banquo, as they are returning from their victorious hattle with the rebels. They predict the kingship of Macbeth with the words "All Hail, King, that shall be hereafter." They show him a crown, and having also predicted that he shall be created Thane of Cawdor, and that the sons of Banquo shall be Kings of Scotland and not those of Macbeth, the witches fade away, to the utter dismay of the two generals. Then follows a series of very fine tableaux, showing King Duncan conferring upon Macbeth the dignity of Thane of Cawdor, thus verifying the prophesy of the witches, the evil councillings of Lady Macbeth and the visit of King Duncan to Macbeth's castle, accompanied hy his two sons, Malcolm and Donalbain, with a numerous retinue. The King is received with gracious smiles by Lady Macbeth, who is still urging her husband to kill him so that they may hoth attain to royal state. Macbeth's honorable aversion to so foul a deed, and the constant promptings of the wicked Lady Macbeth, are finely portrayed. The murder of the King is finally accomplished by Macheth, and Lady Macbeth is seen to place the blood-stained dagger in the belt of one of the royal attendants, to divert suspicion. Macbeth is crowned King. The assassination of Banquo follows, and his ghost is seen to appear to Macbeth at the great feast.

Macbeth's second consultation with the witches in their cave is shown, and he is told to beware of Macduff, the Thane of Fife, and that he should never be vanquished until the wood of Birnam should move.

LEOPARD HUNTING IN ABYSSINIA (Ambrosio).—With their native guides, the hunters begin their tracking through some wildly picturesque country, and soon a powerful monster is observed making leaps into the boughs of a tree, eventually securing a large hird in his unmerciful looking paws. A glimpse of another huge animal is obtained displaying its magnificent physique while enjoying a tasty meal in his lair. Then one of the guns is sighted upon another of the prairie prowlers and a good shot brings the animal to earth. Sheltered behind huge boulders, the hunters secure further prizes with telling shots, and finally a splendid trophy, in the shape of the leopard skin, is proudly displayed and borne away in triumph.

THE SERVANT OF THE ACTRESS (Itala).—"When the cat's away the mice will play" is the keynote of this film farce. Whilst their mistress is away at the theater, the servants arrange to regale their friends and to have a generally good time to themselves.

The rehearsal for which their mistress has visited the theater is postponed for some particular reason, and the lady returns home with some of the principals in the play. Unknown to her servants, she commences to rehearse some tragic scenes in her own apartment.

The servants are disturbed in the midst of their hilarity by the sounds of the exclamations of the lady and her companions, and creep to the door of her room. Peeping through the keyhole, they are astonnded to witness some unusual actions between her mistress and the "hero of the piece."

THE MOTOR CYCLIST (Raleigh & Robert).—The fellow who plays the part of the Motor Cyclist in this picture is a real wonder—he lived to pose for another subject. We are told that after he finished posing for this film he was laid up in the hospital for no less than ten days. He is shown going at breackneck speed, overturning a cart to which a donkey is attached and throwing the animal flat on his back. He upsets pnshcarts and scaffolds upon which men are working, causing them to fall to the ground. While the incidents in which he takes part are many, yet the subject is full of interest throughout. He finally rides into a river with his motor cycle, but ia fished out by the pursuers, wbo give him a good thrashing.

THE MESSAGE OF AN ARROW.—When Slim, a cowhoy, defends White Swan, an Indian girl, from Red, another cowboy, and takes her away, he gains Red's dislike. They reacb the Indian camp and are told what haa happened. Slim pacifies them and leaves. Gray Wolf, who is in love with White Swan, becomes jealous and is ordered from the camp hy the girl'a father. Red and Gray Wolf get together and their combined confidencea make them enemies to Slim. Red shows papera to Gray Wolf, which tell that money is to be gained if the Indian chief could he induced to sell his land, and that Slim must he disposed of. The chief is brought to the woods hy Wolf, where they sit and drink, the squaw watching them. Red, Wolf and the chief enter a tavern, where papers are read, and interpreted incorrectly by Gray Wolf to the chief. When the time to sign comes, Slim rushes in and teara the papers to pieces. He then cieara tne tavern and sits alone to think. Red is about to shoot him, when he himself is shot. Slim is trying to figure out who did it, when the squaw says she did. Slim kisses her, when he realizes it was for his safety she did it, and she leaves the tavern. Gray Wolf accuses Slim of the deed, but no proof can be established. Gray Wolf manages to get possession of the papers Red had, and offers them to the squaw as a bribe to come to him, when revealing that he knows she killed Red. After White Swan goes with him, he takes the papers away, and leaves her alone. She tries to escape, and finding it impossible, ties a message to an arrow and shoots it into midair. It happens to fall at Slim's feet, when he is leaving town, and he goes to her rescue. Wolf returns, and a fight follows. Slim is victorious in every way, and Gray Wolf's duplicity made known when White Swan shows papers hidden in his bosom.

REUNITED AT THE GALLOWS (Bison).—The opening scene shows a chance meeting of Jennie, a factory girl, and Joe. He accompanies her to tbe door of ber home, and plainly shows his admiration. He bargains with and finally persuades a sexton to perform a mock marriage. When the minister of the church comes upon the sexton and sees his preoccupation, he learns what he is about to do, and tells the sexton he will perform the ceremony, and thereby make it valid. When Jennie is about to leave the factory, she is handed a note from Joe, suggesting the marriage that night, which gives her great pleasure. They are wedded by the minister, who is clothed like the sexton. Joe later receives word from Jennie that she must tell her mother of the ceremony. He plans a meeting and writes as she valued her life not to reveal the marriage. After they meet and part, Jennie wanders away, leaving her bag with Joe's note on the ground, and finally joins a band of gypsies. When Jennie's belongings are found, a crime is suspected and Joe traced and arrested. He is tried and condemned. The minister comes to the prison and tells Joe he was really married to Jennie. Jennie, who is with the gypsies, sees a newspaper, which tells that Joe Rogers' life is to be ended. The gypsies learn of her trouble and give her a horse and wagon to go to save her husband. After much hard riding, Jennie reaches the gallows in time to nrevent the pnnishment, and they are happily reunited.

MANHOOD'S REWARD.—William Harrison, a compositor with a tendency to travel, appears in Milliville and obtains a job on the Millville News, a paper published and edited hy Jim Case, a cranky and tyrannical man. Bobby Pye, a mischievous boy, works as devil in the pressroom of the News. Bohby has a hard time of it and is continually abnsed by Case. John Holmes, a wealthy merchant and his family reside in a town close to Millville, and one evening his wife and children attended a reception, leaving Holmes alone at home to finish some important work. He doses while at work and suddenly awakens to find a burglar in the room. A struggle takes place in which Holmes is struck a heavy blow on the head, resulting in a temporary loss of memory. He leaves his home and wanders off and is found on the railroad tracks by the traveling printer, Will Harrison, who rescues him from an approaching train just in the nick of time. Will's appearance is due to the fact that he quit his job on the Millville News, after preventing the editor from further abusing Bobby, when Case strikes and knocks Bobby down. Holmes has been robbed by tramps and his shoes and coat taken, and Will, thinking Holmes is suffering from exposure, removes his shoes and coat and puts them on Holmes. Holmes cannot tell where he lives or who he is and in an effort to find food and shelter, they are taken for tramps. In the meantime, the maid discovering evidence of a struggle, and Holmes having disappeared, notifies the family, who immediately send out an alarm and offer a reward of $5,000 for information of the whereabouts of the father. From papers on Holmes' person and constant question, Will gets Holmes to remember who he is, and after great suffering, and almost exhausted, he manages to get Holmes to his home, the family being absent investigating a clue. Finding no one home, Will, after making Holmes comfortable, leaves the house to get assistance. He is seen leaviug by the maid,

HIS LAST GAME.—Bill Going is the Indian who is scheduled to pitch for the Choctaw team in their baseball game with the Jimtowns. It is the deciding game of the series, and so sure a winner is he that two gamblers try to bribe him to lose his game. He is absolutely honest, however, and they finally try a trick with a drugged drink. A timely warning helps him discover it; there is a fight, and in an exchange of pistol shots one gambler drops. The Indian pitcher is arrested, and swift Western justice condemns him to death. It is now a few hours before the fame, and without him the Jimtowns will win and the crooked bettor plans a big coup. Now, as is frequently done in the case of Indians, Bill Going is granted a temporary respite on his word to return at six and meet his doom. He runs post-haste to the ball grounds, and amid great excitement, in the last inning, he pitches his team to victory. He is carried back on the shoulders of hordes of admirers, but after it is all over he notes that his time is up and stolidly runs back to where the firing squad is waiting, not knowing that friends, feeling that his deed was justified, have interceded in his behalf and are trying to secure a reprieve in time to prevent the execution. He calmly smokes a pipe as he stands by the ditch with a leaf on his breast to help the executioners' aim.

A Western Feature Film—A Big Western Drama

"THE RANCHMAN'S RIVAL"

Jim Watson, a cowpuncher, is engaged to marry the daughter of a Texas ranchman, but the engagement is broken when the girl's head is turned by the attentions paid her by a wealthy Easterner. Jim is jilted and the Easterner plans a fake marriage, which is frustrated by the timely appearance of the Easterner's wife. The girl, now thrown over by the Easterner, returns to Jim, repentant and ashamed, and asks forgiveness. He needs little coaxing, and, restoring the engagement ring to her finger, takes her tendrly in his arms.

This Western film is another box office tonic. Order it from your film exchange NOW. Advertise it with our handsome six-color litho poster. The length of the film is 1,000 feet.

"THE SPANISH GIRL"

This picturesque Mexican drama is a notable film in point of rich photography, its excellent story, and intensely interesting in its genuine Mexican atmosphere.

Lola, a Spanish dancing girl, endeavors to win the love of a young ranch foreman, "Bud" Wilson, who is engaged to marry his employer's daughter. Lola is repulsed and seeks revenge in a conspiracy against the foreman's sweetheart.

Her scheme works well until Lola's jealous admirer, Pedro Mayos, who is also mixed up in the plot, confesses all to Wilson. The interrupted love affair is again resumed and the Spanish girl driven from the rauch. (Length, approximate, 975 feet.)

Motion Picture Exhibitors

Do you realize that the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance

Is made up of all the American Film Manufacturers and all the prominent Importers of the very best makes of European Film as well as every Film buying Independent Exchange in America, and have entered the field to protect themselves as well as the Exhibitor from the Trust, whose ultimate object is to control the Film Exchanges, thereby controlling the prices to Exhibitors? "You pay the Fiddler."

Give the Independent Exchanges your support and help us protect you and the Exchange.

If you are already patronizing an Independent Exchange and are suspicious that they are not buying Film, write the Secretary for the desired information.

The Independent Exchanges can now furnish you six American made reels weekly, (and by December 31st, five reels more.) In addition the Independent Importers place on the market not less than seventeen reels weekly of the finest Film made in Europe.

The Alliance will protect Independent Exhibitors against legal prosecution or persecution by the Trust, and will also compel exchanges to "live up" to agreements made with their customers.

OVER ONE THOUSAND TWO HUNDRED EXHIBITORS

ARE USING THE

for his moving picture machine, because he had the BEST LIGHT and the SMALLEST ELECTRIC BILL and no worry over hot rheostats and poor flickering light from so-called current savers.

Have You a HALLBERG?

IF NOT—WHY NOT?

I guarantee to save 2-3 on your electric bill and to give the best light possible, or refund your money. Over 1200 exhibitors are now using the HALLBERG, and I am replacing so-called current savers every day.

THE REASON:—I save more and give a better light, and besides, the HALLBERG does not need a hand operated switch—it requires no attention after once installed, as it is automatic and lasts a life time.

I have other equally important and necessary specialties for you, including—The MOTIOGRAPH Flickerless MOVING PICTURE MACHINE, ELECTRA PINK LABEL CARBONS, HALLBERG SPOT LIGHTS, EXHAUST FANS—4000 C P. FLAMING ARC LAMPS, and all kinds of high grade supplies and Announcement slides. WRITE FOR FREE CATALOGUE No 10-W—It tells you all about my excellent products. I also have a lot of current savers of several makes, as good as new at bargain prices, replaced by the "HALLBERG."

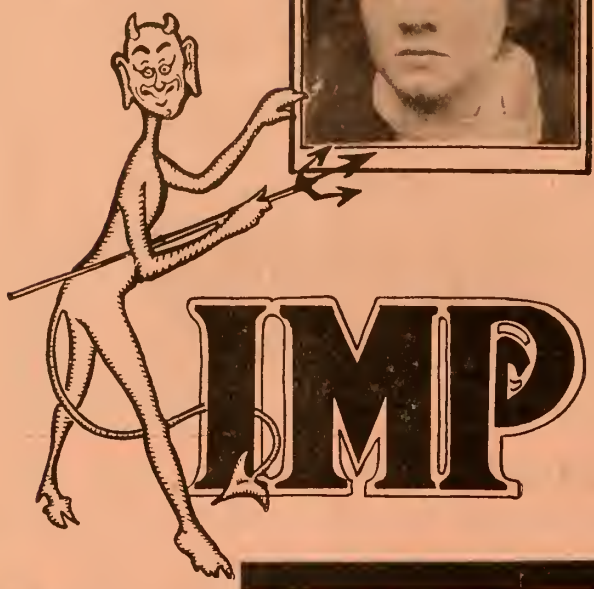
"She's an Imp!"



The "Imp's" Holiday Release is entitled

"LEST WE FORGET"

A Christmas heart story, brimful of the Yuletide spirit. It will send your audience away in a beatific frame of mind, for it deals with a question that goes straight to the soul. Of course, it "turns out right." Your special attention is called to the beautiful dissolve effects. This is the first time the "Imp" has tackled effects of this sort, put I don't believe "Lest We Forget" could have been improved upon if we had been doing this stunt every day for a hundred years. Tell your exchange you want this subject just as s(on as possible. Drop them a postal card RIGHT NOW. This is the sort of picture that helps give your theatre and the whole moving picture business a good, clean name. Get it, if you have to fight for it.

"The course of true love never runs smooth" is delightfully demonstrated in this picture which shows how, despising the selection of her father, a wealthy banker, Ethel accepts the dictates of her heart in selecting her life partner, on whose slender resources she is thrown for an existence.

A letter to Santa Claus is the medium of the re union.

The story is beautifully told.

The photography is artistic and effective.

Pictures and Pugilism.

The fortunes of the prize ring are apparently interwoven with those of the moving picture. Without the moving picture your modern prize fight would be shorn of most of its financial glamor and possibilities; without the prize fight the moving picture would not appeal to so many people as it apparently does. Here in New York City one of the most popular acts at Mr. Hammerstein's entertainment hall on Forty-second street is the moving picture of a noted fight. It is not only so in New York City, but in all large cities. Public interest in the doings of pugilism seems at times greater than the doings of the nation's President. We doubt if the junior members of our own staff could tell off-hand the names of all the Presidents of the United States, but we are tolerably certain that they could inform us at once, as to who was the victor when Mr. Corbett and Mr. Fitzsimmons last met in mortal combat—we mean in the prize ring. We do not know, and what is more, we do not care.

Of course, a love of sport underlies the admiration of the pugilistic art; the undying desire to see two well and equally matched men pitting their prowess against each other—whether it be in the prize ring, on the racing track, or on the golf course. And clearly when it is a question of fists or the gloves we are getting down to the primitive in human nature, for one of the first things man had to do, or was taught to do, was to defend himself, and that is just exactly what Mr. Jeffries and Mr. Johnson will be doing some time next year when this long-talked-of fight comes off.

A story is going the rounds that the Associated manufacturers have made a bid for the moving picture rights of the contest and that the Alliance manufacturers have outbid them. We do not think that this is correct. If, however, it is, it shows what an enormous amount of interest is taken in the photographic end of the contest. Also it induces the permissible suspicion that the fight is not, or will not be, in the common parlance, "a square deal." The purse is to be such a big one, the money to be paid for the picture rights such an enormous sum, that the "cutting up" or rather the dividing of two or three hundred thousand dollars between Jeffries and Johnson is possibly too strong a temptation to be resisted. So it is open to conjecture that the fight will be prearranged in order that the photographic end of matters may be suitably provided for. By suitably provided for we mean a nice long picture with plenty of incident and the culmination of the contest in a draw.

We know nothing about fighting, or the ethics of fighting, but it is the picture end of matters which has started us thinking. And these are the thoughts we think. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the picture of the contest, if there is anything like a contest, will be enormously popular all over the world. And then again, we confess that we would rather look on a film of a good, well-fought fight by good sportsmen than on films carrying the inanities and idiosyncrasies of dramatic construction which are so plentiful on the moving picture screen. So we hope Jeffries and Johnson will make a good fight of it and that it will be a good picture, and that everybody all around will make money out of it.

Pictures of the Roosevelt Hunt.

A Remarkable Series of Films.

Several weeks ago we wrote a short editorial apropos of the return of A. R. Dugmore, the well-known photographer of animals, from Africa, where he had been photographing in the company of Mr. Roosevelt. We regretted that moving picture apparatus did not form a part of Mr. Dugmore's outfit. We also regretted that there seemed to be no record of a moving picture camera having been used in the course of the ex-President's hunting experiences. We pointed out that such pictures, if they could be, or were, obtained, would be of vast interest to the American public, irrespective of their scientific value. We regretted, in short, that such a fine opportunity had been lost.

It is an agreeable surprise to us, therefore, to learn that our regrets were not justified. The opportunity has not been lost. It seems by a cable dispatch published this week, in the New York papers, that a well-known British photographer, Richard Kearton, probably one of the most famous photographers of animals in the world, was present with Mr. Roosevelt on his expedition and took with him a moving picture camera. Kearton, we may explain, will photograph birds in their nests, eagles in their lofty rocks, birds in flight, rare wild animals and similar subjects. Moreover, he has been successful in making the mechanism of his moving picture camera so silent that he can approach within a few feet of his prey without disturbing it, and so is enabled to secure the most wonderful photographs of nature subjects it is possible to think of. In other words, he lays bare the innermost secrets of the animal kingdom by means of the moving picture camera. The message to which we refer appeared in the New York Times last week, and is as follows:

"Mr. Kearton, whose exploits with the camera in the field of natural history had already gained him a great reputation, has been getting pictures with a cinematograph in that part of East Africa where ex-President Roosevelt has been hunting. Mr. Kearton this afternoon gave an exhibition of his films at the Alhambra Theater. Among the audience were the Duke and Duchess of Connaught and the Princess Patricia, who shortly are going to follow in the ex-President's footsteps.

"Mr. Roosevelt was shown watching a native war dance, being carried across a stream on the shoulders of a sturdy porter, and riding off in the pursuit of game. But the real interest of the exhibition lay in the pictures of African animal and bird life obtained by Mr. Kearton His great ambition was to get a cinematograph series of a lion, but though he lay in wait for the king of beasts for a week, he was unable to accomplish this object. A flashlight photograph, however, was obtained of a lion going to drink, and there are a number of cinematographs of rhinoceroses, which Mr. Kearton described as the most dangerous African beasts."

We hope these pictures will be placed on view in the American moving picture theaters, the patrons of which show such deep interest in natural subjects that they are bound to accord anything of a special nature like the Roosevelt photographs an exceedingly hearty reception We hope, too, that Kearton's work will be stimulative of other work in the same direction. As we have pointed out over and over again, there is much to be done in making films of nature and natural history subjects which will be acceptable to moving picture audiences.

"First Catch Your Hare."

"First catch your hare" is a familiar quotation. It is attributed to Mrs. Glasse, who in the long ago wrote a cook book, in the pages of which she gave directions for making hare soup, starting out with these words, "First catch your hare." That is what some of the people in the moving picture business must do to-day. They must first catch their hare. They are in the business for the purpose of selling good pictures—or rather of making them to sell. Well, they must first catch their hare; they must learn how to make the pictures. And it is a fact that of the twenty-four manufacturers of moving picture films in the United States, a considerable number do not know how to make pictures or to hire help to make those pictures, consequently they know little or nothing about the business in which they hope to succeed.

We are pointing here more particularly to the Independent manufacturers, of which there are no less than fifteen. We wish all these gentlemen the utmost success, both collectively and individually. Success technically, at any rate—we have nothing to do here in this article with the commercial end of matters—success technically, is well within their grasp if they would only get down to the only way to make moving pictures, and that is by the scientific method, which was briefly outlined in the course of a series of articles printed in these pages in the early part of the year. When those articles were written, there were not fifteen Independent manufacturers in the United States—there were only five. It is, however, well within the bounds of probability that next year there may be thirty or more. It is a young industry and an expanding industry—an industry the possibilities of which have hardly yet been tapped.

We take occasion, therefore, to warn those who are going into the manufacturing end of matters or who have come into it or who may be thinking of coming into it, that the making of moving pictures is not the haphazard affair which many of those gentlemen who were present at the recent meeting of the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance seemed to think it is. On the executive staff of the Alliance there is not a single moving picture maker. It is composed of two importers and a few exchange proprietors. Yet these are the gentlemen who act as censors of pictures made by the members of the N. I. M. P. A., which is an amazing situation.

Earlier in the year we wrote several articles to the licensed manufacturers telling them that quality only would tell. And quality is telling. And now we address the Independent manufacturers and we tell them that quality alone will tell. It would be flattering to say that the best of the Independent American manufacturers equalled the best of the Licensed manufacturers. It does not. It may in time, as the result of hard, close work, and application of first principles to the scientific method of moving picture making—that is, the elimination of rule of thumb, guesswork, and mere empiricism. We have said over and over again, both in these pages and by word of mouth, that if a scene is arranged or rehearsed and is ready for photographing, the quality of the light, the aperture of the lens, the exposure, the development, can be so regulated, calibrated, or standardized that the work becomes almost automatic. We say that that can be done by intelligent camera men and photographers. It can be done, it ought to be done, it must be done if the continuous production of high class technically good moving pictures is to be assured.

At the recent meeting of the Alliance, something was said about the way in which the Independent manufacturers proposed to sell their pictures. No doubt some very useful business resolutions were come to. Now, from the technical point of view, we say to those manufacturers: Get down to the making of your pictures. If you hope to compete with the associated manufacturers you must certainly compete with them in quality, which is the crucial test of success. We have had in our offices, the last few weeks, several moving picture exhibitors who have told us that they have had to reject many films because they were technically and artistically below the standard. Their public won't stand for inferior productions. Hence our advice to the Independent manufacturers, "First catch your hare," i.e., first make your pictures before you talk about selling them.

THE KALEM COMPANY

will release Christmas week the first of their series of children pictures. It is called "The Cardboard Baby" and is destined to be as popular as their "Humpty-Dumpty Circus" of about a year ago. Exhibitors are looking forward to this series of children pictures as a special attraction to bill for afternoon performances.

Of the Kalem dramas it is generally remarked that there is a decided improvement in their execution. Their Southern company are actively engaged in Florida and accumulating a number of fine negatives.

NEW SAFETY DEVICE.

Mr. Robert C. Groh, manager of the Crystal Family Theater, St. Paul, Minn., writes us that their operator, Mr. Charles Bell, has invented and applied for a patent on a safety device for moving picture machines. It is called the Automatic Electric Dowser and can be attached to any machine. Mr. Groh says that it has been fully tested at their own theater and that it works to perfection. It is so constructed that the slightest enlargement of the loop, or film breakage, or large splice that will not pass the gate, or jump on account of broken sprocket holes, will cause the dowser to act instantly and cut off the light. If this device is as good as Mr. Groh claims it to be we might suggest to the Motion Picture Patents Company to reimburse the inventor and give the trade the free benefit of his device.

PEERLESS MOTION PICTURE COMPANY.

A New Independent Exchange in the Southwest.

Turning to his own account the valuable experience gained during several years' connection with the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company, Mr. H. K. Sombern has opened a film exchange in Kansas City, Mo. The Peerless Motion Picture Company is already well stocked with a full line of machines and supplies and will make a specialty of supplying exclusive Independent film service. Mr. Somborn's many friends in the trade wish him all due success. The new company is located at 1012 Baltimore avenue, Kansas City, Mo.

KINEMACOLOR

First American Exhibition of Moving Pictures in Natural Colors.

Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, New York, December 11, 1909.

SPECIAL CRITICISM OF THE PROCESS.

When an ordinary non-scientific person views a photograph in natural colors for the first time, his admiration for the production is none the less keen and great because he is ignorant of the means by which the picture has been made. This applies to most things in this world. The majority of us are quite content to enjoy the good things around us, whether they be clothing, jewelry, furniture, decorations or the other things that minister to our enjoyment and comfort without inquiring too closely how and by what means the things were produced. It is the same with the ordinary photograph on paper. It is the same with the ordinary monchromatic picture in a moving picture house. Probably only two per cent. of the people who look upon these things know exactly how they are made; not two per cent. care. The remaining 98 per cent. is content to accept the accomplished fact, with, of course, the qualifications that vary with the individual.

This probably indicates the attitude of the general public towards this week's remarkable demonstration of moving pictures in natural colors, which Mr. Charles Urban and Mr. G. Albert Smith have presented to the American, or rather to the New York public for the first time, at Madison Square Garden. The great public have for years and years been asking for ordinary photographs in natural colors. They have had them; they have got them —of a kind. So too, for the last ten or twelve years the great public has been saying to itself all over the world and often in our hearing, in great cities, "Oh! If we could only see these moving pictures in natural colors." Well, here they are in New York City this moment.

Careful readers of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, and by "careful readers" we mean the comparatively few who are interested in the underlying principles and the abstruse aspects of things,—those readers are sufficiently well aware that since January of this year we have subjected the Urban-Smith process, the Friese Greene process, and other processes for making good moving pictures in natural colors, to a searching analysis from scientific and practical points of view. The remarks we have felt it our duty to make are based upon a long study of the subject in most of its aspects, a great deal of observation—for we have been studying natural color photography for a good many years now—and, above all things, from a knowledge of the actual every-day requirements of the manufacturer, whose business in life it is to minister to the great public, about whom we started to write in the first paragraph of this article. So far, indeed, we have dealt very largely with matters of theory, always keeping in view the practical outcome. But now, after some years of waiting, the Urban-Smith results are before us. And they are to be judged by the ordinary test of those who, like ourselves, have made color the subject of much theoretical and practical study and, who, let it be said, know something about the actual producing end of matters. In other words, what it actually means to make a picture in natural colors.

It was solely from this standpoint that we turned this week an absolutely open and unprejudiced mind and a tolerably well corrected eye upon the pictures shown at the two or three private demonstrations that Mr. Urban was kind enough to permit us to see. To begin with, let us say right out that—judging by the practical results we saw, and setting aside all questions of theory, the difficulty of production and other technical points with which we have no concern on the present occasion—the color records, for such they may be scientifically regarded, that we saw at these demonstrations are unquestionably the finest bits of color work that we have ever seen on the screen in stationary or moving picture work. And here let it be said, that we have in mind the Lumiere Autochrome, F. E. Ives, Lippman, Sanger Sheppard, Professor R. W. Wood, Bennetto, Gustave Selle, Friese Greene and others, all of world-wide reputation in the work of making photographs in natural colors.

In critical estimates of this sort, of course the personal equation must necessarily weigh with the reader, and in the foregoing paragraph we have endeavored without, we hope, due egotism to assure the reader that the opinion we are passing on these pictures is based upon as diverse a knowledge of the subject as there is probably to be found in the world to-day. In other words, we have made the subject something of a specialty. In submitting this opinion upon what is bound to be a notable presentation in the history of the moving picture in the United States, we are conscious that we are taking a very serious responsibility both to ourselves and the readers of this paper and to the public at large. Nevertheless, fully conscious as we are of this responsibility, we have no hesitation in according these results our very heartiest commendation for their beauty, richness and fidelity of color—the fidelity being of course fairly assumed when a group of individuals spontaneously admit the truth of a color rendering to the original. Above all, there is the splendid, the magnificent, the unexpectedly wide range of scale, which this process possesses in rendering not merely the dominant colors in all their richness and depth of beauty, but in the more delicate shades, nuances and gradations of color effect produced by the almost endless combination which the spectrum band is capable of.

So what we desire to emphasize in this article is the fact that the Urban-Smith process is capable of actually recording the color tones, or to put it more shortly, the colors, of any ordinary original subject. To begin with we saw, more than once, groups of many-colored flowers such as the pansy, the rose, the fuchsia, the mimosa, the aster, etc., evidently chosen in order to bring out the elasticity of this method of recording color. Then, in the subject illustrating the Zoological Gardens in London—(the London equivalent of the New York Bronx Park)—the photographer who made the pictures seems to have chosen every possible opportunity for putting the process to the practical test of variety. For example, you had the particular liquid and eau de nil color of fresh water, such as you may see in a clear lake, satisfactorily shown to the eye. And then a few seconds later you came to the amazing blue and scarlet of the most gorgeous parrot (colorifically gorgeous, we mean) you could possibly imagine. Here you have contrast enough in all conscience. The delicate eau de nil of the water, the indescribably vivid coloring of the parrot, all done, as it were, by the same machine, on the same films and shown by the same revolving color filter through which the picture is projected.

Then you have neutral subjects, such as the earthy tint of the gentle elephant. Along comes a lady with a green silk parasol and we marvel at the accurate rendering of the silk fabric. The familiar light brown and stripes of the tiger are seen; the light tone or tint, if we may call it, of the polar bears; the restful green of the trees and the grass; the delicate pinky white of the flamingo reflected in the water—in fact, without a word of exaggeration, in this one picture we saw every likely color or combination of colors such as one would expect to get in a subject desired to be illustrated in colors upon the moving picture screen. At any rate, so far as we ourselves were concerned, we were fully well satisfied that in this one picture, which was chosen haphazard, the Urban-Smith process had come out of the ordeal with flying colors.

Of course these are subjects, from our point of view, in the nature of tests; that is to say, we ourselves, in looking at them were unconscious of any other interest in them but the purely scientific one. We endeavored to satisfy ourselves that the colors shown were reasonably accurate renderings of the originals. And as to the flowers: we have no hesitation in saying that they are good tests, for the simple reason that we have cultivated most of those flowers, and certainly know what they look like. So in regard to the London Zoological Gardens. Bless your heart, dear reader, we know the London Zoo as we know Madison Square itself. We have ridden on that elephant, we have fed those polar bears, and what is more we have taken many a monochromatic photograph in the place. So that writing from the purely personal standpoint, we are bound to express ourselves as absolutely satisfied with the tests, which were not pre-arranged —indeed, on both occasions, we "happened in" while the apparatus was being passed upon by the Board of Electricity, previous to the public demonstration, with one single object, that of doing the results by this process the fullest possible justice in our power.

The program which the public will see on Saturday evening at Madison Square, is even more likely, we think, to create a favorable impression than the beautiful subjects which we ourselves have already seen. Simply because of its great diversity. Then the moving picture in natural colors will illustrate, amongst other things, military manœuver, a naval review, horse racing, portraiture, country scenes, harvesting, the sea, processions, in fact it appears that the aim of Mr. Charles Urban and those associated with him has been to put the capabilities of the process to what one might call an almost universal series of tests on ordinary subjects. Such subjects, indeed, as are illustrated every day in the work on the moving picture screen. Nothing can be fairer, of course. Nothing we think could advantage the process more in its practical claims. As we have said, over and over again, it must stand or fall by its results or by its practicability. Of those results we are here speaking. Of the practicability of the process those concerned will, of course, satisfy themselves in due course.

We have followed the development of this process on paper for the last two or three years and, as our readers know, have kept in touch with the literature of the subject. We mean the literature that has been published in London, where it seems the pictures have been shown. It is hardly our business, of course, but still we may be allowed to hazard a passing opinion that the qualities of the pictures have on the whole been under-rated in our English contemporaries, and moreover, we think that the Urban-Smith people either have not done themselves the best possible justice in the matter or have not realized what a good thing they have in the process. Anyhow, what we desire to say is that the impression made on our minds, studying the matter at a distance, was that the pictures were not so good as they are. But here they are, for all the world to see, and we think that if the specimens which we have already seen are any criteria of the general quality, if they are always so well, carefully and accurately made, if, in short, the public at large, first, last and all the time, are to see moving pictures in natural colors as good and beautiful as those which we are commenting on in this article, then the Urban-Smith process, if it is reduced to every-day practice in this country, as we frankly hope it will be, has all the possibilities of an enormous, an epoch-marking and a revolutionary success in front of it.

G. ALBERT SMITH, F.R.A.S.

Men Who Made Kinemacolor Possible.

Charles Urban, the president of the Kinemacolor Company, which is exploiting the process not only in the United States but in Europe and other parts of the world, has perhaps been more prominently identified with the popularization of the moving picture than any other man at present in the business. Originally associated with the Warwick Trading Company, of London, he some years ago started the Charles Urban Trading Company, of London, which has taken a leading part in, to quote their own phrase, "putting the world before your eyes." Urban work to-day, therefore, is synonymous with good and interesting moving picture photography. Through the agency of George Kleine, the photographs are largely known to the American public. In London and other parts of the world, they are chiefly of a topical nature—a kind of picture which, for obvious reasons, is not in general demand in such a large country as the United States. In London the magnificent building called "Urbanora" was erected by Mr. Urban, whose company's work is generally seen at the chief places of amusement in the United Kingdom. Kinemacolor at this time is being shown in the principal amusement houses of London, Paris and Berlin and is to be handled in Europe, we understand, by large companies which will bring it into worldwide use. Kinemacolor is the result of eight years' faith in the possibilities of moving pictures in natural colors by Mr. Urban. It is worthy of note, that though at present domiciled in London for business purposes, Mr. Urban is of American birth—Cincinnati, Ohio, claiming him as one of its sons.

G. Albert Smith, the inventor of Kinemacolor, whose portrait we reproduce, not long ago had the opportunity of bringing his results to the notice of Edward the Seventh, King of England, which is a somewhat exceptional distinction. It is very rare indeed that the King of England takes direct personal interest in the inventions of his subjects. King Edward showed by his knowledge of the pictures that he was deeply interested in the subject. More recently Mr. Smith received the silver medal from the Royal Society of Arts, which is also a distinction of much value. Mr. Smith has been associated with moving picture work for many years. He is a man of great scientific attainments and has travelled a great deal. His process was the outcome of a unique knowledge of the moving picture camera and the practical requirements of a color process for moving picture work. He arrived at his results by purely scientific means and has the valuable faculty of being modest in his success, realizing, as true men of science do, that all scientific work is of a progressive nature.

Mr. J. McKenzie, the photographic expert of Kinemacolor, who has produced many of the photographs to be shown on the screen this week, is a skilful photographer of many years' experience with a great mastery of technique. He has travelled in all parts of the world in pursuit of his calling and is, as his name implies, Scottish, coming from the Highland city of Inverness, a district well represented in the United States to-day. Like those with whom he is associated, Mr. McKenzie has great faith in the possibilities of Kinemacolor and is himself standing evidence that it is a practicable process in competent photographic hands.

Mr. Henry W. Joy, mechanical expert, occupies the position of chief engineer in the Urban workshops, and his abilities in the fields of designing and constructing moving picture apparatus have long been recognized. He is the inventor of many machines connected with the picture trade, and several patents stand in his name. He also is an enthusiast in the future of "Kinemacolor," and the projector by which the color films will be shown in New York is his latest product, in collaboration with his chief, Mr. Charles Urban.

In the hands of so enthusiastic a leader as Mr. Urban, supported by men of such wide experience and ample qualifications in their various branches, who can doubt that the future interests of Kinemacolor are safe?

TO CHARLES URBAN, OF "KINEMACOLOR."

Another year! and still you lead the way,
You yet attain, while others only hope;
Along the paths where others merely grope,
You shed refulgence of "achievements" ray.

As picture pioneer your banner streams
O'er every land embraced by East or West.
But now in crowning glory are you dressed,
For Sol's bright colors on your armor gleams!

Practical Talks to Operators.

By Arthur S. Newman, in "The Bioscope."

III.—THE PROJECTOR AND ITS USE.—Continued.

Having seen that the gate is in good order, clean, and properly adjusted, the next point that claims attention is the take-up mechanism. Neglect of the condition of this part has been the cause of one or two bad fires, and of the spoiling of large quantities of film. The take-up arrangements always include a friction drive of some sort. In the older models the driving band often acted as the friction drive, but recently there is a tendency to gear definitely together the wheel on the spool-spindle and the machine; either by a shaft having mitre or bevel wheels at each end, or by a pair of chain-wheels and a suitable chain. The device for allowing an increasing amount of slip as the size of the roll on the spool becomes larger, is then necessarily quite a separate arrangement. Sometimes a leather washer running between two metal plates, which are pressed together by a spring, is used for supplying the necessary friction; in other makes metal washers alone are used. Whatever form the friction drive takes it is usually supplied with an adjustment by which the friction may be regulated, and on the proper regulation of this friction the satisfactory working of the take-up mechanism depends. This adjustment is easy to make, provided the proper course is taken, and provided a clear understanding of the exact requirements is in the mind of the operator. The limits to be kept within are the following: First, the friction must be strong enough to drive a full spool decidedly and without hesitation. Second, it must not be so strong as to damage the perforations in the film at the beginning of the winding, when the size of the roll of film is very little larger than the core of the spool. When this latter condition obtains, it usually makes itself evident by a clicking noise caused when the perforations leave the teeth of the lower sprocket, but this noise must not be taken as a definite indication that the take-up friction is too heavy.

Uneven, or bad gauge in the perforations will cause a very similar sound to be produced, and before slackening the tension, the gauge of the film should be verified. When a machine persistently gives out this noise at starting, it is a fairly certain indication that the take-up friction is too strong, and the spring should be slackened; but the operator should pay special attention to the spool directly it becomes fairly full, to insure that in slackening the spring he has not made the tension too weak to properly drive a full spool. Sometimes, during the filling of a spool, it gets much out of the true balance, due to the core being out of center or to some unevenness in the film itself. Such a spool will have a great tendency to stop when nearly full, and if not watched, may deposit the last 100 feet on the floor to the great danger of damage to the film from dirt or by being trodden upon. When the spools are constructed to take 1,000 feet of film, and also are provided with reasonably sized cores, no trouble should be experienced in adjusting the take-up to do its work sufficiently gently when the spool starts, and also to act with certainty with a full spool, even though the spool be somewhat out of balance. With much larger capacities more trouble will be experienced, and greater nicety of adjustment demanded, and attention should be given to see that the spools themselves are quite true, and well balanced, or failure to take up properly will be certain to be encountered from time to time. Friction alters so much from day to day, due to change of temperature and change of humidity in the atmosphere, that a periodical examination of this part of the projector should be a part of the routine of every operator's duty. An extra amount of oil may make the tension too light, a day's rest may cause the oil to thicken, or if the oil contain free acid (and this is often the case) slight oxidation of the metal friction surfaces may take place, and result in a considerably increased pull on the film, to the detriment of the perforations. Where leather washers are employed, the acids in the leather often attack the metal surfaces with which they are in contact, and variable or increased friction may result. It is well to take the washers out from time to time and soak them in petrol or benzoline to remove the oil with which they have become saturated. After drying they can be replaced, and the spring be readjusted, and an endeavor should be made to keep oil away from the leather. This is somewhat difficult, owing to the proximity of other parts, which must be oiled, but a careful operator will find his work much lightened by attention to this point. The certainty of the action of the take-up will remove one more anxiety from the mind of the worker already burdened by the multifarious requirements necessary to perfect operating. When spools of much over 1,000 feet have to be used, an extra operator can be put in successful operation. The film exchanges are should always be on the alert, in case of failure of the take-up; and it would be better to discard the friction drive altogether, and resort to hand winding. Any boy can be taught in a few minutes to wind satisfactorily, and the running of the projector will be much more easy and sweet without the braking action of the friction drive. Some rather complicated mechanical devices have been invented for the purpose of making the rewinding of film certain and easy. So far, none of them have come into use, and the projector is hampered by an amount of friction constantly increasing from the time of starting the spool till the time when the same is full up. The difficulty of the problem is somewhat great and has exercised the minds of inventors for many years past, not only in its application to projectors, but also in the thousand and one cases in which, by a mechanical operation it is required to coil up an increasing sized roll of paper linen, cloth, etc., and in doing so put an even tension on the machine by which it is manufactured or delivered. A fortune awaits the inventor who can achieve this result practically, simply, and cheaply.

A SETBACK.

Moving picture men throughout the country have grown in some way to look upon the noted entertainment house of Keith & Proctor's as sympathetically inclined towards the moving picture as such. That is to say, an impression has got abroad that the Keith & Proctor mind wherever it is and whoever possesses it, either in New York, Boston or elsewhere, was formally set on exploiting the moving picture as a progressive and profit-making form of entertainment. In other words, Keith & Proctor were looked upon, as in some sense assisting in the uplift of the moving picture—in its dignification and proper presentation to the public. We, ourselves, have never neglected an opportunity of praising Keith & Proctor for their attitude, assumed or real. We have praised the conduct of their houses in this city, of which there are four or five, both in print and by word of mouth; we have held them up as an example for other moving picture exhibitors to follow. Again, our own personal preferences, or sentiment, if the reader so like it, have leaned towards the Keith & Proctor houses, so that whenever we wanted to enjoy a moving picture, as we sometimes do, aside of the business of writing about them, why we go to Keith & Proctor's.

Your Keith & Proctor, or the moving picture department manager, or somebody we do not know who is connected with this enterprise, has rudely shaken our faith in them. They have disappointed us; they have annoyed and disgruntled us by going back on their own policy, our predilections, and what we consider the best interests of the moving picture field; in fact, they have given the moving picture business a blow by introducing at their Fourteenth street Bijou Dream house vaudeville, such as "strong men" and other amusement items, so utterly foreign to the general run of the Bijou Dream programme, so utterly to the distaste of large numbers of their patrons, so utterly to the distaste of ourselves, and we believe so utterly to the distaste of the moving picture field throughout the United States, that we cannot help asking them, in their own interests and in the interests of everybody else, to cut these items out of their programme forthwith and revert to the old order of things. Miscellaneous vaudeville turns or acts are out of place in a moving picture programme. This is a fact that admits of no discussion. We have ascertained from innumerable members of the paying public, educated men and women, intelligent children, from those best competent to give an opinion, in fact, that it is the picture, the whole picture, and NOTHING BUT THE PICTURE that the public wants. We mean the great five or ten million moving picture public in the United States, probably the largest entertainment public in the world.

Vaudeville acts at a moving picture house, or we should say an established moving picture house, may temporarily increase the receipts, but they will permanently injure the business, we are convinced. Picture lovers will stay away. The Keith & Proctor house, like many others in this country, is supported by picture lovers. We do not think the officials of this company quite realize what sort of public the moving picture public is, otherwise we doubt whether in this little noted Fourteenth street house they would give us such a setback as we have experienced this week. We hope to see the Keith & Proctor programme restored to its former condition of suitability for the moving picture public—and we hope to see it done at once.

Fight Pictures.

What are you betting on the Jeffries-Johnson fight? Will the pictures be a success, or not? What? We are talking through our camera? Not at all. We are referring to the main point at issue. It is not a question as to who will win the fight. That was the issue in the olden times. Now the main point at issue is the success of the moving pictures—before and after taking, as the medical advertisement reads. Of course, in the affair just arranged the two men have been matched to appear in the ring and arrangements have been made to provide $101,000 as an incentive for the struggle. That is supposed to be the incentive, but it isn't. The fighters, the newspapers, and everybody else tell us the $101,000 is only a joker; that the men will really fight for the picture receipts. Do not misunderstand this as a sporting item. It is not. The object is to place one more winner to the credit of the moving pictures. Croak as the croakers may, they cannot keep the pictures down. They will force themselves to the front. One of the foremost sporting news writers of the country stated immediately after arrangements were concluded for the affair: "It will be a moving picture fight. Mark me." And this sentiment has put the sporting fraternity of the world in a state of almost painful apprehension. The great question seems to be how long the fighters can successfully pose before the camera. One of the men says he will try to put his opponent in the land of nod within a few seconds after the fight starts. If he is not joking, his friends will soon have him in some institution for observation as to his mental condition.

People in all quarters contend and admit that the moving pictures have forced almost a depopulation of the vaudeville profession, and expression of opinion as to what the pictures have done, or will do, to the pugilistic arena will soon be in order. The police authorities and legislatures have failed to knock out the sport, but keep your eyes on the pictures and see what the pictures will do to it. It is the safest kind of a wager that after Jeffries and Johnson have strung out about four or five thousand feet of negative, public interest in such affairs will drop to the zero mark. The pulpit orators who have so persistently denounced moving pictures will then have an opportunity to do them justice and acknowledge that the pictures form a powerful reforming factor.

There is no disguising the fact that the discussion of and prominence given the moving picture part of the fight details has done more harm to the immediate interests of those who engage in such affairs as principals or otherwise than anything else has ever done. These people have really gone picture mad, and those who follow up such affairs as spectators or speculators have been stirred up to a decidedly suspicious state of mind. An immense amount of money has been made by the owners of the Johnson-Ketchel fight pictures, and the pictures to be taken of the coming fight are looked upon as a gold mine. Think for a moment of the stupendous amount of faith put in them. The purse to be fought for is fixed at $101,000! The receipts from the pictures of the affair are figured at no less than $160,000! There is good reason for this enthusiastic expectation. Thousands upon thousands of people—yes, the millions of them—will be unable to go to the scene of battle, but all will have a reproduction of it brought to their doors. The pictures will be a record money-maker. The enthusiasts will scramble over each other to see them as the next best thing to the fight itself, and the skeptics will pack the theaters and halls to see if the fighters prolonged the affair to give the public a run (joke) for their money. Who said moving pictures had seen their best days? Why, their influence is only beginning to manifest itself.

The Johnson-Ketchel Pictures as a Money Maker.

Some amusing stories are told by Sam Bullock, manager of the Johnson-Ketchel Fight Department of the Lake Shore Film & Supply Company, Cleveland, Ohio, in connection with the showing of the Johnson-Ketchel fight films.

Sam is something of a lecturer, and in describing the contest round by round he injects considerable humor into the subject at hand, especially when the colored folks are in evi-dencc, as, for instancc, when "filling in" a date at a small show recently in a settlement where the sons of Ham predominate, he was describing the large attendance at Coffroth's Arena, "the gate receipts exceeding upon this occasion thirty-three thousand dollars, out of which Mr. Johnson received twenty-one thousand dollars (emphasizing this, during which he paused while murmurs of "Oh, my," "Heah dat, honey," etc., were heard all over the house). Then he remarked, sotto voce, "So I guess Mr. Johnson won't have to telegraph his baby for money this Winter," at which every darkey yelled with delight. Sam says this and other "bits" are appreciated by whites as well as blacks; incidentally he says that the above little place of 140 capacity, which never played to over $30 in a day, netted one hundred and sixteen dollars ($116) that day at 10 cents, and the manager wants a return date at 15 cents.

Another place he quotes at Cleveland, all run down; the new owncr put it on and did $195 the first day, over $200 the second day, and wants another booking "any old time." Still a third at Cincinnati, "a dead one" about to close—145 capacity—took in over $100 a day and several good showmen in Cincinnati are bidding for a return date.

Sam says public interest in the Johnson-Ketchel fight pictures is intense and attributes it to the coming match between Johnson and Jeffries. Anyway, he says it is a winner and clean enough for the ladies.

POPULARITY OF MOVING PICTURE SHOWS IN WESTERN CANADA.

The success which has attended the experiment of moving picture shows in Western Canada, inaugurated last year, indicates to Consul-General John Edward Jones, of Winnipeg, the large market in the cities of the Northwest for this form of amusement. Mr. Jones adds:

"It would be profitable for the manufacturers of moving picture machines to send a representative through Western Canada to exploit the field. In Winnipeg this form of amusement only became popular during the past year, and the promoters are now reaping a fine business as the result of their enterprise.

"The people soon acquire a fondness for this form of amusement, and willingly pay 10 cents for admission. In this new country, where all forms of amusement are scarce, moving pictures are welcomed, and there is no reason why the manufacturers of the United States should not control the business."

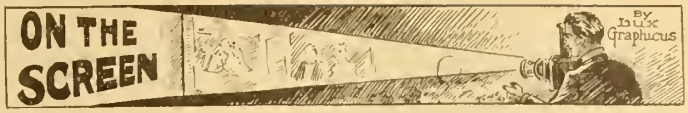
THE CARSON FILMS.

The Film Import & Trading Company announce that they have secured the exclusive sale of "Carson" films for the entire world. The first release will be shipped on December 14 and is entitled "Comrades Under General Grant," a patriotic American subject that ought to be popular.

NEW THEATER FOR BROOKLYN.

Mr. Frank Widor has opened a new moving picture theater at 23 Bartlett street corner Harrison avenue, Brooklyn, which in equipment represents the latest in the moving picture line. J. H. Hallberg, 30 Greenwich avenue, has installed a Motiograph No. 1 flickerless moving picture machine with stereopticon attachment, complete with Hallberg Automatic Electric Economizer. The pictures are very steady, brilliant and absolutely flickerless. The outside of the theater is illuminated by two Hallberg flaming arc lamps, giving 10,000 candle-power.

The New England Film Exchange, 611 Washington street, Boston, Mass, write us: "We received a big supply of new, up-to-date films amongst which we have quite a selection of foreign makes, such as Lumiere, Pathe, Gaumont, Lux, Ambrosia, Eclaire, Itala, Vesuvio and several other foreign makers too numerous to mention for lack of space, and also several up-to-date American manufacturers, such as New York Motion, Phoenix, Powers, Columbia, Edison, Selig, Biograph and several others, and we are ready to supply, as we have been in the past, with all these up-to-date features, a grand selection of dramatic, comic and scenic pictures, and together with our song slides offers a good opportunity for New England managers to secure a service which has never been offered before. We extend an invitation to the public at large to visit our offices at 611 Washington street, Boston, Mass., and convince themselves as to what we say being so. Business is very good at the present time, and a steady increase is noticed every week."



When I sat in Hammerstein's Theater, last Thursday afternoon as never was, my mind was full of the possibilities of the moving picture, and the suggestion came from, what do you think? The rehearsal of the band! Creatore's band! Creatore got in my way for a space of about 30 minutes and Creatore was the subject of my sincere curses, because Creatore stood in the way of what I had come to see. Never mind what I had come to see; you will realize that it the succeeding paragraphs. Anyway Creatore came on at last and got his band in working order in a dark and silent house. He started his work on the stage while some of us sat in the auditorium. Then we saw the nervous conductor, absolutely in sympathy with the inner skin of his music, controlling his forces by pschyo-physical effect. In other words establishing a link between the man who directed and the man who played the instrument, whether it be reed or brass. As the executants played the various pieces or numbers we had the opportunity of studying the controlling mind of the man who conducted the performances. Creatore is the modern personification of Paganini, the violinist, a whole race of temperamental conductors concentrated in one individuality. In other words, Creatore symbolizes in his own personality the series of sounds that he was controlling.

This has nothing to do with moving pictures, but I half regretted, as I sat and watched this wonderful man at his work, that it was not possible to get a moving picture of him, so that the world at large might have seen an up-to-date musical conductor at work. Creatore and his band kept me waiting for the entertainment that I wanted to see at my friend, Mr. Hammerstein's Theater, at Forty-second street and Broadway. But I did not regret my wait because of the music and when the music was over my patience was rewarded by a very fine lecture indeed which temporarily is in the hands of Edward E. Rice, of 1402 Broadway, New York City, a man well known in theatrical producing and who, I was glad to learn, is disposed to take up the moving picture end of things. It is in consonance with the policy of The Moving Picture World that the theater should realize the importance of the moving picture and I am glad that the man of the experience of Mr. Rice thinks as I do on the matter.

Then up and arose on the stage a cultivated English journalist. Mr. Wynee Granville ,the Toronto correspondent of a Dundee paper, to tell the story of the Shackelton films. Granville had met Shackelton many years ago at school and subsequently. I also have met Shackelton, so that there was a bond of sympathy between lecturer and hearer. A bond of sympathy unsuspected by Granville, I am sure. But the point of it all is that Granville, who is an experienced lecturer, had with him on the screen a very marvelous series of moving picture films—such series as held his small audience spellbound.

Shackelton is the man who has been nearest the Antartic pole, or as it is called, the South pole, and he was wise enough on his journey to take with him a moving picture camera. He was also lucky enough to have made, or rather to have had made for him, a series of exposures which showed the life to us that is lived in those frigid regions so that, aside of the geographical renown which attaches to his name for having got to that particular part of the world before anybody else, he also has the unique distinction of having photographed it all with a moving picture camera.

And that is exactly what we saw. We saw the life on the ship and incidents on the voyage out by way of Australia, and then when we got there, some of the daily life and experiences of this exploring party. One seemed to feel as one was looking on these pictures that one was living one's life in those ice fields. There were the quaint penguins, seals, dogs; the cold, freezing, chill of the illimitable ice fields that all of us in our warm rooms have read and thought of. There they were. Here were the photographic renderings of the polar regions of the life lived there by the men who went there.

Shackelton and his party went about their business in a thoroughly scientific and business like way. They went up

Mount Erebus, they made their records and observations, they went so far and they got back again. And here are the records of what they did—the records in pure moving picture photography. Those of us who have never been to the Arctic regions and who never mean to go there will no doubt be interested in seeing these pictures.

They are good photographs of the hinter land. The lecture which I heard is in the hands of an accomplished traveler and educated journalist. He had to talk to an almost empty house. But he had been through part of the work himself and spoke with evidence and sincerity. He knew his business, in fact. It is the intention of those having charge of these films to release them amongst the moving picture theaters of the United States and I should think, as records of what men have done—I mean scientific records of work accomplished—they will be enormously popular with the American public.

Vitagraph Activity—A Notable Reel

Early next year the Vitagraph Company will send a company to Jamaica and the other islands of the West Indies to get local color for a series of stories which will be instructive as well as entertaining. Such enterprise helps to maintain the motion picture as the most educational development of the century.

Immediately after the departure of the Vitagraph Southern company another troupe of experts will be got in readiness to proceed to Nevada and Southern California. A. E. Smith, of the Vitagraph Company, travelled through this section last Spring and took notes of many ideal spots for moving picture scenery.

The Vitagraph producers are engaged in collaboration with the Rev. Madison Peters, D.D., in arranging another series of Biblical illustrations. Following "Moses" will come "The Life of Joseph," followed by "King David." It is proposed to continue the series indefinitely according to the demand.

THE LIFE OF MOSES—PART I. (Vitagraph.)

This is a graphic reproduction of the main events in the early life of Moses, corresponding closely to the conception which has been inculcated in the minds of people who have attended church and Sunday school. That it is the first of a series which will deal with the whole life of this great Biblical character is not clearly indicated in the title of the film. The skeleton of the story is gathered from the first two chapters of the Book of Exodus, and it has been elaborated upon with considerable fidelity to the customs and costumes of ancient Egypt, as handed down to us through the long ages. In many respects this is the most noteworthy film of the year. It presages a series of Biblical illustrations that has been a much-felt want in the library of moving picture subjects. It will entail no small effort and expense on the part of the Vitagraph Company to live up to the standard they have set themselves in this first of the series. Sumptuous in production, the staging is evidently the result of long study and pains. While the main dramatic features of the Biblical narrative have been seized upon, there is nothing "stagey"—nothing out of keeping with the character of the subject or that unfits it for exhibition in Sunday school or church gatherings. Yet it is handled with a fine dramatic spirit that will win the approval of any audience. While the stage management is entitled to praise, the costuming and setting mainly consistent and the action, never lagging, is more than merely good in some cases, yet there are two characters that are seemingly misinterpreted. We refer to King Pharaoh and his chief minister. There is a lack of dignity and balance in their action which was the only jarring note. This is only our opinion and even to us was a trifling blemish in a picture that is deserving of the greatest praise and commendation as a whole. We hope to be able to say the same of the others of the series. The moving picture is never better employed than in portraying great events and great men in the history of mankind. The dramatic element abounds in the life of Moses, the first great liberator, leader and lawgiver. To make such films useful to the exhibitor and instructive to the audience an explanation or lecture, running easily and naturally with the pictures is almost a necessity. For the benefit of exhibitors such an explanation or "picture reading" is given on another page of this paper. If the standard set in this first reel is maintained, or improved upon, the exhibitor and lecturer will soon have a very fine library of religious subjects to draw from—subjects that will never grow old.

Coming Feature Films, and Remarks About the Christmas Picture.

Numbers of the film makers have already advertised their Christmas week releases, pictures bearing on the glad yuletide, and more will probably be announced next week. Just how many of the firms contemplate releasing strictly Christmas Day pictures has not been ascertained, but it is hardly probable that there will be as many this year as in the past. The subject of seasonable or topical pictures has been threshed out before and the general opinion of the film exchanges, buying licensed pictures, is: "We don't want them," or, at least, a surfeit of them. Why? Perhaps it is for the same reason that holly decorations grow tiresome to the eye a week or two after festive days. They invariably come down the second week or so in January and are relegated to the ash can or the musty garret. We don't want them, nobody does. They invariably remind us of the things we didn't get or the cost of the things we did get.

Seasonable or topical films are not popular with the film exchanges because of this same peculiar whim of the people who want to be amused. The popularity of a Christmas picture lasts through the holidays and not much longer. The film man finds little profit in the Christmas picture; indeed, when so many are thrust upon him it requires some months to get over the blow. Now, why there should be a prejudice against a strong Christmas picture is not clear, nor is it reasonable. In the subject of yule-tide there is inspiration for innumerable dainty little episodes, merry comedies and strong human dramas. It does not seem fair that all this good material should go to waste.

Let us say, however, that the Christmas picture, as a feature, should be dispensed with and let us suggest that all the film makers reserve for their Christmas release "their masterpiece," the one great film of months, the very best product of their studios. Make the Christmas picture not a seasonable picture but each one the "most notable film" and "the real sensation of the year" (with any other appellations their ad. writers may have in mind) and let Christmas week represent all that is best from the licensed manufacturers and give opportunity for the public to note what giant strides have been made in the film world since the year began.

In discussing this with Mr. George K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, he remarked that it was a good suggestion and should be utilized.

"We are not releasing a Christmas picture," said Mr. Spoor, "but we have reserved for Christmas Day one of our best Western pictures. I would suggest that all film makers especially reserve for their Christmas week releases the very best subjects they have on hand. Make Christmas week notable in the film world for its number of art films, a fitting summary of a successful year. This, I feel, will prove infinitely more satisfactory to the film exchanges."

The Essanay Company's Christmas picture is a Western drama, entitled "The Heart of a Cowboy." The story is an exceptionally strong one, the photography is distinctly clear and the acting is thoroughly convincing. It is released Saturday, December 25—Christmas Day.

A CORNER IN WHEAT (Biograph).

Calling at the Biograph Studio one day a few weeks ago, we found the office entrance almost barricaded by sacks of wheat—tons of it—stacked up almost to the ceiling and filling the spacious hallway. We jokingly inquired if the Biograph Company were trying to corner the wheat market as well as the film market. We were told that they had not only tried, but had succeeded in cornering all the available grain in the New York market at that time. Not the visionary options that are juggled in Wall Street, but the actual commodity. It did not require a Sherlock Holmes intuition to arrive at the conclusion that this car-load of the "staff of life" was destined to appear as one of the "props" in a coming Biograph drama. On December 13 the picture-loving public will see how the Biograph Company utilized this great mass of grain as the setting for a dramatic climax to what is perhaps the most impressive of any of their soul-stirring dramas.

Back to Nature, to the honest toil and simple life of the farmer we go for the beginning of this story, every scene of which is a picture. The sowers at work in the field, the care and the gathering of the grain, the wearied and anxious farmer who has to accept whatever price is offered him by the great Wheat King. We are shown this demon of modern times gambling in the Exchange with options representing this product of honest labor. We are shown glimpses of the misery of the poor who cannot afford the prices asked for bread. The price of flour is held to the top notch while oceans of wheat are stored in the grain elevators. Finally we see the Wheat King in the midst of his glory buried under an avalanche of the very commodity with which he has so sordidly juggled. A dramatic ending to a powerful object lesson. As a moving picture "A Corner in Wheat" is educational, emotional and impressive and well sustains the prestige of the Biograph Company in all respects.

THE HEROINE OF MAFEKING. (Selig.)

Elsewhere in this number reference is made to "masterpieces of moving picture work." Outstanding in this respect among many feature films of the past week's releases is "The Heroine of Mafeking," simply announced by the Selig Polyscope Company as "a notable war picture." The melodramatic interest is slight, even the part the heroine plays is comparatively small, and the interior scenes and settings, if they detract from the general effect, they at least serve to bring out in marked contrast the various magnificent military spectacles. But it is hypercritical to even point out small defects in such a stupendous work. From the point of view of the showman—the exhibitor—it would be hard to conceive a film subject that would more likely be a winner, equally impossible to find a producer that could stage it to better purpose. In themes like these Selig has his forte and in this particular one he is seen at his best. The realism of the war scenes, the accoutrements of the soldiers, even the landscape, make it hard for the expert, let alone the dilletante, to realize that some of the scenes were not taken in South Africa at the time of the Boer War. Hundreds of soldiers, mule teams dragging cannon, an ox-cart with six pairs of oxen, horses, and even Red Cross nurses, all combine to give the touch of realism. Of course there is shooting and gruesome evidence of the fact that "war is hell." We are fascinated, spellbound, till the scene changes and the film closes with a touch of sentiment and home life that helps to break the spell and we are reminded by the diamond "S" as the film flashes off the screen that Selig has again scored.

THE LIVING DOLL. (G. Melies.)

A Christmas picture story that combines American sentiment and ideas with the magic art of the French producer is G. Melies' release of the 15th. Really pleasing and well worked out, it shows a little girl all expectation and excitement on Christmas Eve, hanging up her stockings and being put to bed. She has a wonderful dream of being carried away by gypsies, lost in the wood, climbing a tree and seeing a church in the distance to which she finds her way and through the chancel window of which she sees visions of happy children receiving their Christmas gifts. Again she is lost in the woods and comes across the haunts of Santa Claus. Among the gifts she spies a big box with a doll with which she changes places and she is carried in Santa's aeroplane and dropped down the chimney of her parents' house. She awakens on Christmas morning to find that part of her dream is reality as one of her presents is the big doll about which she dreamed. As a children's picture this film will be highly entertaining and to the adults interesting. The magic effects are skillfully handled, especially where it shows the modern Santa Claus conveniently dispensing his gifts from an aeroplane instead of from the conventional reindeer sled.

MOTION PICTURE MUSIC.

Gregg A. Frelinger Compiler of Valuable New Work.

Representing weeks of toil, a new musical work has been compiled by a musician which promises to make his name famous throughout the moving picture field of the United States. Gregg A. Frelinger (whose advertisement will be found on another page) is the author of the work and the product of his genius is a compilation of motion picture music. The selections consist of specially chosen numbers arranged and composed to fit the action, characters and scenes of all kinds of motion pictures. Mr. Frelinger is known as one of the best descriptive pianists in America and has been engaged in theatrical work for the past twenty years. For the last three years he has devoted much of his time to his new work. He has remained in motion picture theater work for the past few years for the sole purpose of perfecting his book, having refused many offers from leading vaudeville houses. Mr. Frelinger has the advantage of a thorough musical education, and this, coupled with his long theatrical experience, made him especially fitted for the task he has just completed. His new work is completely indexed and is intended for use in motion picture theaters. Every exhibitor should get a copy of this dollar book for his pianist, and give it to him as an Xmas present. It will be appreciated by him.

NOTES FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Some of the Philadelphia exhibitors asked me to call the attention of the Board of Censorship to the film "In the Consomme." I do not believe that the manufacturers had any bad intention, yet we must admit that for certain prude persons, always ready to find a flaw, the picture is too suggestive. If the manufacturers wanted to mix a little more with the audiences they would benefit by some of the remarks heard in the show places and they would see their own productions as the public sees them. Many scenes look very natural to the manufacturer, as he knows his scenario and knows what he produces, but if those scenes are not very clear to the spectator, they leave a doubt and often give some ground to this "Too Suggestive."

Coatesville is enjoying some prosperity. The "Palace" is certainly one of the prettiest of country theaters, and I. Goldberg has spared no expense to make it the safest and best equipped house in Coatesville. The 350 chairs arranged in three rows and a good inclined floor offers a good view from any part of the house. The "Dreamland" is still doing a good business at the old stand under new management. The "World in Motion," an old frame building, does not appear a safe place. The name "World in Motion" is not the proper one for a house devoted to cheap vaudeville with very few pictures. The folks of Coatesville do not seem to care for cheap vaudeville, as the manager of the "World in Motion" has to coax them in by offering live turkeys. You go in, you receive a coupon, and if you are the lucky one you win the turkey.

Lancaster.—The town of surprises. Only three moving picture theaters for such an important town. I understand that many other shows would like to locate in Lancaster, but the stores and buildings are too valuable properties for 5 and 10-cent theaters. The most agreeable surprise was to find that the three moving picture managers are opposed to vaudeville and do not believe in giving too many reels or a too long show for 5 cents. On the other hand, the Family Theater is entirely devoted to vaudeville and does not show pictures. I wish other cities would copy Lancaster, as here the managers not showing vaudeville can show much better pictures. Another surprise which can benefit many exhibitors is the innovation made by George M. Krupa in the lighting of his place, the "Dreamland Theater." On the sides of the walls are electric lights covered with dark shades. The light falls on the chairs, enabling the spectators to see their neighbors, even read a paper, and the pictures on the screen appear as brilliant as in any other place. The "Scenic" and the "Dreamland" are showing first run of licensed pictures, while the "Palace" runs Independent productions. Lancaster, with its agreeable surprises, has not yet attained perfection, and had a bad surprise to offer me—the one of seeing the "Scenic" and the "Dreamland" in a bitter fight, showing the same programs. It is a fight for supremacy in which one of them will fall. As they show the same pictures the same day, a spectator leaving the "Scenic" does not care to go to the "Dreamland" to see the same program, and vice versa. If the two managers wanted to divide the first run, they would each make some money and give a chance to Lancaster to see the complete output of the licensed manufacturers, and Lancaster would be a model moving picture town.

Columbia is doing very good with three houses, notwithstanding the unfair competition of the Opera House, trying to get the cream of the business by offering five reels and several vaudeville acts. The "Alvin," showing licensed pictures, claims to be doing an excellent business and could not wish for better times. The "Happy Hour," also a licensed house, is satisfied with the business, and while there I greatly enjoyed the hearty laughing of a packed house at the comic "Hypnotic Cure" of Lubin. The "Grand" is satisfied with its share of the business and makes a specialty of showing good Independent pictures. The "Grand," like the "Alvin," is strongly opposed to vaudeville, while the "Happy Hour" believes that once in a while it can replace the song by a special vaudeville act.

Pittsburg.—The exchanges of this town seem to be prosperous. They do not select old, small buildings, but pride themselves in having up-to-date offices in every respect, and as they inspire more confidence, they do not seem to be so badly ill-treated by both exhibitors and operators. As to the theaters, they are numerous, and we will consider them in another letter. At the "Hiland Theater" I noticed that the screen was painted with a coat of aluminum, and the effects were remarkable on the pictures. J. M. B.

"The Death Disc" (Biograph).—A glamor of romance attaches to life in Cromwell's time which makes all stories of those days, and all pictures, too, for that matter, interesting. Perhaps the reality was more stern and uncompromising than the stories make them appear, but whether it was or not the intense interest aroused by the hero or other tales dealing with that age cannot be denied. The Biograph Company has selected a dramatic incident as the basis of this picture, and they have told the story well. Discovering three soldiers who adhere to Catholicism, Cromwell decides they must draw lots, the one receiving the death disc to die, while the others could go back to their comrades. He orders that the first child they meet shall draw the lot. It chances to be a child of one of the soldiers, and, child-like, she gives the prettiest disc, which means death, to her father. But Cromwell is so pleased with the little one that he gives her a signet ring and promises to grant any request made upon presentation of this ring. The mother invokes its aid to secure her husband's pardon. The costuming is historically correct, and the staging is as sumptuous as the occasion requires. The picture is replete with dramatic situations, and these are developed to the full in each instance. While the subject is one with rather complicated historic features, it holds the interest of an average audience and some applaud when the mother presents the ring and reminds Cromwell of his promise. Surely it offers at least a suggestion of a softer side to Cromwell's nature than history has yet accorded him, and in this way the film is beneficial.

"An Indian Wife's Devotion" (Selig).—The Western stories offered by this house nearly all have a convincing quality about them which causes one to wonder at the fidelity to the facts and the careful acting which makes the picture appear like a bit of real life picked up on the plains and transferred to canvas. This picture clearly depicts the despicable characteristics of the average half-breed, and undoubtedly represents him as he is, a dangerous and treacherous foe. The wife's devotion is represented by allowing her husband to escape in her clothes, and the ranch owner refuses to prosecute her. The real culprit, cringing with fear, accepts her proposition and is too far away to be re-captured when his escape is discovered. It is not a pleasant story, but the writer can say from personal experience with many such cowardly characters that the film is accurate in its delineation and gives a fair reproduction of some of the unpleasant experiences men have when dealing with half-breeds.

"The Cub Reporter" (Lubin).—A funny story of a cub reporter assigned to an insane asylum story, and with a friend is captured by the inmates and has all sorts of a time until rescued. The picture is funny and the absurdities represented do not seem in the least impossible.

"From the Egg to the Spit" (Pathe).—A beautifully colored picture showing the biography of a chicken from the incubator to the roasting spit, illustrating the methods followed in the Furanolle avitories in France. A chicken freeing himself from the egg was the most popular picture, and when the little fluffy ball of black and yellow disengaged himself and stood upright the audience, which filled the theater, broke into applause. The educational value of this type of films has been described before, and this particular picture is no exception to the general rule. And evidently average motion picture audiences like these films. They nearly always applaud them, and they seem to enjoy them better than some of the love stories which are offered them. More good educational films could be easily digested by the average American audience.

"A Cask of Good Wine" (Pathe).—Probably this film has interest for French people who are accustomed to using wine, but it must not be forgotten that the average American family does not use wine and consequently a gift of a cask of wine means nothing to them. And the long drive of the drunken teamsters, while the wine drizzles from the spigot is tiresome, even though the photography is perfect. The only funny scene in the whole is where the recipient tastes his wine to discover that the barrel has been filled with water.

"The Ladies" Companion" (Pathe).—A drama of love and jealousy, with the story of a will interwoven, a disinheritance scheme worked out by a jealous lover who thereby endears himself to a rich marchioness and becomes her beneficiary when she disinherits her son who has married against her will, or rather has married her companion without her knowing it. The beneficiary does not know that the old lady has changed her will because of her granddaughter and pours poison in the old lady's glass. Fortunately the granddaughter sees him and upon her testimony he is arrested and punished, while her father, who was charged with the murder, is released. These little stories are all interesting and they please many people. Sometimes a story like this, which is easily understood, seems to satisfy even better than the more elaborate pictures which are matters of considerably study and comparison before they are understood.

"The Engineer's Daughter" (Selig).—An interesting bit of melodramatic work, which has the usual vigor displayed by the Selig pictures. It is easy for the city-bred hunter to win the affections of the simple country girl, but later, after she receives the money from her father's life insurance, the real character of the lover is disclosed, and, shaking Kate off, he goes to another point and seeks to win the hand of a wealthy young lady. Her father dead, her brother a cripple, her money gone, it becomes necessary for Kate to seek employment. She finds it in the very house where her false lover is trying to secure the hand of the heiress. Kate eventually denounces him and he is given the alternative of either returning her money or going to jail. He chooses the former and Kate returns to her home triumphant. This sounds simple enough in telling, yet it is in reality a powerful drama that moves one when it is seen and causes one to want to seize the scamp by the throat and choke the life out of him. It may be that no stronger praise could be bestowed upon the picture than this. If it arouses such resentful emotions it must portray the characters with unusual strength. Photography and staging are quite in keeping with the subject and the picture as a whole is quite satisfactory.

"She Took Mother's Advice" (Lubin).—A comedy from this house which represents graphically what occurred when a young married woman undertook to manage her husband as her mother directed. The film contains several funny situations and seems to be, in a way, a fresh version of the time-honored mother-in-law joke.

"He Wanted a Baby" (Lubin).—Yes, he did, and his love for little people led him to undertake all sorts of curious stunts, but he got all he wanted when his wife presented him with triplets. Assuredly his cup of happiness was overflowing. But apparently there was a fly in his syrup somewhere, because, judging from his facial expression, he was anything but pleased with the result. Perhaps others would have exhibited the same indications of disappointment under similar conditions. Like all of Lubin's comedies, this is funny and the audience appreciates it.

"The Three Neighbors" (Pathe).—In America few men commit suicide, or attempt it, because they can't have the girl they want. They either carry off the one they do want, despite the attempt of the parents to prevent it, or they go find another. Abroad suicide or some equally desperate deed seems to be the usual stunt for disappointed lovers. In this particular instance, after the young man had been thrown out by the irate father, he attempts to hang himself from a hook in the ceiling. The whole thing comes down and he discovers that he has unwittingly broken into the hiding place of the thief who carried away his prospective father-in-law's wealth. And so he gets the girl for finding the money and all are happy ever after.

"Forced Into Marriage" (Pathe).—While this picture is overflowing with melodramatic action and the rush and whirl of life on the plains, it must be admitted that it lacks the convincing quality which appeals to one and seems to make a picture a verity. It seems plain enough why the girl was carried off, and even the shooting up of the deserted cabin and the execution of the two desperadoes is sufficiently plain, but to see the girl made the wife of one of the three kidnappers without a struggle of some sort is a curious anomaly, and leads to the conclusion that she was not altogether unwilling. There is plenty of life and action, and the film does not lack interest. The story seems a bit mixed in the telling, or else one becomes so accustomed to what may be termed conventional ways of doing things that any departure gives a species of shock which is surprising, though not unpleasant.

"The Geisha Who Saved Japan" (Kalem).—One of the best that has come from this company. In addition to its being a true story of the life of Marquis Ito, Japan's greatest statesman, showing how he was saved by a little Geisha girl, it enjoys the distinction of being staged and costumed in real Japanese properties, while some of the actors are Japanese, too. The film tells the story graphically and the action is spirited and convincing. It was an ambitious undertaking, but one who follows the different films will undoubtedly admit that this picture is successful and faithfully represents what it purports to do. It is technically good and there is the same life and energy displayed that characterizes all the Kalem films. Altogether it seems to be one of the best things this company has yet done.

"How to Get a City Job" (Gaumont).—A travesty upon civil service examinations in the effort to secure a city job. The examinations were in all sorts of absurd studies; not more absurd, perhaps, than some of the questions actually asked, but they show graphically how silly some of the civil service rules are actually. But the seeker is ultimately rewarded by securing the coveted place.

"X-Ray Glasses" (Gaumont).—A series of interesting pictures showing numerous magical changes, in geometrical forms and otherwise, all worked out in the admirable manner for which Gaumont's films of this character are famous. Some of the magic films produced by this house rank with the very best anywhere and this one will not detract from the reputation of the producer.

"His Reformation" (Essanay).—A lesson might be drawn from this film useful to those who have in charge the numerous attempts to reform criminals as well as to the multitude who are ready enough to turn their backs upon the man who may be honestly trying to improve his ways. In this instance the road agent, unable to find anything to do, goes back to the original calling and holds up a stage, only to find his mother among the passengers, and with his face buried upon her shoulder his reformation is complete, and the picture closes leaving the impression that in this instance the one influence which could make the reformation genuine and permanent has unexpectedly been injected into this outlaw's life.

"Listen" (Gaumont).—A fussy old bachelor gets a bump on his head, and rushing out to secure same balm from the nearest drug store to cure it he meets a number of acquaintances and in his efforts to explain the occurrence gets additional bumps until he gets one from a park statue that puts him out of business. The incidents furnish considerable amusement as the film runs.

"Top Heavy Mary" (Gaumont).—Mary, who is a decided heavyweight, is advised to reduce her weight by exercising on a bicycle. It is sufficient, perhaps, to allow the imagination to conjure up the long series of mishaps that befall Mary in her attempts to navigate the contrary machine.

"In a Pickle" (Gaumont).—A series of incidents supposed to portray the experience of an absent-minded professor. The many mistakes he makes and the difficulties he encounters are sufficiently funny to keep the audience in extremely good humor. If ever a man was as absent-minded as this one is supposed to be he needs a guardian at any rate.

"What the Card's Foretold" (Edison).—Fortune telling with cards is caricatured in this picture in a very funny way. Mammy tells her own fortune, which, of course, is very bad and always brings bad luck in one form or another. Mammy discovered too late that she had made a mistake. She was present when all the things foretold by the cards occurred, but unfortunately none of the good luck came her way. The complications are indescribably funny and must be seen to be appreciated.

"My Lord in Livery" (Edison).—This film will bring pleasant memories to thousands of people who have either seen this popular amateur dramatic production or have taken part in it. The numerous interesting complications are carefully wrought out and the play runs through with all the entertaining mixups which have made it popular so many years graphically portrayed. Evidently the Edison Company has produced another of its successful comedies in this picture. To reproduce a drama as popular and as widely known as this indicates that the producing company appreciates the value of the simple comedies in attracting attention in motion pictures. The photography is clear and the acting is quite in harmony with the subject.

"A Lesson in Domestic Economy" (Vitagraph).—One of those comical domestic dramas which may or may not be exaggerations. It is, perhaps, more of a subject for pathos than humor if such arrant incompetency in domestic affairs is possible. But whether this picture is true to life or whether it really represents some of the misguided efforts of those who don't know, it is interesting and amusing and keeps the audience guessing what fool thing the experimenting young couple are going to do next.

"A Day with Our Soldier Boys" (Vitagraph).—A day in the life of a company of United States soldiers is here very graphically set forth. The routine is all reproduced and coupled with this part are the sports, the tricks and jokes which the soldiers play upon each other. The film wins hearty applause from all the audiences that see it.

"Through the Breakers" (Biograph).—An alarming rumor having spread around New York City that the famous Biograph girl—our girl, our only girl, whom we have silently worshipped in effigy these many months, and to whom, by the way, in this column we have made many references which surely indicate our favorable opinion of this lady—rumor having gone around that "she" was no longer to be seen in the Biograph pictures, we went specially to inspect Monday's release for the purpose of satisfying not only our own doubts on the point, but those of many of our readers. For the number of this lady's admirers is legion. She is the heroine of many charming stories on the silent stage. Indeed, she is just as much a personality in the Biograph Stock Company as any well-known actress would be at a Broadway house. Our doubts were set at rest as soon as the film "Through the Breakers" commenced to appear. "Through the Breakers" is a society story, written, as it were, from life. A pleasure loving wife and a club loving husband neglect a little child who suffers and dies before our eyes whilsther parents join in the social whirl. This is a Fifth avenue tragedy and it works out as all stories do: strictly according to law. The parents come to their senses when it is too late. The subject is, perhaps, somewhat melancholy, but it is well carried out by the Biograph Company, who show us some very finished acting. But we do not like the morbid or the melancholy on the moving picture stage and we prefer to see our own heroine in light comedy. Anyhow there she is, and we hope to see her again taking her part in the well dressed, well mounted, well finished Biograph pictures which are always such fine, rich, even, uniform specimens of moving picture photography, flawless of their kind, and object lessons in technique to recent entrants into the moving picture making field.

"The Fatal Ball" (Melies).—A certain fascination attaches to this pictures even though the three deaths in it have a tendency to make it appear more or less bloody. A girl wronged under promise of marriage and shot as she rushes between her father and her love to prevent a pistol due, the flight of the murderer, the vow of the miner to kill the murderer of his daughter, his discovery disguised in another mining camp and the death of both are sufficient to hold the attention of the audience throughout the film. While the picture is wholly melodramatic, it is interesting and the acting seems quite in harmony with the subject. Somehow death and bloodshed in pictures depicting the rough life of the plains or the mining camp does not strike such a chill as it does in some other instances. The satisfaction of the rude, but generally accurate, ideas of justice may be considered accurate and perhaps this is the reason the same chill does not accompany the death scenes that is true in some other cases. Photography and acting are good in this film and it is so fascinating that one wants to see it a second time.

"The Secret Chamber" (Urban).—Here is a picture which will rouse the interest of the audience to the highest pitch. First, a girl is forced to marry against her will to save the life of her real lover. In wandering about the castle, now her home, she discovers a secret passage which leads to a chamber filled with jewels and money. This convinces her that her husband is a highwayman. In attempting to hide from him and his pals she is wounded in the arm. She informs the police. The robbers find the girl's tracks and soon reach her. They want to put her to death, but are prevented by her husband, and in the fight that follows he is killed. Then the police arrive, the brigands are driven away and the newly made widow throws herself into the arms of her former fiance. This long description seems necessary to make the film plain. It is full of the melodramatic, romantic action which goes with subjects of this type. The photography is good and some of the scenes about the castle are unusually picturesque. If action is wanted in a motion picture the audience should be satisfied with this.

"Capturing the North Pole" (Urban).—A clean bit of comedy posed upon the recent Cook-Peary controversy, but in this instance the baron, who is a very famous explorer indeed, brings back the pole, proving beyond peradventure of doubt that he actually discovered it. No one can dispute the evidence of his own eyes and his own sense of feeling, consequently it seems right that the doughty baron should be hailed as the unquestioned possessor of the long sought pole.

"Impossible to Get Sleep" (Pathe).—A series of amusing incidents which prevent the unfortunate Scuppy from getting to sleep. After passing through a series of trying and very disturbing experiences he lands in a station house cell where he is permitted to sleep as long as he chooses.

"The Evil Philter" (Pathe).—A beautifully colored picture dealing with wizards, witches and magic, the unrequited love of a music master for his beautiful pupil and his bargaining his soul for a charm that will make her love him. But it does him no good for, even though he obtains the charm and secures the girl's love he is pursued by horrible monsters and finally disappears in an abyss from which issues smoke and flames and hideous faces. It is a grand piece of work and attracts favorable attention.

"A Pair of Slippers" (Essanay).—A pair of danty slippers purchased for a sweetheart and left in a married man's home cause trouble, first for the married man, whose wife discovers them, and then for revenge replaces them with a pair of wornout shoes. Meanwhile the real owner returns, picks up the box and sends it to his affinity, and more trouble starts. But explanations are in order and everybody is pacified. The whole affair ends in a hearty laugh at the expense of everybody connected with the mistake. Acted with the characteristic spirit of the Essanay Company, this picture excites laughter from the beginning to the end.

"Bachelor and Maid" (Essanay).—A pretty little comedy based upon a mixup in trunks, and this brings about a wedding. It is a simple story, but one that is sure to please, because of the genuine humor which bubbles from it in every direction.

"The Message of the Arrow" (Bison).—A film released by the New York Motion Picture Company and replete with melodramatic incidents, but based upon the jealousy of a young Indian buck when a squaw openly declares she loves a white man. After numerous wild West scenes, including a foiled attempt to beat some Indians out of their land, the girl is stolen and carried away to a cave. She shoots an arrow out of the cave, bearing a message written in her own blood. It falls at the feet of her lover, who lowers himself into the cave just in time to prevent the young Indian from carrying out his sinister designs. It is the rope for him, after that, and the reunited couple linger in a long embrace, punctuated by the shots from numerous revolvers. For the type this film deserves commendation. The photography could be improved, but the acting seems reasonably accurate. The costuming is apparently correct. On the whole it is a good picture and will please the average motion picture audience.

"The Would-be Champion" (Raleigh & Robert).—A bit of comedy which depicts a young man who attempts to prove that he is a fistic champion by running amuck and knocking down everybody in his path. The principal interest centers in the opening scene, with one or two rounds of a lively boxing match. Aside from that the picture is commonplace. Even the photography is poor, due possibly in some degree to the rapid movement of the figures. The operator was somewhat to blame. He turned his machine too fast.

"Leopard Hunting in Abyssinia" (Ambrosio).—A graphic picture, of great scenic beauty, illustrating methods of leopard hunting in that far off country. One wonders how the picture was made. It looks decidedly dangerous on the screen and suggests the thought that if the operators are placed in such close proximity with these dangerous beasts then they are to be highly praised for performing their work under such trying circumstances.

"The Servant of the Actress" (Itala).—A farce which contains surprises. An actress, going to a rehearsal, leaves her house in the care of her servants, who begin to have a hilarious time. But the actress returns unexpectedly and begins the rehearsal of some of her plays in her own apartments, to the great astonishment of the servants, who, peeping through the keyhole, see some things which are surprising occurring between the actress and her leading man.

"The Double Six" (Raleigh & Robert).—An interesting story in which the double six domino serves as a clue for proving a man a thief. The scenes are simple. There is nothing complicated or vague about the whole picture. A double six domino dropped in a cash box by a child and afterward dropped unnoticed by the thief when he empties the cash box in his own apartments are sufficient for the story. The struggle between the two men, when the master of the house discovers the thief at his cabinet, is well managed and seems almost real. In fact, as a piece of melodrama the picture is quite satisfactory.

"Marvelous Shaving Soap" (Deutsche).—A story illustrating what occurred when Stocksey, tired of barbers, brought home a box of shaving soap which, when applied to anything that had hair, caused the latter to disappear almost instantly. And the results when the two madcap boys of the household discovered the soap and began experimenting with it are sufficient to satisfy the most ardent devotee of fun. This is the first film the writer remembers from this house, and, apart from some minor defects in photography, it is well worthy including with other productions that come from abroad.

"The Motor Cyclist" (Raleigh & Robert).—A thrilling picture of the experiences of a motor cyclist. It is said, half humorously, perhaps, that this daring rider was in the hospital only ten days after he completed the series of incidents and accidents in which he figures in this film. He was finally fished out of the river into which he ran his machine and was soundly thrashed for his temerity.

"The Song That Reached Her Heart" (Raleigh & Robert).—A tender love story in which a girl loses her reason because she believes her lover was killed in the explosion of a big gun. He returns to find her mind gone, but wandering one day through the grounds where they formerly were much together he sings one of the old songs. The effect is magical and her reason returns. The scenic effects of this picture are remarkably good, some of the pictures being far above the average of outdoor reproduction. It is a very satisfactory picture.

"The Painter's Idol" (Eclair).—A love story where inconsistency, espionage and a duel with the disguised girl are interesting features. It is a difficult film to describe, partly because it is complicated and partly because it is not entirely clear in all instances. Some of the acting is sufficiently dramatic to attract favorable attention.

"Mr. Nosy Barker" (Itala).—A lively story of a gentleman who got into all sorts of difficulties because he poked his nose into other people's business. The many things that happened to this man are strung together in an interesting picture, clearly photographed and well acted throughout. Perhaps the only fault to be found with it is the accidents are a bit too numerous. They get tiresome before they are finished.

"Off to the Wedding" (Le Lion).—A bit of comedy, showing a couple going to a wedding. The man has a coat dyed to wear and whoever he touches he discolors their white clothes, and when he touches black clothes with his hand he powders them white. These characteristics lead to a number of amusing complications until finally he is thrown out of the wedding party.

"Reformed Thief" (Theo. Pathe).—A story of a gentleman who befriended a thief and was afterward saved through the same thief's intervention. The principal attraction of the film is the almost perfect technical work and the beautiful scenic effects. The story cannot be called exactly commonplace, but there is no particular strength to it.

"The Forced Loan" (Theo. Pathe).—Because a gentleman will not loan a man five pounds he places an advertisement in the papers which brings all sorts of mendicants and ragamuffins to the gentleman's house. After enough of this sort of thing he gets his loan and the tribulations cease. The action is lively and the technical quality good.

OHIO NOTES.

The Brilliant Theater, located on East Fifty-fifth street, Cleveland, Ohio, formerly under the management of Fraine & Brown, has changed hands. Mr. Thompson, a local amusement promoter, has taken charge. Vaudeville and pictures will be featured throughout the Winter.

Mr. W. C. Kunzmann, who had charge of the Vitagraph machine at the Sandusky Theater, Sandusky, Ohio, last season, has accepted a position with the National Carbon Company, Cleveland, Ohio, in the moving picture carbon testing department. Mr. Kunzmann has owned and also managed theaters, rinks and other amusement enterprizes throughout the country in the past seven years.

CHICAGO NOTES.

Harry Franks, one of the proprietors of the Grand Theater, Forty-third street and Grand boulevard, and also of the Royal Theater, Belmont and Lincoln streets, died suddenly Friday night.

Ed. Burck, proprietor of theater on Fifty-second and Halsted streets, has opened a new magnificent house on East Fifty-fifth street seating 800 people.

Carl Laemmle is back in Chicago again after an inspection tour among his branch offices. Miss Rosabelle Laemmle, little daughter of Carl Laemmle, entertained a party of children in honor of her eighth birthday, on December 4, at the Laemmle residence, 520 Grand boulevard. Fairy tales and moving pictures were features of the day.

Progress in Machine Construction.

THE POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6.

We have heard so many operators speak highly of the practical value and efficiency of the Power's Cameragraph that we here present a full description of the Power's Company's latest introduction, the No. 6, which has just been placed on the market.

Every part of the mechanism is made of the best material and is of ample size and strength to withstand the strain of constant service for many hours every day in the year. The frame is heavy and rigid; the gears are of large diameter and wide face, with spirally cut teeth which reduce noise, eliminate "back-lash" and insure steadiness of operation. The larger gears are made from a special alloy which reduces friction to a minimum, and the pinions are cut from the best grade of machine steel to withstand wear. The bearings are of exceptional length, insuring perfect alignment of the shafts or spindles which are of extra large diameter to prevent bending. All parts are interchangeable and are gaged with the highest degree of accuracy.

The most striking feature of the No. 6 Power's Cameragraph is perhaps the intermittent movement, or driving mechanism for the intermittent sprocket. It is a departure from the various intermittent movements which have been used on moving picture machines in the past. Heretofore, those machines which have been equipped with intermittently rotating sprockets have been almost universally supplied with the well-known Geneva movement, which comprises a star wheel with four slots and a cam or pin wheel by which the star wheel is turned through the engagement of its pin with the slots of the star wheel. By this arrangement, the intermittent sprocket is given a turn through ninety degrees at each rotation of the cam or pin wheel. The wear upon the pin and the star wheel is rapid, and frequent replacement is unavoidable.

As compared with the Geneva movement, the new intermittent movement of the No. 6 Power's Cameragraph presents two marked advantages: the period required for a quarter turn of the sprocket is materially shortened and the parts comprised in the intermittent movement are of durable construction. The light and fragile pine wheel and star wheel are done away with. Instead of the former, a cam of specially hardened tool steel is substituted and in place of the latter, a heavy steel cross with a pin or stud on each arm is supplied. These pins are engaged by the cam at each rotation of the main driving shaft, and the wear is distributed over all four pins. The construction of both the cam and the cross is shown in Fig. 1, and it will be seen that the operation of the movement is free from strain or wear upon the moving parts.

The revolving shutter is enclosed within the frame of the machine where it is protected from injury, and where it cannot interfere with the use of lenses of the longest focus, and it is mounted in front of the aperture plate or picture gage, so permitting the use of a lens of the shortest possible focus. The shutter gears are angle gears (not bevel gears) and are over an inch in diameter with faces three-eighths of an inch wide.

The picture is framed by a slight vertical movement of a carriage bearing the intermittent sprocket, and the framing lever is mounted on the base of the mechanism or machine head, where it can be readily reached with the left hand without interfering with the operation of the machine. The movement of the framing carriage does not alter the relation of the shutter to the picture gage or projection aperture. The gearing connection to the framing carriage has all the gears arranged in a straight line, eliminating the toggle joint and toggle joint gears.

The film feed comprises three sprockets; the top feed sprocket, the middle or intermittent sprocket and the bottom or take-up feed sprocket. The film is held in position upon the top feed sprocket by means of two flanged rollers turning on fixed spindles which insure perfect enngagement of the film perforations and the sprocket teeth, with the least possible wear on the film. A hardened steel shoe with flanged sides holds the film in contact with the middle or intermittent sprocket over more than one-fourth of its circumference. This shoe is so set that it exerts no pressure on the film, and a steel roller is provided to prevent frictional contact of the film with the shoe as it leaves the intermittent sprocket. The bottom or take-up feed sprocket controls the rate at which the film is taken up in the lower mechanism. and a steel shoe with flanged sides holds the film on this sprocket without pressure against the film.

The tension on the film necessary to insure steady pictures is produced by means of the aperture plate, which is provided with wear strips of glass-hard steel, and a pair of tension springs provided with half-round hardened steel contact shoes on which soft emulsion or film cement cannot accumulate and scratch the film. The film is held flat with less friction than is produced by any other type of film tension device.

The safety devices, to protect the film from fire, comprise upper and lower magazines, an automatic fire shutter and upper and lower film shields.

The fireproof film magazines are of the square type, insuring easy insertion and removal of the film and reels, and are provided with valves that prevent the passage of flame into the magazines. The lower magazine is provided with Power's patent automatic take-up device which maintains a uniform tension on the film at all times, whether the reel be empty or full.

The automatic fire shutter is simple in construction, and the operating mechanism readily accessible. The parts are constructed to withstand wear and operate with very little friction. A little heavy oil or melted vaseline should be used to lubricate the parts from time to time to insure perfect operation.

The film shields protect the film in its travel from the upper to the lower magazine. The upper film shield is mounted on the film gate and moves out of the way when the gate is open for threading the film through the machine. The lower film shield is mounted on the base of the machine head and is arranged to hold the film gate open while the film is being threaded.

The devices which hold the film upon the sprockets are arranged to afford rapidity in threading. The film is placed on the upper or top feed sprocket without shifting the position of either of the retaining rollers which automatically align the film properly. The shoe which holds the film on the intermittent sprocket is carried on a pivoted bracket mounted on the machine frame so that the film can be positively positioned on the intermittent sprocket without closing the film gate. In like manner, the film retaining shoe for the lower or take-up feed sprocket is pivoted on the machine frame for a similar reason. When the film gate is closed to produce tension on the film, the lower film shield swings automatically into position.

The lamphouse has removable top and back. Doors are provided on both sides and are made as large as possible to afford ready access to every part of the lamp. The lamphouse is mounted on a heavy base casting carried by a set of adjustable sliding ways which provide for forward and backward movement in focusing as well as lateral movement for stereopticon use.

The condensors are carried in a rectangular box which is attached to the front of the lamphouse. Each lens is held in a separate holder or clip which can be removed in case of breakage of the condensor without disturbing the other condensor.

The dissolving shutter is mounted in front of the condensor support and is pivoted to swing in a plane at right angles to the line of projection. It serves to protect the film and the mechanism from the heat of the arc lamp when the machine is not in operation, and serves as a dissolving shutter when stereopticon slides are being changed.

The slide carrier is made of sheet steel of sufficiently heavy gage to prevent warping under the heat of the arc lamp and is of the latest design.

The arc lamp affords every possible adjustment. Every part is made extra heavy to resist intense heat and heavy strain. The carbon holders clamp the carbons so rigidly that they cannot be put out of alignment. The carbons can be set in position to secure the best possible results with both direct and alternating current, and the carbon holders may be shifted laterally either together or independently while the current is on. The back and forward movement of the lamp is accomplished by a rack and pinion, insuring quick adjustment and rigid support.

The rheostat is either adjustable or non-adjustable, as desired, and is of either the grid or wire coil type. The rheostats regularly furnished are calculated to obtain at least 25 amperes on a current of 110 volts and the resistance elements are of ample size to insure long service.

The table or stand has a top of oil finished walnut and is mounted on a set of telescoping lens of steel tubing heavily nickel plated. These fit into rigid iron leg sockets or flanges in which they are tightly clamped by set screws. To insure perfect rigidity, a turnbuckle and a pair of screw-eyes are furnished with the stand to anchor it securely to the floor.

A dainty Harrison Fisher water color calendar for 1910 has been issued by the Film Import and Trading Company, 127 East Twenty-third street, New York City. It is a very artistic production and we are glad to possess so agreeable a reminder of the days of 1910.

The machine shop at the Vitagraph factory is a factory in itself. Here are built all the delicate perforators and printing machines in use by the company. Special pride is taken in the perfection of this department, and the precision of the machines is well testified by the steadiness of Vitagraph pictures on the screen.

"Cardinal Richelieu," another high art Vitagraph production, has just been completed. To say that the scenery is realistic is mild praise; as a matter of fact, the construction of some of the set pieces and painted backgrounds was the work of months, and the costuming and action is correct and dignified. The subject, presented without a lecture, may be above the head of the average spectator, but there is enough in the photography and scenery to alone hold the interest.

The United Film Renting Company's offices, at 121 East Twenty-third street, are the neatest and cleanest of any that we have visited. It is doubtful if this aspect will continue if the customers increase as rapidly as they have been doing. The fact that this company buys the whole Independent output and is able to care for first, second or third-run customers has brought them much business. Any exchange that does business on the lines on which they are doing deserves success.

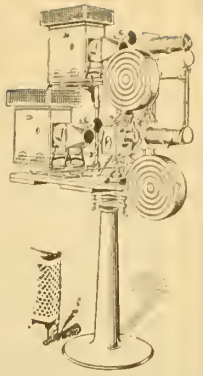
Motiograph
No 1-Flickerless

IMPORTANT



Motiograph Dissolving Stereo

It has come to my attention that certain people have made the statement to dealers and prospective purchasers that the Flickerless Moving Picture Machine, for which I am now special agent, is not approved for use in Greater New York.

MOTIOGRAPH

I wish to advise those who are in doubt that the Motiograph is approved and can be seen in daily operation in Greater New York. As a matter of fact, when the Motiograph was submitted to the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, the Chief Inspector and the Engineers commented very favorably upon the beautifully constructed mechanism, and were particularly pleased with the automatic fire shutter which is, without a doubt, the only real and safe fire shutter ever produced.

I extend a cordial invitation to Managers, Experts and Salesmen of Film Exchanges and to those interested in Moving Picture Machines to call at my new show room on the fourth floor of Number Thirty, Greenwich Avenue, which is only two minutes' walk from the the corner of Eighth Street and Sixth Avenue, to inspect this wonderful and perfect Moving Picture Machine in operation, giving full size pictures in combination with either a rheostat, or the "Hallberg" Electric Economizer on direct or alternating current, as desired.

I Guarantee a Bright Flickerless Picture

I can also show you the Motiograph combined with dissolving stereopticon, making the most perfect Moving Picture Outfit in the World at only $294.00; and Moving Picture Machines with ordinary stereopticon attachment at prices from $140.00 up. If you want the best and latest, don't fail to call or drop me a line for my free booklet No. W-11.

Stock is carried in New York of all styles of machines, as well as parts and my prices are right.

Special Lecture on the Life of Moses,

First Reel.

(Released December 4th by the Vitagraph Company.)

Scene I.

The first picture takes us back to the days of Egypt's glory and Israel's shame and misery, for here the children of Israel are held in cruel slavery, smarting under the lash of their pitiless taskmasters, helping with brick and mortar to rear those monuments of Egypt, the ruins of which to this day attest her former grandeur. The overseers made he lives of the children of Israel bitter with hard bondage from morning until night came to their relief. Presently shouts herald the coming of Pharaoh, the ruler of Egypt. He passes through the toiling throngs in his chariot and the overseers show him the plans of the monuments and tell him of the progress of the work, and Pharaoh seems well pleased; but when he looks upon his slaves, the Israelites, he begins to fear them, and urges the taskmasters to afflict them with new burdens. Pharaoh, when he re-enters his chariot, is plainly disturbed and alarmed in regard to the Israelites, and obeying their master's command the taskmasters are more cruel than ever to the children of Israel.

Scene II.

Having returned to his palace and speaking to his high servant, Pharaoh bids him write out a decree for the destruction of the children of Israel, ordering the death of every male child of the Hebrews, and the decree being written out, Pharaoh signs it and commands his high servant to take it to the court and read it at the foot of the throne, thus making it a law unto all Egypt. And the high servant having departed, Pharaoh still ponders on the dangers to the state from the Israelites, who if a foreign enemy should attack him might turn against the Egyptians. (Short pause.) His gloomy thoughts are presently banished by the coming of his beloved daughter with her train of dusky maids. The daughter, speaking in the light-heartedness of youth of her happy life, her gardens of flowers, soon beguiles the mind of Pharaoh from cares of state, and with cheerful words coming from a sweet and gentle heart clears her father's brow and makes him forget his anxieties, when two messengers arrive, announcing to the king that the court is assembled and ready to receive him. With a heavy heart the king goes to the palace, while the daughter is consoled by her maids.

Scene III.

In the palace of the Pharaohs the court is waiting for the ruler, and all the courtiers bow low as presently he enters and slowly ascends the throne. He gives ear to all who come and wish to be heard; to some he refuses the boon they ask, to others he grants what they pray for, while to others again he gives commands and directions. Suddenly the monarch commands silence to all, and as they stand in awe and fear he commands the high servant to come to the foot of the throne and read and promulgate the edict against the Hebrews. Pharaoh's daughter and her train pass through the court at this moment and linger to listen to the decree. (Decree appears on screen.) Its fearful cruelty fills the heart of the princess with horror and compassion. She sees her father giving the fatal paper to the captain of the soldiers, who march forth to put it into immediate execution. The princess on bended knees on the steps of the throne appeals to her father for pity to the conquered race, and at a signal from her the maids join in her prayer for mercy. The father remains immovable on his throne, turning a deaf ear to his daughter's pleadings.

Scene IV.

The tender infant Moses in his cradle in the mother's cottage by the Nile is an object of the caressing love of his sister. The happy mother, busy with the cares of the little household, needs water, and finds that the supply has run out, and so she asks her daughter to go to the well and fetch more. Obedient to the mother's word, the sister of Moses lifts the pitcher to her shoulders and goes on her way. (Pause.)

Scene V.

The well was the great center of life in the East, and is to this day, and a busy throng passes to and fro. Poor sister of Moses! As she is approaching the well she is all ignorant of the dread decree of Pharaoh. (Short pause.) Barely has she bent her shoulders to the task at the well when a pale, frightened daughter of Israel in her flight from Pharaoh's soldiers warns her of the great peril. The poor woman is closely pursued by a soldier, who despite all her tears and lamentations takes her boy away from her. The trembling sister of Moses sees other soldiers on the same bloody errand and with throbbing heart hastens back to the cottage.

Scene VI.

Rushing breathlessly into the cottage, she tells her mother of the edict of Pharaoh and of the frightful scenes she has just witnessed. The horror grows on the mother's face and the two daughters of Israel in their distress fall on their knees and pray for light to the God of their nation. There dawns in the mother's heart a ray of hope, and quickly she conceives a plan by which her little child might yet be saved. Mother and sister take the cradle with the child and cover them with a thick veil of black, and carry it to the stagnant pools along the bed of the river Nile, and here the mother gives the child to his sister, who tenderly puts him on the ground, while the mother, as the Bible tells the story, daubs the cradle with pitch and slime to protect it against the water and then the child is put back, while the sister of Moses has hastened to the river's brink and has seen the daughter of Pharaoh and her maids coming toward the river's bank, and now goes back to the mother to tell her of it, whereupon both mother and child take hold of the cradle and together carry it to the river.

Scene IX.

Both cautiously walk to the river's edge and put their precious burden in the water, hoping that the child would attract the attention of the princess and move her pity, and the mother goes away with a sorrowing heart while the daughter remains hidden in the bushes that she may see whatever happens to the little child.

Scene X.

And presently the princess appears and is soon followed by her train of maids, who, gathering flowers on the way, are leading their mistress to her bath.

Scene XI.

Again and again on her way home the mother turns in agony to the God of her fathers, praying that He may spare the child's life. (Silence during rest of this scene.)

Scene XII.

The mother's prayer has been answered. One of the maids of the princess has found the strange-looking crib in the water, and while the sister looks on with beating heart the princess opens the little ark and sees the babe, and lo! the babe wept. The heart of the princess moved to pity, she says: "This is one of the children of the Hebrews." And she fondled the child and said, "I will adopt it for my own." At this moment the boy's sister steps forth from her hiding place and kneeling before the princess, says: "May I bring one of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child?" And the princess said to her: "Go." And the sister went to tell the good news to the mother, while the princess said: "I will name the baby Moses, which means drawn out of the water," and with a glad heart and a smiling face she brought him into the palace.

Scene XIII.

The mother, beset with harrowing doubts as to the fate of her beloved child, is plunged into deepest grief. (Short pause.) Presently the daughter rushes in and tells her of the good fortune that has come to them all. The mother's face brightens when she hears that her daughter has arranged to have her for the nurse of the child, and her heart overflows with gratitude as with her faithful daughter she repairs to the palace of Pharaoh.

Scene XIV.

The daughter of Pharaoh enters the palace, and as all bow down before her she takes the babe from the arms of one of her maids and orders two of the servants to bring a royal chair and a pillow from her own couch for a fitting bed for the child. When her father enters and greets her he is astonished to find a child of the hated race reposing in her arms, and at first he is loath to give his consent to the adoption of the child so marvellously rescued from death. (Short pause.) The servants now come and bring the royal chair and the pillow from the princess' couch, and at this moment the eager mother and sister come into the chamber; the mother's natural anxiety to clasp her child to her heart is wisely restrained by the daughter. Both women fall on their knees to receive the command of the princess, who says to the mother: "Go, take the child and nurse him and I will give thee wages." Pharaoh and the princess then withdraw, leaving mother and sister free to cover the child with kisses and caresses in a very ecstasy of joy and thanksgiving to the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

A CORNER IN WHEAT.—No subject has ever been produced more timely than this powerful story of the wheat gambler, coming as it does when agitation is rife against that terrible practice of cornering commodities that are the necessities of life. Laws are being framed with a view of suppressing such nefarious transactions, and no more convincing argument could be shown than that set forth in this picture. Every phase of the question is illumined, beginning with an animated reproduction of Jean Francois Millet's masterpiece, "The Sowers." From the barn they start and with the grain sack hung from their shoulders, the two bent and knotted forms are seen trudging wearily over the plowed ground, their arms swinging in perfect chronometry with a slight gush of wheat grain pouring forth at each advance of the arm. In this scene we find the genesis of one of the mammoth industries of the earth. The foundation of life, for it is the foundation of the bread of life. How little do those poor honest souls realize the turmoil the fruit of their labors will incur. What a contrast is shown in the office of the Wheat King, surrounded by his lieutenants, waiting for the word as he engineers the great corner whereby he will obtain absolute control of the entire produce, not only of the present, but the future toiling of the poor sowers. Into the wheat pit on the "'Change" we go, and there find a struggling mob of brokers with their all slowly but surely melting under the blast of the King's determination. At length the battle is won, and the Wheat King stands majestically amid the debris of wrecked fortunes. Here is the gold of the wheat. He is lauded for his acumen, wined and dined and regarded as a man among men, little thinking of the misery and suffering his so-called genius has induced. Ah! that is the chaff of the wheat. The baker is obliged to pay twice as much as formerly for his flour and so must charge twice as much for the loaf. Consequently, many a poor soul must go hungry. Furthermore, the bread fund for the poor is cut down, and many a shivering wretch stands in the line only to be denied bread when his turn comes. There is no vengeance possible here but the hand of God, and God's vengeance when wreaked is terrible and unconditional, and one of the sins that cries to heaven for vengeance is denying food to the hungry. This cry is heard, and as the King is showing his friends through the elevators into the bins of which are flowing the steady stream of his golden grain, he trips and falls into one of the bins and is buried. He has been called before his God to answer. Our thoughts are carried back to the bent and knotted forms of the sowers trudging along, ignorant of the venegance of the wheat.

IN A HEMPEN BAG.—Here is one occasion in which the letting of the "cat out of the bag" almost resulted in an awful calamity. The house cat has become such a nuisance that the mistress decides it shall be drowned. To this end she secures a bag, ties the feline pest in it and dispatches the maid for the old deaf gardener to take it to the river and throw it in. Meanwhile, the mistress has discovered the nurse drunk, and discharges her. The children, finding their pet tied up in the bag, let it out and carry it away to hide. The nurse, perturbed at her dismissal, to get even conceives the idea to hide the baby, and seeing the empty bag, being ignorant of its destination, puts the infant in it and ties it up. The deaf gardener enters and carries the bag off, making his way to the river. On the way he meets a couple of boys with a rifle, who upon learning the contents of the bag, beg the old man to let them have a shot at it. To this he consents, but the gun jams and won't work, so the man proceeds on his way. At the house there is a panic in the endeavor to find baby until the presence of the cat tells them the impending danger. By this time the bag is brought to the river, but the boys run up just as the old man is about to throw it over. They have adjusted the rifle and beg for another chance. The old man tells them he will open the bag and they may shoot as the captive jumps out. You may imagine their surprise when instead of a cat they find a baby, just as the distracted, terror-stricken mother rushes up.

THE TEST.—In this subject the Biograph presents another episode in the Wright family. Harry gets in bad for a time, but he wriggles out like a trout off a hook and comes up with that perennial grin or "the smile that won't come off." Harry is starting on a business trip and Bessie is sad, but he makes the big promise, showing her a photo of herself in his bill case, which shall ever be before him. As he turns to fasten his grip, wifey extracts the photo, handing him the closed case, with the expression, "We shall see." Putting the case in his pocket, he departs. Next we find him at the hotel of another town, enjoying, with convivial society, a little game of draw. Ah, he must not forget a letter to wifey. He tells her how lonesome he feels, that her picture is now before him. When Bessie reads this, she storms. "What a fib. I thought so." She writes him of the trap she set, and when he looks at the case now for the first time, he is flabbergasted. "Now I'm in for it. Ah, an idea." He telegraphs to his mother to send him at once the photo she has of Bessie. The photo arrives and he starts for home. Of course, you may imagine the reception, but when he shows himself possessed of her photo, Bessie pleads for forgiveness for having doubted him. Another victory for Harry.

FENTON OF THE 42D.—Capt. Fenton, of the "42d," and his men are detailed to patrol the Mexican border on the lookout for smugglers. The ranch on which they have camped is owned by an ugly-looking a Mexican as ever smoked a cigarette and drank mescal, and presided over by his sister, who is as pretty as he is repulsive. At the request of the sister, Capt. Fenton makes his headquarters at the ranch house and gains the hatered of the Mexican lover by promptly falling in love with her. While on a night ride through the country Fenton is shot by the jealous suitor, is nursed back to health by the beautiful sister, and while convalescing declares his love, which she reciprocates. Shortly after two smugglers are seen sneaking through the lines. One is shot in attempting to escape, and the other captured after a long chase. The captured smuggler is brought to Fenton as he is enjoying a tete-a-tete with his lady love, and proves to be her brother. Fenton's struggle between love and duty is graphically shown when the girl, on bended knee, pleads for her brother's freedom. Duty to his country conquering, his sweetheart denounces him and sends him away. That night she rescues her brother from the soldiers under Fenton. They take refuge in the hut of a friend, and when surrounded fight until their friend is killed and the brother mortally wounded. The defense of the hut is one of the most thrillingly dramatic scenes ever witnessed, the girl aiding the besieged men by loading their guns and revolvers and supporting them when, weak from loss of blood, they are on the point of collapse. The acting at this point is so terribly real that the spectator will forget that he is gazing at a theatrical production instead of an actual struggle for life, and his sympathy for the girl who is battling for her brother's life will know no bounds.

The picture ends as all good pictures, plays and hooks should end—happily, with the reunited lovers in each other's arms.

THE NEW POLICEMAN.—A new policeman, anxious to follow instructions literally, is given his book of printed rules. One of these is that he must report any occurrences out of the ordinary. On his first night's beat he comes across a dead dog at the corner of two streets. He promptly takes out his notebook in order to jot down the occurrence, but to his dismay finds that one of the street names is so long and vague that he cannot write it. He scratches his head in perplexity, but the situation is relieved when another policeman comes along and suggests moving the dead dog to the corner of two streets with short and simple names. This is promptly put down in the notebook and our new patrolman is happy.

A GIFT FROM SANTA CLAUS.—This picture is proof positive that there is such a person as Santa Claus, that he does come down the chimney, and that he does know the things that children want. The picture is not only timely and full of the Christmas feeling, but in itself and quite aside from the Christmas spirit it is an interesting story for the grown-ups as well as the children. It belongs to the order of "The Little Lord Fauntleroy," which fascinated the parents of a few years ago, and is full of the very genuine heart interest that should belong to everything concerning child-life.

It begins with the departure of Captain Lovell, a young officer of the Merchant Marine, and his farewell to his little motherless daughter, whom he leaves at a select school for girls, presided over by a lady whose business instinct is stronger than her sympathies. Captain Lovell's ship goes on the rocks, and in the next scene we see the school mistress reading the account of the wreck in the paper, and in anything but a kindly way breaking the news to the Captain's little daughter, Eloise. Eloise now has no one to provide for her, and at the end of the month she is forced to give up her pretty room at the school and become a little drudge, scrubbing the steps, sweeping the floors and sleeping in the bare attic room at the top of the house. Here we see her finding some consolation in her love of books and entertaining her one friend, the poor little, half-starved work-child of the kitchen, by reading aloud to her. Even this taste of comfort is denied her by the heartless school mistress.

In the midst of her troubles the Christmas season arrives, and the scene shifts to Santa Claus's house, way up by the North Pole. We see the jolly old fellow looking out over the world and arranging his gifts to provide for the wants of those children of the various lands that he views through his wonderful spyglass. Eloise sends him a note, and although the other girls have not been good to her since her father's death and the consequent loss of her own good clothes and position, she forgives them and remembers them all in her letter to Santa Claus, which concludes with a wish that he will not send her any presents except—"just someone to love her." The receipt of this note makes Santa Claus thoughtful for a minute, and then with him we look through his spyglass and we see what he sees.

On a deserted island far away on the other side of the world we see a man signalling a ship, which answers his signal, and the man looks remarkably like Eloise's father. Then, when Christmas Eve arrives, we see Santa Claus come down the chimney into her attic room and transform its barrenness into a bower of beauty, and we see Captain Lovell landing safe and sound in America again. Then Eloise wakes up and Santa Claus promptly vanishes, as of course he must, according to all traditions. We see her delight at the changed aspect of her room and sympathize with the thought, so plainly indicated, that all this beauty needs but one other gift—her father. Next we see what Eloise does not, that he is almost at the door while the wish is expressed, and so we can laugh through our tears when she looks up to find him with outstretched arms waiting to clasp her to his heart again.

AN AMATEUR HOLD-UP.—Jonesville reads its morning paper one day and finds that a crime wave has come to town. During the preceding night the residences of two or three leading citizens have been burglarized, two or three midnight pedestrians have been sandbagged, and "the police are powerless."

Mrs. Brown warns her husband to take the better lighted streets when he comes home at night. He laughs and says he can take care of himself.

Brown prepares after dinner to attend a meeting of the Municipal Protection League, and gives Mrs. Brown a vest to mend. Mrs. Brown removes her husband's watch and money from his vest and returns the garment without telling him of having removed his valuables.

Brown, after being cautioned by his wife to look sharp, starts out for the meeting. While on the way he collides with a drunken man, who brushes close to him and has difficulty in separating himself from Brown. The man swears at Brown and ambles on, while Brown looks after him with disgust.

Brown stops into a cigar store and there makes the discovery of having lost his watch and purse. He concludes that the intoxicated one must have got them and hurries out in an endeavor to overtake the thief. At the point of a pistol Brown demands the return of his valuables, and the drunk, believing that he is being held up, delivers his own watch and purse to Brown.

Brown hurries back to the cigar store and boasts of his heroism, when the victim, accompanied by two policemen, enters the place and points out Brown as the guilty party.

Brown is dragged to the police station and is dumbfounded when he learns that the man he robbed was entirely innocent of having removed his own watch and money.

He is liberated from his most unenviable position when Mrs. Brown appears and explains that it was she who removed her husband's roll and timepiece.

Brown is released, after being heavily fined by the judge for carrying concealed weapons, promising to observe more caution in his future dealings with supposed hold-up men.

A FEMALE REPORTER.—The managing editor of "The Daily Knocker" gets an idea—and one of a deep rich typhoid hue. In this idea he proposes to quite out-raffle the "mysterious Mr. Raffles" scheme, and at the same time to get another knock at the alleged indolent city police.

Summoning Miss Flip, the society reporter, he makes the following proposition: At midnight that night she is to forcibly enter a city residence (this to prove that the Knoxville police are not on the job) and to carry off as much silver as she can, providing, of course, she isn't caught, and to write a glowing description of her adventure for the next morning's paper.

Miss Flip, after a little hesitancy, agrees to try, and midnight, equipped with mask, dark-lantern and the latest things in burglars' tools, finds her outside a fashionable residence, just a little frightened and more inclined to run away than to burgle.

However, she plucks up courage, and with difficulty climbs up a trellis to the window balcony, lifts the window sash and crawls in—when the first accident occurs. Her foot collides with something and a handsome jardiniere, holding a large fern, falls from its stand with a crash on the floor. With heart beating fast, she listens breathlessly and finally assures herself that the racket has not awakened the sleeping ones.

She stumbles around the dark room and upsets a chair. The clamor it makes jars on her nerves like a blast of dynamite. She is about to retreat to the window when she hears footsteps on the stair in the hall outside. There is no time for escape by the window now, so she dodges behind a convenient screen and tremblingly awaits developments.

John Saunders, whose house she has entered, comes into the room, a pistol held at a convenient angle and his eyes sharply seeking the intruder. He sees the screen wobbling a little and commands the thief to stand from behind it.

The girl, trembling and in tears, gives up the job as a bad one and steps from behind her shelter. Saunders is agreeably surprised when he finds instead of a grim-visaged male, a most attractive, but thoroughly frightened young woman. He roars at the joke, when she tries to persuade him that she is not really a thief but that the insane editor of the "Knocker" had given her the assignment. Then he turns to the 'phone and deliberately calls the police.

Before the police arrive, however, Miss Flip cleverly contrives to get Saunders' pistol, and at the point of it holds him at bay until the arrival of the two patrolmen. "There's your man," she says; "take him away."

Saunders' protestations are laughed at by the bluecoats, who unceremoniously clip on the handcuffs and drag him out of the room.

Then Miss Flip settles herself at the dining table, takes out her notebook and pencil and begins writing a glowing description of her midnight adventure.

THE SPANISH GIRL.—The story concerns Lola Gonzales, a Spanish dancing girl, who falls in love with Tom Wilson, better known by the sobriquet "Bud," foreman of the Circle "A" ranch, and opens with a scene near the ranch house with Lola dancing the old fandango to the entertainment of a half-dozen Mexican vaqueros. Wilson comes on the scene and sending the Mexicans off to work, goes on his way attending to his duties. Lola follows and endeavors to make love to him. Wilson shows that he is not at all affected and tells her that he is engaged to marry Martha Allison, the daughter of his employer. Lola turns away in a jealous rage and vows to break up the affair.

A few days go by and Lola again encounters young Wilson. This time Martha is with him. Lola steals away, and is soon joined by Pedro Mayos, her Mexican admirer. Pedro hates the young foreman and they propose a scheme to put Wilson at outs with his sweetheart.

Pedro contrives to meet Martha and induces her to go with him for a walk in the orchard. At the same time Lola hunts up Wilson and begs him to go with her for just a little walk. Wilson refuses at first, but hurries away with her when Lola offers to prove that Martha is untrue to him.

Lola and he go into the orchard and find Pedro and Martha together. Wilson, fully convinced that Martha is untrue to him, cruelly denounces her and leaves. Martha turns on Pedro indignantly.

Lola joins Wilson in another part of the orchard and makes love to him. He is about to take her in his arms when a rider comes upon them and delivers a message. The note informs Wilson that he has been appointed deputy sheriff in place of Hank Smith, lately deceased. Wilson hurries away and Lola is left alone.

Pedro comes on the scene and demands recompense for the part he played in spoiling Wilson's love affair. The girl is convinced she has won the foreman and turns coldly away from her Mexican admirer. Pedro, in a rage, strikes her in the face and tells her to be off.

Lola, stung by the insult, hurries away to tell her friends of Pedro's brutality. When her story is told to the Mexicans they resolve to lynch Pedro, and ride off to Pedro's shack.

Pedro hears that the Mexicans are after him and endeavors to elude them. On the way he meets another Mexican, whom he begs to go in search of the sheriff, then continues his flight.

The pursuers soon strike Pedro's trail and track him to a deserted cabin. A lively fight ensues between the Mexicans and Pedro, but the incensed Mexicans soon overpower him, and are about to lynch him when Deputy Wilson rides up. The new deputy's timely arrival saves Pedro's life, the Mexicans are disarmed and sent about their business, and Pedro is handcuffed and started to the jail. On the way Pedro confesses his part of the conspiracy with Lola and thus gains his freedom.

Wilson makes all haste to return to Martha and to ask her forgiveness for having misjudged her. The scene ends with the two in each other's arms.

NOTHING IS EVER LOST.—Mr. Oblivion has an unfortunate habit of forgetting things and mislays his set of false teeth in a restaurant. Fortunately, the waiter finds it and brings it to him. While taking an after-dinner promenade, the wind blows his wig off, but a sailor brings it back to him. Next, he drops a compromising letter, which is found and returned to him by a boy, but unluckily for Mr. Oblivion, it is restored to him in his wife's presence. Then, when strolling along the river bank his wife falls into the water, but is rescued and placed in his arms just when he was beginning to forget her. Finally, he loses his purse, but somehow that does not come back to him.

THE LIFE BUOY.—A poor fisherman finds a baby floating in a life-buoy on the sea, evidently surviving a recent shipwreck. He adopts the child in spite of the desperate poverty of his own family. His creditors sell his furniture to satisfy their debts, but when they are about to sell the life-buoy, the fisherman seizes it, it breaks in two and is found to contain a roll of money, which brings comfort and happiness to the poor family for the rest of their lives.

THE SHEPHERD'S FLUTE.—Jack is a poor shepherd boy, employed by an avaricious old farmer. While the sheep are browsing Jack goes to sleep. His master finds him thus and beats him mercilessly.

Poor Jack, when alone, kneels down and invokes the gods to help him. A beautiful fairy comes out of a bush and orders Jack to cut a reed and make a flute of it. Then she explains to him that when anybody wants to hurt him, all he has to do is to blow the flute and his enemies will immediately begin to dance as long as he will blow.

Jack returns to the farm, and when his master is about to beat him for his tardiness, he commences to play his flute. The stick falls from his master's hands and he begins to dance. As soon as the music stops, the farmer calls all his farm hands to beat Jack, but Jack plays his flute again and makes them all dance. Then the farmer sends for soldiers to arrest Jack, but when they arrive they also are made to dance. Then the shepherd escapes. This angers the soldiers, who turn upon the peasants and beat them for calling them out for so trivial a reason.

CAMBYSES, KING OF PERSIA.—About 550 B. C. there reigned in Persia and Egypt, Cambyses, a very cruel and passionate king.

He fell in love with Amestris, the beautiful wife of his favorite courtier, Prexaspe. It happened one day that young Masyos, son of Prexaspe and Amestris, was learning how to throw the javelin or spear.

Cambyses comes upon the scene and plays with Masyos. Unhappily, as King Cambyses threw the javelin, Masyos ran in front of him so that the javelin pierced him through the heart.

Amestris, the boy's mother, did not understand that it was accidental and she swore to avenge Masyos' death. Accordingly, she feigned to yield to Cambyses' passion in order to attract him into her home.

There, before the corpse of her dead son, which she tragically displayed to Cambyses, she stabbed the king to the heart with the same javelin with which he had killed Masyos.

THE LAW OF THE MOUNTAINS.—This is a story of the moonshiners of Eastern Tennessee and Kentucky. Wes Clayhorne, a young mountaineer, and Emily Harden, daughter of another mountaineer, are in love with each other and decide to get married. Things go very well with them for a time until Wes has a long spell of sickness. Their scant savings are gone and credit is denied them at the village store. Wes, returning one day after a heartbreaking tramp for work, finds his child at the point of death. He rushes for the doctor and begs him to see the child, but he refuses unless his fee is paid. Heartbroken, Wes turns homeward, but is overtaken by a revenue officer, who tells him how he can make some money by informing on a certain band of moonshiners for whom he has been long searching. Wes at first indignantly denies all knowledge of the band, but at sight of a roll of bills and thinking of his sick child gives the revenue officer the information he wants.

Next we see him on his way to the doctor, who on receiving his fee visits the child, while Wes makes some necessary purchases at the store.

A group of mountaineers loafing around the store become suspicious of Wes when they see him with the money, and demand to know where he got it. Wes returns home with his purchases and his wife in surprise eagerly asks him how he came by them, but he answers evasively and inquires about the child.

A few days later a kindly neighbor tells Mrs. Clayborne that her husband is suspected of informing on some moonshiners who have been arrested by the revenue officers, and warns them to flee. She begs her husband to deny the accusation, but he only shakes his head and tries to hide his face. But the inexorable law of the mountains has been broken and Wes is shot from behind and dies, having sacrificed his own life for the sake of his child.

THE LIVING DOLL.—Christmas Eve, Polly, a little girl, is in great excitement. She wishes to get so many toys from Santa Claus! She hangs her stockings on the mantelpiece, says her prayer, bids her mother good-night, and goes to bed.

As soon as she is sleeping, two kidnappers come into her bedroom, take her and bring her into a miserable cellar. The man quarrels with the woman and reproaches her for having taken the little girl. Polly cries very much from fright. The kidnappers, fearing the police, take her away from the cellar.

While she is out with them, she runs away and gets lost in a forest. The snow falls. She remembers the tale of Tom Thumb and she climbs a big tree and sees in the distance a church illuminated for the midnight mass.

She goes there directly. The beadle will not let her in, but a kind woman sends her to the gallery. She notices a beautiful colored window and admires it. Suddenly the window turns like a wheel and disappears and in its place Santa Claus is there loaded with toys. He smiles at her, calls her and then invites her to visit his palace. He then vanishes. Again she sees a vision of children finding their Christmas presents, and sees the angels blessing her. She leaves the church and goes to Santa Claus' palace.

Everything was beautiful. Polly is delighted to see such wonders. She finds a big box which contains a doll as large as herself. She undresses the doll, takes her clothes, puts them on and goes into the box herself.

Santa Claus appears and is very busy getting ready to distribute the toys in his aeroplane loaded by angels. They take the box containing Polly and put it with the other presents.

The aeroplane loaded with toys goes over the city, stops at the different chimneys and leaves the toys.

The box containing Polly is put down a chimney and placed with the other presents.

Polly is so glad to find herself at home, she leaves her box and dances about the room. At this moment the nurse awakens Polly and the child finds it was only a dream.

She runs downstairs and finds her parents waiting for her near her stockings and she soon forgets the dream.

The last scene shows her with Santa Claus, who is saying farewell to all and giving them toys, candies, etc. Polly also sends kisses to everybody.

PATHE FRERES.

LA GRANDE BRETECHE.—In 1816 there appeared in the office of the Sub-prefect of Vendome a Spanish prisoner of war, the Count de Feredia. The Spanish nobleman was a handsome man who carried himself with the hauteur proverbial among the Spaniards of noble birth. Before the stern, forbidding Sub-prefect, the Count de Merret, Feredia stands awaiting the result of a note from the Prefect to his subordinate, ordering the latter to find suitable quarters for the prisoner and to obtain his parole. Having given his word of honor not to attempt to escape, the Spaniard seeks to beguile the hours among the gay throngs along the avenues where he sees and meets the Countess de Merret, the beautiful wife of the Sub-prefect.

Condemned to a monotonous and uneventful life in the quiet province and married to a man in whose stern character she finds nothing to respond to the joyousness of her own nature, the Countess discovers in the person of Feredia a congenial companion; while in the society of one so beautiful and sympathetic, the courtly Spaniard finds palliation of his melancholy and forgets the irksomeness of his parole. Between two such souls a friendship such as this could scarce do less than ripen into love, and soon the fleeting moments in each other's company in the presence of others seem not so sweet as stolen hours beneath the fragrant rose bower in the old formal garden. Even here, however, they are not alone, as two masons soon intrude their rudely material selves upon the spiritual loveliness enveloping these two throbbing souls.

The Sub-prefect, though scarcely one to whom his wife's fair charms appeal, guards jealously the honor of his ancient name and, his suspicions having been aroused, he lays the trap in which he hopes to snare the fluttering wings of Cupid-gone-astray.

The Count de Merret announces his departure on some business of a pressing kind and drives away from La Grande Breteche only to return within the hour. In the meantime the Countess, thinking that her husband has now left for several days, has summoned her Spanish lover to her side and now within the dainty boudoir Feredia pours forth in a torrent of words the passionate story of his love. Seeing a crucifix suspended on a thread of gold around his sweetheart's neck, he swears upon it fidelity through all eternity and then thrusting it next his heart, he gives his own ebony crucifix to her in return. Fatal gift. He little knows how in this emblem of the greatest tragedy and love earth ever witnessed his own doom is sealed.

When the Sub-prefect returns and hurries to his wife's apartments, he finds Rosalie, the maid, on guard. Thrusting her aside, he rains thunderous blows upon the door. Within terror blanches the face of the pretty wife. Ruin stalks before her eyes. Disgrace cries out in every blow her furious husband delivers on the panel. In desperation she forces Feredia into her closet, and mustering all her self-control, she opens the door. As the Count enters he is surprised to find his wife alone, but his glance falling on the closet, he accuses her of having hidden her lover there. This she denies and when her husband, doubting, advances toward the door, springs before him. "If you find no one," she cries, "reflect that all will be over between us."

Apparently convinced by his wife's declaration, he turns to leave. On the table lies the ebony crucifix. Seeing it, the Count makes his now terrified wife swear that no one is concealed within her closet. For the sake of her lover she consents to the perjury.

"I know," exclaims the Count, "your purity of soul, and since it would mean separation either way, I prefer not to examine the closet." With that stands by and sees it all. Tears start to his eyes as he realizes that there is no joy or happiness for him. Love seems to have passed him by. No one cares for him, he has no home, he's alone and poor; while everybody else this glorious day seems to be bubbling over with the joy of living, with plenty of friends to love and he kind to them.

After leaving the happy scene in the meadow, the tramp wends his way to the home of his benefactress, a beautiful, kind young lady who gives him a little change and a kind word whenever he stops at her window. Her charity has so touched the friendless one that he looks upon her as a sort of goddess and trembles with joy when he sees her sweet kind face. To-day after thanking her not only with words but also with his poor eyes, he tramps along until he comes to a quiet spot by the brook, where lying down he he summons the two masons working on the grounds and orders them to seal up the door which so nearly wrecked their home.

Baffled, the frenzied girl stands watching the hideous work go on. Once, when the Count is called away, she makes a vain effort to rescue her imprisoned lover, but her implacable husband returns after only a momentary absence, and the attempt has only been rewarded by a fleeting glimpse of two sombre eyes which burn their reproach into the wretched woman's soul.

For twenty days thereafter the Sub-prefect sits at the bedside of his wife, who has succumbed to the frightful ordeal. The end is near. The Count is feigning sleep in his arm chair. Slowly, with

A CORNER IN WHEAT

The story of the wheat in symbolism

This is possibly the most stirring and artistic subject yet produced by the Biograph. It starts with an animated portrayal of Millet's masterpiece "The Sowers," which shows the genesis of the greatest factor in financial circles The Wheat King succeeds in cornering the entire commodity, after a fierce fight in the pit. The price soars, bread becomes a luxury almost out of reach of the poor, the bread fund is cut down so that the unfortunates of the "bread line" are forced to go hungry, and for what? Just to satisfy the ambition of a gambler. However, this crime has cried to Heaven for vengeance, for while showing some of his friends through the elevators that contain his wheat, he falls into one of the bins and is buried. Length, 953 feet.

IN A HEMPEN BAG

This is a short subject of unique construction containing quite a few thrills. A cat is put into a bag to be drowned. The children release the cat, and the discharged maid, to get even with her former employer, not knowing the bag's destination, hides the infant child in it. The bag is carried off by the deaf gardener towards the river, and is overtaken just in time. Length, 455 feet.

THE TEST

Hubby is starting off on a business trip, and wifey sets a trap to test his sincerity. She extracts from his card case her photo. He writes that he is lonesome for her, but has her picture ever before him. She writes back in harsh terms what she thinks of him, and he would have been lost had he not wired his mother to send to him a duplicate photo she had. Hence hubby wriggles out of an awkward position. Length, 545 feet.

infinite effort, the Countess drags herself from her bed and tottering to the relentless harrier, taps a feeble, last farewell with the ebony crucifix—the fateful gift of her lover slowly dying behind the wall.

THE TRAMP'S ROMANCE.—A beautiful day in the country! Sunshine, flowers and happy youths and maidens playing games. Tom, the poor tramp, falls asleep and has the most vivid of beautiful dreams. A lawyer-like looking man with a frock coat and top hat comes up to him and handing him a paper waits until he has read it. Poor Tom almost faints from joy when he sees that an unknown uncle, whose fortune amounts to almost a million dollars, has made him his sole heir. He can scarcely realize his good luck, but when the lawyer hands him over the money he no longer doubts the truth. His first thought is to buy himself some clothes, because now that he is rich he must go at once to seek the hand of his beautiful benefactress. The tailor fits him out so splendidly that he scarcely recognizes himself. He hurries to the house of his adored one and when he enters he finds her in the drawing room with her father and mother. He tells the latter the object of his visit and at first they are indignant at such a request, but when they see the fortune he produces from his pocket, they are more inclined to look kindly upon their new acquaintance.

When the girl sees him she recognizes him and extends her hand with a smile on her face; he waits a moment and then taking her in his arms he reverently embraces her. The next scene is their marriage; she pale and beautiful leaning on the arm of her proud and happy husband.

Poor Tom; he sees all this as plainly as he ever saw anything in his life—when all at once he receives a blow which seems to shatter his every nerve and opening his eyes he beholds two bluecoats, who stand telling him to "move on" or they will lock him up. He rubs his eyes and moves on, and then as if still in a dream stoops to pick some wild flowers growing all around him. With the thought of his beautiful lady still in his mind, he takes the simple little bouquet to her house, where he is met by the butler who tells him that his young mistress is at that moment being married in the parish church, and asks him if he does not hear the bells. Tom does hear the bells and waits outside until the ceremony is over. As the gay party leaves the church he approaches the bride and presents his flowers. She stops and graciously thanks the poor man, who kisses her hand and then stands back as the richly gowned wedding guests impatiently push forward.

HONEY INDUSTRY.—After seeing this picture one could almost go into the culture of bees oneself, so much information can be obtained by observing with attention the different views given in this film.

There are two kinds of hives, the natural and the artificial. In a natural hive the combs are made by the bees themselves and in an artificial hive, layers of perforated wax are placed in frames which can be removed without disturbing the bees. Our visit to the artificial hives here gives us a splendid idea of how the latter are used. Another picture shows us the bees at work. The latter are divided into three classes: the queen, who is the only prolific female bee; the males or drones, which the swarm exterminate when they wish to enter the hive again after the impregnation of the queen bee; and the workers. The latter gather the honey from the flowers and cleverly fashion hexagonal or six-sided cells of wax inside the hives where the queen deposits her eggs.

The honey is gathered the end of May or beginning of August. To extract the latter the hives are placed in a special sort of apparatus which leaves the cakes of wax intact.

The next picture shows us the honey being put into jars which are packed in cases for shipping. The last scene shows a big fat rosy baby enjoying a perfect feast of the beautiful golden honey.

THE UGLY GIRL.—Canta, known as "the ugly girl," is hooted at by the children, shunned by all men and made a laughing stock of by the women. Sad indeed is her lot and despair is written on her unattractive countenance as she draws her shawl more closely around her and hurries away to some solitary spot where she can rest in peace.

The scene is distinctly an Oriental one. Wherever one turns the richest of coloring greets one's eyes. The tiny dark native children in picturesque costumes play in the streets. Everybody seems happy and contented except poor Canta, who passes out of the town into the country where she can be alone with Nature, who kinder than her fellow beings smiles on her and whispers beautiful things to her such as she never heard from human lips. Reaching a cool quiet stream Canta stops to quench her thirst. In the distance she hears someone approaching, and looking around she sees a splendid looking youth coming along with faltering steps in her direction. She crouches as if to hide, as she does not wish him to see her ugly face. As he draws nearer she sees he is handsomer and more splendid than he appeared at first, but she also sees that he is blind and guides himself with a staff. No longer fearful, now that she knows the stranger cannot see, the girl stands erect and when he asks her for a drink hastens to give it to him. He gently kisses her hand in gratitude for her kindness and Canta begs him to allow her to be his guide. These two afflicted mortals therefore start out together each glad of the companionship of the other.

One day the blind man, Ivab by name, meets a dervish, who presents him with a lotion which he says will restore his sight. When Canta hears it she becomes alarmed because she is fearful that should Ivah see how hideous his guide is he will flee from her as do the rest of her fellow creatures. But her love conquers her pride and she decides to induce Ivah to use the cure no matter what the consequences might be to herself. Her unselfishness is rewarded and shortly after Ivah has used the liquid they both stand at the feet of one of their gods, he not only regains his sight, but the generous girl, as a reward for the sacrifice she was willing to make, becomes the most beautiful of maidens, and when Ivah looks upon her he makes up his mind that she and no one else will be his bride.

THE LUCKY NUMBER.—A rich miserly old fellow whose greatest pleasure in life is counting over the money he has hoarded by depriving himself of all pleasures, sends his faithful old serving maid to bed while he sits alone and fingers his gold. Old Susie comfortably settled in her attic chamber dreams that night that number 13 is the winning number in a lottery which has been largely advertised in the place. In the morning she begs and implores her master to lend her the amount with which to purchase a ticket, and the latter being a superstitious old codger, on hearing her dream gives her the money and she starts out at once to purchase the ticket. When she arrives at the grounds where the lottery is being held she meets an old woman who is selling sweets. Going over to her Susie soon forgets all about the ticket, she is so carried away with the delicious dainties the woman has in her basket. Before long she has spent all her money, but on returning home, never says a word to her master about what she has done.

The morning of the drawing of the prizes the old miser reads with joy in his heart that No. 13 has won. He makes up his mind at once to marry Susie as he must have possession of all the wealth that will now be hers. He calls her, therefore, and tells her that he has decided that he cannot live without her and begs and implores the stupefied old woman to go with him at once to the Mayor's office where they will get married. Scarcely believing her ears she rushes up to her attic chamber to put on her best duds, and the miser spreads the news of his approaching nuptials through the village and invites his friends to assist at the ceremony. After his guests have left and all is over, the happy husband begs his bride to show him the lottery ticket. Poor Susie confesses to him how she was tempted that day by the candy woman and how she didn't purchase the ticket after all, adding philosophically that she thought "a bird in the hand was worth two in the bush." The newly made husband turns purple with rage and looks as if he would annihilate the trembling woman beside him. To think of all his trouble and all his expense and all he has for it is an ugly old hag on his hands for life.

A STRONG TONIC.—An attentive husband very much worried about his ailing wife buys her a tonic which has been highly recommended to him by the drug store man. He coaxes her to take a good big drink of the medicine as he knows it will restore her strength, and to encourage her he takes a dose himself. Hardly has he replaced the glass on the table, however, when he becomes possessed with herculean strength and performs all sorts of impossible feats, which finally get him into a good deal of trouble. As he walks along the street an inoffensive pedestrian coming in the opposite direction accidently collides with him and the strong man fells him with a single blow leaving him prostrate on the ground. As soon as he recovers his breath he pulls himself together and races after his assailant. Several others join in the chase among them two or three hurly policemen. The strong man seeing that he is pursued, quietly uproots a lamppost and turning defends himself with same, wielding it as if it were a light hickory stick. After a while the crowd manages to get our friend down and try to carry him off bodily to the station house. As they are crossing a bridge in the park the strong man breaks away and catching the policeman and others by the neck pitches the whole bunch right over into the stream. They swim ashore and get help and are again on the strong man's track, succeeding finally in arresting him. He is not long in his cell, however, because he breaks through the wall and comes tumbling in on the captain and his men as they are talking over the wonderful feats of strength performed by their prisoner. Their amazement is great and thinking to tame this new Samson the whole force jumps on him and gives him a terrible beating.

HECTOR, THE ANGEL CHILD.—Hector has always been a "mama's boy" and has managed to so deceive his parents that they think him a model youth and are constantly boring their friends with accounts of his perfections. It is "dear Hector's" birthday, as the scene opens, and having spent a pleasant day with his parents the latter bid him good-night and give him his candle to light himself to bed. Hardly has he left the room before they begin singing his praises to each other. To think, twenty-one years of age and as obedient and respectful to his parents as if he were a little boy! And so good and simple minded! Another youth at his age would want to spend his evenings at the theaters and going about town with other wild young men. But not so Hector. He spends his evenings at home reading some instructive book and then at eight-thirty sharp he takes his candle and goes off to bed. They are indeed fortunate to possess such an angel son.

Well, it is our sad duty to relate that Hector is not quite the angel child his parents think him. In fact Hector is a terrible hypocrite and has been fooling his parents for many a long day. We see him go up to his room and piling some of his wearing apparel under the bed clothes arranges the latter in such a way that it looks as if he were comfortably snuggled up in bed. He then hastens to get on his evening clothes and makes a hasty exit out of his window. When his parents enter his room on tiptoe about a half hour later, they stand over the bed almost afraid to breathe for fear of waking him and then going out close the door behind them and go happily to bed. We next see the angel one at a cafe, the gayest of the very gay party assembled there for a night of fun and pleasure. His highly respectable old uncle is also one of the party. Hector did not expect to meet the latter at this resort but concealing his surprise he just winks at the old gentleman and they understand each other perfectly. Judging from the next picture (time about 4 a. m.) the party must have been a howling success. The cafe is a wreck; the only guests still there are three disreputable looking men, with hats caved in and limp rumpled looking bodies, one of whom—the oldest—is endeavoring to fix himself comfortably in the very middle of the table. The waiters hearing all the racket put the three undesirable guests unceremoniously out into the street. They spy their cab still waiting (which is a wonder as the cabby growing tired of standing in the cold had joined the jolly party about two o'clock). A most amusing sight indeed is the sorry looking trio driving home. The angel child on the box; the cabby and highly respectable uncle lounging on the back seat. Well the end of it all is that the angel child's entire family get the shock of their life when they are summoned to his room by the terrified maid and find Uncle and Cabby sleeping soundly in their son's bed. The latter hearing someone coming conceals himself in the cupboard and to this day his parents still think him "An Angel Child."

THE INDIAN.—It is the afternoon of a hard day's drive, and we see two settlers ambuscaded, as best they can, behind their "prairie schooner," with their wives and children. Indians are circling about on ponies, gradually drawing closer to the little party and firing as they approach. The two settlers are assisted by Wahnatee, the redskin, who is friendly with the whites. A shot is fired and one of the children falls mortally wounded. Seeing this, Burton, one of the settlers, tells Wahnatee to take Mrs. Burton and his child to a distant hill and that he will cover their retreat. The Indian conducts the half-fainting woman and child to a place of safety, then returns to find both settlers dead. With the calm stolidity of his race's nature, Wahnatee bemoans the fate of the two massacred men, then returns to guard the woman and child entrusted to his care.

The dawn of the next day. The Indian bears the beat of horses' hoofs. He listens. Closer and closer come the riders, until at last he recognizes a band of cowboys. At once he wakes Mrs. Burton, then rushes in the direction of the cowboys and informs them of what has happened.

Now, among these cowpunchers are two men who play important roles in our story. One is termed "Black Bart" because of his ungovernable temper and ugly demeanor; the other is a big, good-natured individual named Jack; and both being enamored of Mrs. Burton, the feeling between them is not over-friendly.

The Indian has never forgotten the trust placed in him by his white brother Burton. He knows that Jack is honesty itself and that Black Bart is treacherous and brutal.

Well, one day in old Dutch Pete's saloon, Bart sees Wahnatee sitting by the stove. In his half-drunken mood he begins to taunt the Indian, but Wahnatee remains dignified and imperturbable. About this time Jack enters the saloon. Bart invites him to take a drink. Jack refuses. Words ensue into a quarrel, and as Jack strikes his enemy to the floor, the latter draws his gun and fires, wounding Jack. He then rushes from the saloon, closely followed by the Indian. We see a fierce combat on horseback. Both men are desperate and slash unmercifully at each other with their bowie knives. The fatal blow is struck and the white man lies dead at the feet of the other, whom he had taunted for weeks. Wahnatee tells Jack that his enemy lives no more, and then, with his usual dignity predominating, he slowly sinks to the floor, as his soul wanders onward and upward to the "happy hunting grounds."

PINE RIDGE FEUD.—In the far West there lived two families between whom there existed a feud of many years' duration. John Fully, in a drunken brawl, had killed one of the Hewby family, and from that time on no opportunity was lost until many relatives of both families were shot to death, and the only ones surviving of the Hewby family are old Hank, his son Karl, and his daughter Lucy. Now it happened that Luke Fully becomes violently enamored of pretty Lucy Hewby, and these two secretly plight their troth. They are discovered by Karl Hewby, Lucy's brother, who upbraids her for her disloyalty to her own kith and kin, and determines to kill Luke at the first opportunity. He haunts the paths of the mountain forests and finally discovers John Fully and Luke, who have just set out on a hunt. He follows them stealthily,

Buy the Best Machine First

The price of an Edison Kinetoscope is simply the price of the best motion picture machine. The price of a cheap machine is its own price plus the price of an Edison Kinetoscope, which you are certain to have to buy later.

A cheap machine costs more to operate, requires more repairs, constantly burning up your profits and wears out quickly.

gives the clearest, steadiest pictures, keeps the same crowd coming night after night and builds you up a substantial, profitable business.

Why throw away a big proportion of your profits on repairs? Why not have an Edison and get all the profit there is in it?

Our book, about the Edison Kinetoscope, gives full particulars, and will be sent you to-day if you'll ask for it—and also a copy of the Edison Kinetogram.

takes aim, fires, drops his foe to the ground and flees. Arriving home, he relates to his father the story of his dastardly work, in the presence of his sister, who calls them cowards, whereupon her father drives her into the house. She watches her opportunity to make her way to the Fully home, and arrives just as Luke is being carried into the house. Old Fully is much distressed over his son's condition. Lucy pleads to be allowed to remain there and care for him, and for the first time old Fully learns of the great love existing between his son and Lucy. Horror-stricken, the old man rushes from the house, swearing that he will wreak vengeance on those who attempted his boy's life.

Luke, knowing his father means what he says, sends Lucy with a letter, in which he begs him to spare the lives of Lucy's father and brother. The old man reads the letter, relents, and returns home.

Months have passed. Lucy and Luke are happily married, when one day her father, who has been driven from home by his dissolute son, arrives at the home of Hank Hewby and begs for shelter. Hank at first refuses, but through the pleading of Lucy, whom he has learned to love as a daughter, grasps his old enemy by the hand and thus ends forever the old-time feud.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine.)

SWITZERLAND; CONQUERING THE ALPS.—The scenes depicted are as follows: Engaging guides—Leaving Lauterbrunnen—Boarding the train for Scheidegg—The mountain railroad and surrounding scenery seen through a telescope—Ascent to the Guggi Hut—Partaking of refreshment—Watching a sunset—Amidst the terraces of the Guggi Glacier—Typical Dolomite rocks and treacherous "traverses" warily negotiated—Tremendous heights and sheer depths—Snow everywhere—Camping out on the plateau—Resuming the journey over awful chasms and pinnacles—Crossing glaciers, ice falls, avalanche, ice caves and scracs—Sublime panorama—Arrival at the summit.

THE RED SIGNAL.—The daughter of a signalman, assailed by a villain, is rescued by her sweetheart. The villain, with an accomplice, plans to wreck the midnight express train and rob the passengers. The plot is overheard by a waitress, who informs the heroine. Meantime, the train-wreckers have fixed an obstacle across the railroad tracks. The express is fast approaching, when the brave girl climbs the signal ladder, detaches the red lamp and waves it to stop the train. She succeeds, and thereby saves the lives of the passengers and crew, only just in the nick of time. Scene in the board room of the railway company—congratulations from the president and reward of the heroine.

THE PROFESSOR AND THE THOMAS CATS.—Professor Squills, after a hard day's work, retires to his bedroom and prepares for slumber. Hardly has he got into bed when he hears unearthly howls which make him start up and look out of the window. He sees a big Thomas cat on the roof of the adjoining house and immediately begins a bombardment with shoes and whatever he can lay hands on, but without budging the enemy of his slumber. Ah! the attic. He will get him from there. So he crawls up the ladder in his nightdress and stocking feet and picking up some loose bricks from the attic floor he opens the scuttle leading to the roof and again opens fire on his enemies. Meanwhile, the servant girl, feeling the draught, discovers the open scuttle, which she closes and locks from the inside.

The shivering professor is in a sad predicament, but he clambers down a water pipe and almost into the arms of a policeman, who is making love to the cook next door. There is a lively chase after poor Squills, who manages to evade his pursuers by hiding in a barrel. Using this as a protection, he reaches his home, where the pursuers discover that it is not a burglar after all, and the luckless professor is glad to get into bed.

A MERRY CHRISTMAS AND A HAPPY NEW YEAR.—Tom Constant, a hard working and underpaid bookkeeper in the employ of O. U. Mehan, a crusty and close-fisted old broker, is surprised to find on his desk the day before Christmas the following letter:

"Departing from my usual custom I present you with this Christmas token of my appreciation for your twenty-five years of faithful services. O. U. MEHAN."

With this was an oblong package. With surprise and expectation on their faces, the bookkeeper and the stenographer and the office boy hastened to undo the mysterious package, which consisted of a shoebox in which was a small chicken that had all the appearance of having died of starvation. However, Tom brings home the chicken and his wife and large family welcome it as an addition to their Christmas board.

On Christmas morning, as Tom and his family are getting ready for dinner, they are thrown into a state of consternation by a letter from his brother.

"Dear Tom—It has been fifteen years since I have heard from you. Found your address in directory. Am bringing my wife and daughter to take Christmas dinner with you.

"Your brother, BILL."

While they are discussing how they will manage to make the small chicken go around, Brother Bill and family enter, followed by a chef from the neighboring hotel bearing a huge tray laden with turkey and side dishes. Bill is a prosperous miner and, quick to see the signs of poverty, he presses upon his brother as a gift a generous roll of bills. He engages Tom at a handsome salary to go West with him and take up an important position at the mines, and next morning Tom fails for the first time in twenty-five years to be found at his desk by Mr. Mehan.

Ten o'clock comes and passes, and as Mr. Mehan rages, Tom saunters in, taking great satisfaction in discharging his employer. Brother Bill, in the background, enjoys the scene, and, making handsome presents to the surprised stenographer and office boy, they leave the greedy Mehan speechless with anger.

REUNITED BY SANTA CLAUS.—Ethel, the daughter of a wealthy banker, marries Harry Wright, a manly but poor clerk, and presents her wedding certificate to her father on Christmas Eve as her Christmas present to him. The father, enraged at her having married without his consent, drives the couple from his house, notwithstanding his son's intercession in behalf of the young couple. Eight years elapse—Harry and Ethel have not prospered, but have struggled along uncomplainingly. Ethel, used to every luxury and attention, has suffered in health and Harry's meager earnings have been strained by doctor's bills and necessary medicines. Their little daughter Gertrude sees a large doll in a store window Christmas Eve and gets her mother to write for her a letter to Santa Claus asking him to bring her the large doll she saw and Gertrude takes the letter to put into Santa Claus' letter box placed in front of the store. The young mother tells Harry what their little girl expects and makes him take her wedding ring and pawn it to get necessary funds to make a real Christmas for little Gertrude. Gertrude mails her letter, from exposure and tired with her long tramp, she falls exhausted and goes to sleep in front of the window and dreams that Santa Claus presents her with the big doll in the window which comes to life. Her dream is interrupted by Helen Rich, who is also on a mission to mail a letter to Santa Claus, accompanied by her maid. Helen, against the maid's objection, takes Gertrude to her home where the grandfather of both little girls, questioning Gertrude as to her name and parents' names, recognizes her as his daughter's child. He sends his son to bring his long absent daughter and her husband home. Harry at first refuses to go when Frank appears with his father's message, but is induced to do so for the sake of his wife and child. Arriving at the banker's home, Harry will not enter unless the father who drove him from his door welcomes him into it. As Ethel enters and is greeted by her father Gertrude asks for papa. Frank explains why Harry refuses to enter the house. The old and repentant banker, humbling his pride and urged on by little Gertrude, goes to the door with her, asks Harry's forgiveness and welcomes him to his home. So were an estranged family "Reunited by Santa Claus."

THE TWO SONS, a Pathetic War Drama.—The little French family consists of only mother and two sons. The Franco-Prussian War is on, and one son enlists for his country, while the other stays at home—a coward. In the course of service the soldier son is sent with a message on a dangerous journey through the enemy's lines, is espied, and in a running fight is badly wounded. He manages to get to his home, however, and before the pursuers arrive gives the message to his brave mother, who secretes it under the bonnet she wears. The German soldiers now come storming in, but death cheats them of their prey. They search the corpse, but find nothing. Foiled and chagrined, they seize the other son who is now cowering in fear and march him out, struggling. In order to save his neck he tells the enemy where the dispatch his dead brother bore is hidden and soon we see it torn from the person of his mother. The coward further agrees to deliver a false dispatch, a decoy to the French generals; his captors agree and he is soon on his dastardly errand. But his patriotic mother learns of what is under way and reaches the French camp just in time to frustrate the deed, even though it means that she sacrifice the son. He is sentenced to be shot at sunrise, and she heroically stands by him encouraging him to do bravely the last act of his existence—to die.

THE LOVE OF A SAVAGE.—The synopsis of this picture will show that it is one of interest. Scenic particulars, acting and photographic detail have been given especial attention. White Elk, a Sioux brave, visits a friendly tribe, and when landing at the river bank sees a young squaw, Arrow Head, for whom he immediately conceives an infatuation. He helps her fill a jug, which she carries away with her, while he stands looking after her in rapt admiration. Her lover, Spotted Tail, greets her upon her return, but when White Elk enters and constantly glances tenderly toward Arrow Head Spotted Tail shows anger. The Sioux brave gives the squaw a necklace, which Spotted Tail takes from her neck and stamps on when his rival departs. He follows White Elk and is about to stab him when a shot is fired by Arrow Head, who has followed both. At this White Elk turns and struggles with Spotted Tail. The Sioux brave succeeds in forcing down the arm of his victim until the knife enters his breast, and then he and Arrow Head go away. With his last breath Spotted Tail calls his friends to him and tells of events. They swear to be revenged and trace White Elk. Next follows a canoe chase in which White Elk wins out, but an arrow hits him and he is captured. They torture him to reveal where Arrow Head is, but to no avail. They tie him to stakes in the water and leave him to death when the tide rises, but Arrow Head comes to his rescue and with him in a canoe paddles away.

TEMPTATIONS OF THE GOLD FIELDS.—William and Robert are two friends engaged in seeking gold and live in two small one-room huts. Although William is much older than Robert, the two have become very great friends through the daily life they both lead in digging for gold; especially the elder has a fatherly affection for his friend. One evening, after a hard day's work, both return to their huts to rest. William, who it seems is more fortunate in striking gold than Robert, places his valuable find which he has made during the day on the table. After a short talk they say good-night and part, each going to his own hut. The great luck of his friend William worries Robert, who himself has been rather unfortunate of late. Before retiring he pauses in the doorway and notices a company of natives coming along the road. He stops to watch them and sees among them Minca, a very pretty half-breed Indian girl. He has always been more or less fascinated by her and this evening the dark eyes have a mysterious influence over him and he steps out to talk to her. She will not leave her friends, but promises to see him later. While impatiently waiting and thinking she will not keep her appointment, there is a knock at the door and Minica appears. He offers her refreshments and after they have talked a few minutes she induces him to show her the gold he has found and stored away. Robert walks over to the wall and takes out a few stones, but in which he has hidden three small bags full of the precious metal. When she sees the small amount she laughs and tells him that it is a mere trifle and if it is his intention to make her his wife he must possess more gold. She gives him a hint that it would be easier for him to get this gold if he would remember that his old friend William in the next hut must have saved up a good amount. With all the ability of a woman who knows the power of fascinating ways she tempts him to make up his mind to betray his best friend for her sake. The next day the two friends are working together and the older one notices that Robert is not quite the same as usual and as he is a man of considerable experience and knowledge of human nature he has no difficulty in guessing the reason and makes up his mind to be on the lookout. Robert, after using pick and shovel for some time with the usual bad luck, suddenly throws his implements down and runs back to his hut. He is fighting hard against the temptation which the woman's words had put into him, but his desire to make her his wife kills every reasonable thought and he goes to her for encouragement for the deed which he intends to carry out that night. But Minca, who wants his gold only and not him, sneaks secretly to his hut after he is gone and removing the stones in the wall where he keeps his treasure she quickly takes it out, but in her haste she finds it difficult to replace the stones and is not able to leave them as she found them. William has in the meantime made a dummy out of blankets and has put it in his bed, he himself hiding in a corner of the room to watch what Robert will do. Quietly Robert comes in with a knife in his hand, trembling and pale, steps over to the side of the bed, but at the last moment his good nature gets the better end. Without lifting the knife to strike he runs out of the hut in great despair and returns to his own quarters, but sees Minca, who at once guesses that her plan has failed and in her temper she accuses him of being a coward. This makes Robert most furious, and he lifts his weapon to strike her when he notices the displaced stone in the wall. He pauses for a moment and realizing suddenly the truth that the woman only wanted his gold and that she had robbed him of the little bit he already had he rushes at her, but she, expecting his revenge, throws the bags of gold away, and flees from the hut. As she disappears William makes his appearance and he knowing the temptation of gold forgives his friend and he knows now that he can trust Robert with his life.

"had man," and a renegade Mexican to steal the money. While in the act of removing the money from the fireplace, where it was hidden, they are interrupted by the entrance of Helen, who is seized and carried off by Hatfield and the Mexican. Just as Silverton is about to escape with the money, Favetta enters and drives him out at the point of a gun. For revenge, he decides to hold Helen for a ransom and, with the aid of Hatfield and the Mexican, he takes her to a shack in the mountains. Dan Clayton, their uncle, and Favetta's lover, Jack Thorne, start in pursuit and gain entrance to the shack in the absence of the gang, who return while the rescue party is searching the premises. Approaching Jack from behind, they knock him senseless, escape with Helen and then blow up the shack. Dan Clayton, Jack and Favetta barely escape from the ruins with their lives and, learning that the gang have taken Helen to Mexico, they decide to follow, but refuse to allow Favetta to go with them. She resolves to follow them and disguises herself as a Mexican boy that she may continue to assist them in their search for her sister. The picture closes with a thrilling rescue scene and the death of Silverton at the hands of his own gang.

COMING! COMING! COMING!

Ever since the courts upheld the Independent case and administered a judicial spanking to the Patents Company a couple of weeks ago, new exhibitors have been coming into the Independent fold. Every mail every day has been filled with queries as to prices and service on Independent goods. It's great! It's thrilling! It's a vindication of all the arguments I have been pounding into you for weeks and months. This court decision coupled with the amazing improvement in Independent film has settled the doubts of many a Doubting Tommy. As against this, please contrast the rotten secret of the licensed exchanges who penalize you ten per cent for switching your business! Exhibitors everywhere are up in arms against this ten per cent game and they don't hesitate to thank me for exposing the innermost inners of the trust proposition. How do you feel about it? Have I helped you understand the film situation better? Are you glad I am turning on the searchlight, or would you rather have me keep mum and let you remain ignorant of the bitter dose the trust is trying to make you swallow?

THE BEST JUDGES

Declare that our PREMIER FILM SERVICE is expressive of the desires of Particular Moving Picture Theatres.

By "The Best Judges" we mean Exhibitors that seek and install the Film Service of the Highest Class.

We have added many of the most prominent and highest class theatres to our list of customers.

There are critics whose approval is gotten by cornering it.

There's a Reason—Better find out and become the man who knows.

WHY—The Motiograph is the Best Motion Picture Machine

Because the Pictures are More Brilliant. The special patented Shutter is so arranged that it saves a lot of illumination otherwise lost.
Because Flicker is eliminated by the new patented Shutter.
Because the Pictures are Rock Steady when using a good film, and are restful to the eyes of your patrons. The result is because of accurate workmanship and excellence of design.
Because it has patented quick Rewind (one and one-half minutes) connected to main crank handle. No other similar.
Because it has the only perfect Fire-proof Shutter, automatic and absolutely reliable.
Because it has Enclosed Spiral Gears. They work smooth and wear longer.
Because it has a Perfect Take Up. Easy on the film and always reliable.
Because it has inclosed Framing Device. Wears longer, is quickly removed and patented.
Because it has "Wide Open" Lamp House, convenient for changing carbons, adjustment, etc.
Because it is absolutely Fireproof.
Because it has Double the Wearing Qualities possessed by other Machines.
Because it is almost Noiseless; runs more quiet than any other.
Because it has Heavy Pedestal Base, adjustable and patented.
Because it has more than 40 other points of special merit. Boston, New York, Chicago and San Francisco approved.

SEE WHAT USERS SAY:

ON MARCH 28TH, F. L. F., CHICAGO, ILL., SAYS:
"I purchased my Motiograph Machine latter part of August, and have not spent one penny for repairs since. To say that I am pleased can hardly express it."
D. F. E., DENVER, COLO., FEBRUARY 1ST, SAYS:
"I have not sold a Motiograph to anyone who is not delighted with it."
O. T., GREAT FALLS, MONT., JUNE 7TH, SAYS:
"It's running fine, and we get the picture and the 'Biz.' We cannot say enough for the Stereo Motiograph. A snap for any operator."
M. F. F., OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., MAY 18TH, SAYS:
"The Motiograph is the talk of the town."
E. T. S. CO., PHILADELPHIA, PA., JUNE 2ND, SAYS:
"Machine at the Grand Opera House is a dandy, and is daily making Motiograph converts."
P. & K., ST. ANTHONY, IDAHO, APRIL 16TH, SAYS:
"The Motiograph projects the best picture in the country. We show a much better picture than our competitors."

"THE AWAKENING OF BESS"

(Released Monday, December 27th)

It's a love story, not mushy but powerful and convincing. This kind of picture helps build up a reputation for your theatre, not only with the matinee crowds but the evening ones as well. Your competitor using trust films will have a sinking sensation in the pit of his stomach when he sees this film, because he will realize, as never before, that the marvelous improvement in Independent films sounds the doom of the crowd he is supporting with his trade. Now then, if you really want "Imp" films, WRITE TO YOUR EXCHANGE UNTIL YOU GET THEM. Lots of exchanges are not buying new stuff. If yours is not, you are entitled to know it. Any reputable Independent film manufacturer will give you the information on request. The film exchanges that ARE buying new films every week are the only ones entitled to YOUR consideration. We'll be only too glad to tell you who they are. Don't buy a pig in a poke.

HALLBERG Automatic Electric Economizer

If you want to squander money in exorbitant electric current bills, and if you are satisfied with your old and hot rheostat, and the poor, flickering light from so-called current savers. But if you are on the job for all there is in it,

TALK TO ME

Have you a HALLBERG?

IF NOT—WHY NOT?

I guarantee to save 2-3 on your electric bill and to give the best light possible, or refund your money. Over 1,200 exhibitors are now using the HALLBERG, and I am replacing so-called current savers every day.

THE REASON:—I save more and give a better light and, besides, the HALLBERG does not need a hand operated switch—it requires no attention after once installed, as it is automatic and lasts a lifetime.

I have other equally important and necessary specialties for you, including —THE MOTIOGRAPH Flickerless MOVING PICTURE MACHINE, ELECTRA PINK LABEL CARBONS, HALLBERG SPOT LIGHTS, EXHAUST FANS—4000 C.P. FLAMING ARC LAMPS, and all kinds of high grade supplies and Announcement slides. WRITE FOR FREE CATALOGUE No. 12 W. It tells you all about my excellent products. I also have a lot of current savers of several makes, as good as new at bargain prices, replaced by the "HALLBERG."

Kinemacolor.

Supplementing our advance criticism of the results produced by this process, which we published in last week's MOVING PICTURE WORLD, we print in this number a report of the meeting at which the demonstration was given wherein we endeavor to convey to the reader at a distance some idea of the reception the Urban-Smith pictures had at the hands of the New York public. Moreover, as interest in the subject is very large, we also print in this number an article by Burton H. Allbee, giving the impressions of a layman on the process. Also, in order that the reader may acquaint himself, as far as practicable, with the theory and practice of the Kinemacolor process, we annotate the important paper by the inventor, G. Albert Smith, F.R.A.S., which he read in London about a year ago. This and the previous issues of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD will, therefore, give the reader a very full and clear idea of what Kinemacolor is and how the results are produced, and its probable future influence on the moving picture industry.

A Time Schedule for Exhibitors.

"Punctuality is the true test of business" and "procrastination is the thief of time." These two little bits of wisdom we desire specially to commend to managers of moving picture houses, most of whom are in need of all the business maxims and methods of applying them that can be handed to them. For at this stage of the industry, we cannot truthfully say that it is generally conducted on the best business lines.

We should hear probably less about the difficulty of handling the public who patronize these performances if the public were more systematically dealt with. In the continuous show houses it is quite common for one to enter at the middle of a performance and have to sit out half of the one following in order to get one's money's worth. Then, again, managers find it necessary to resort to the exhibition of "chasers" in order to get the people out. It amounts to this, that by the continuous performance system you get people in at the wrong time and you get them out at the wrong time. There is a constant ebb and flow of people in the theater which has a disturbing effect on the performance.

It has been suggested to us that a very simple means might be adopted for obviating, or at least minimizing this trouble. It is, for the manager of a theater to place outside his house, in a prominent position, a board or sign indicating when the next performance takes place. Thus a house which opens at 11 o'clock in the morning and continues until the same time in the evening, might have a permanent board with the words "Next Performance" on it, and then in a suitable place the hours, 11:45, 12:30, 1:15, etc., right throughout the day.

Whether this suggestion is either particularly or generally practicable, we are hardly prepared to say, but at any rate we think it worth while mentioning here in order to assist exhibitors to manage their houses on systematic lines rather than on the go-as-you-please plan which prevails, especially, in the smaller places.

The American idea generally favors the continuous performance. In other countries entertainments are conducted on the two houses a night principle or on the so many performances a day with, generally speaking, good results. The suggestion which we are here making, and which has been made to us, might be worth the consideration of up-to-date moving picture exhibitors anxious to show the public that they are studying their best interests.

The Moving Picture in Toyland.

"Straws show which way the wind blows," and "the boy is father to the man." The reader will not at first sight perceive any connection between these two bits of aphoristic philosophy, but if we say that the Christmas season is with us a glimmering of our meaning may be apparent. Christmas, with its long established habit of exchanging gifts, once more claims attention and the small child is to be catered for. He has been catered for by the toy makers this year in a manner which shows that they have intelligently appreciated the crowning sensation of the year in the juvenile mind. That sensation is the moving picture, and the straws to which we referred to in our first sentence are moving picture toys, which are figuring in the stores. The deduction from the second part of our first sentence is this, that what the child is interested in, the man will be interested in also. Moving picture toys, therefore, are popular at this season of the year, and the toys take many shapes. There is the lantern with the strip of colored positive, there is the small camera for taking them and, we believe, there is the toy moving picture theater. Other toys of a small kind are probably out, but these are only a few that occurred to our mind as having been put on this Christmas market which, by the way, is also being fed by miniature monoplanes, bi-planes and the like.

The demand for moving picture toys by the small members of the community at this season of the year, carries another lesson, namely, the enormous popularity of the moving picture in all sections of the community. Here we are tempted to remark that the field of the moving picture toy, irrespective of the season, is only imperfectly covered. Twelve or fourteen years ago when moving pictures became popular with the public at large, many interesting toys were placed on the market. There was the moving picture in book form, in the revolving cylinder form, and it also took other shapes. It amounted to this, that one could sit at the table and examine a series of rapidly moving, slightly dissimilar photographs of a moving object—moreover, photographs were not necessary, you could have cuts and get all the effect of persistence of vision, such as one gets in a moving picture theater to-day. Enormous numbers of these interesting toys were sold in Europe and probably in the United States, and they certainly served to arouse interest in the subject when then only appealed to thousands, while to-day it appeals to millions.

The object of this article, while drawing to the popularity of the moving picture in toy form, is to direct the attention of enterprising manufacturers to the fact that there are many useful, cheap and profitable ideas in this direction lying dormant. These books and toys were made and put on the marekt in their old form twelve or fourteen years ago, and we believe there would be an enormous sale for them to-day. In future numbers of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD we shall direct closer attention to this matter.

More Signs of the Times.

A theatrical friend of ours the other day, discussing the general entertainment situation, sadly informed us that in the previous week no less than twenty-nine well-known theatrical shows travelling the country had closed down and come into New York City. Business is bad generally throughout the theatrical world. Mr. Belasco says so, Mr. Oscar Hammerstein, of the Manhattan Opera House, says that opera is not paying and of course everybody knows that the Metropolitan Opera House is always run at a loss. So far in New York City and, we believe, in other parts of the country, the theatrical season has been the most disastrous for many years. We shall not inquire into the reason for this, for it is not our business. We are simply content at the present moment to take note of the fact in conjunction with another.

That other fact is this: A few days ago a well-known, downtown marionette theater closed its doors to marionettes forever and went over to the moving pictures. It seems that this marionette house had been struggling for a long time against the rising tide of all pervading motion picturedom and only succumbed when it was seen that even amongst our Italian neighbors there is no longer a public for the marionette in competition with the moving picture.

Marionette shows were always popular in Italy and other Latin countries. We have seen and enjoyed them in Great Britain, but the entertainment was one which we believe appealed peculiarly to the Southern temperament—a temperament very, very conservative in its love of amusement, and therefore when we see a marionette show going by the board, we are tempted to think things. One of them is this, that when the mere shadow on the moving picture screen is powerful enough to displace from the Italian mind the love for the marionette show then must there be something very powerful indeed, very convincing—something that makes a universal appeal to the Italian mind to account for such a change—in the picture.

There is no getting away from the fact that the moving picture is advancing daily in public favor. It has a larger audience any one night in the year than the ordinary stage play and the opera. It is ousting prejudice, conservatism, ignorance, opposition and stupidity in its onward progress towards the goal which is so nearly in sight, namely, that of being the most popular and profitable, useful, instructive, entertainment factor in the world. It is not only displacing the marionette and driving it off the stage, it is also driving off real flesh and blood, men and women, or such of them as the public, in its increasing knowledge and acumen, will no longer tolerate on the stage.

The Kinemacolor Demonstration.

The concert room of the Madison Square Garden, New York City, on Saturday evening, December 11, was filled with a very large number of people who had come to see moving pictures in natural colors, by the Urban-Smith process, of which we made mention last week. The audience must have numbered somewhere around about a thousand, if not more. Every available seat on the floor of the hall was occupied and the boxes were also filled. To give a list of those present would be equivalent to mentioning all the prominent film manufacturers, film renters, exhibitors, employees of the various film works, newspaper men, art critics, photographers, society people and others, who had been brought to the meeting by a very widely distributed list of invitations. People came from far and wide to the demonstration, and there were many ladies present. It may be safely said that the entire moving picture trade of the United States was represented at the meeting, which, numerically, scientifically, commercially and otherwise, must be set down as a great success. In point of attendance it was probably the largest meeting interested in the subject of film photography which has been brought together in this country.

There was no denying the widespread interest aroused by Messrs. Urban and Smith's invitation to the demonstration of the fact that moving pictures in natural colors had been made practicable. Indeed, we are convinced that if more publicity had been given to the matter it would not have been at all difficult to fill Carnegie Hall with an audience. As it was, however, the Madison Square meeting quite met the requirements of Mr. Charles Urban in the matter. He came to this country from London, where the process of Kinemacolor is tolerably well known, in order to give the American moving picture public the opportunity of judging whether he had or had not succeeded in the claims that had been made on behalf of his process in London these last two years.

There was a more personal aspect of the matter. It seems to have been allowed that, and indeed the assurance was given us, the demonstration was arranged partly for the purpose of convincing THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD that these results could be obtained. It was said so by word of mouth, it was said so by writing, and said so in print. It is needless to say that we highly appreciate the compliment paid us by the party of friends, especially journeying all the way from London in order to give us this opportunity, and we must consequently take credit to ourselves for having been the more or less direct means of bringing about this unique demonstration. Indeed, we go so far as to suggest that the thanks of the moving picture public are due to us for having provided them with the display.

It is evident, however, that our writings on the subject have not been so carefully read as they might have been, or it would have been seen that we have never doubted the bona fides of Mr. Urban and Mr. Smith in this matter. We certainly have been critical, but never skeptical. We never said the results had not been produced, but we certainly have expressed decided opinions as to the practicability of the process in ordinary hands. Smith and Urban, we know, are experts in the moving picture game, and we are not at all surprised at what they have done. All our doubts had reference to the suitability of the process for the man in the street or the person of average capacity in moving picture making. In other words, we want to see the process made a factory process.

That our attitude throughout this matter has been justified is established by the fact that our friends Urban and Smith have returned to England with the avowed object of reducing this very beautiful system down to an actual everyday workable process. The value of a thing of this kind must ultimately be judged by the fact that not merely one or two persons can produce good results by it, but that it should be sufficiently plastic to be amenable to general treatment. In other words, Kinemacolor must be brought within general use and application, which it certainly is not at present. It is magnificent, but it is not generally practical. Still, we live in hopes that it soon will be. Indeed, our faith in Mr. Urban, Mr. Smith and their associates is so great that we look forward to the early time when Kinemacolor will be a standard process in every moving picture factory throughout the world. That is our hope and our wish.

Meanwhile, our object in this account is to give the reader some idea of how the process seemed to strike the large body of people who sat and watched the pictures on the screen last Saturday night. And here we will say that the demonstration was effectively staged and managed. Mr. G. Albert Smith made a clear and able exponent of the merits of his process, whilst the projection lantern in the gallery threw an excellent picture on the screen. In fact, the entire demonstration, both in its inception and its execution, reflects the very highest credit on Mr. Charles Urban and those associated with him. It was satisfying, satisfactory, and must have satisfied all connected with it, as it obviously satisfied the public.

The program was selected from the following series of subjects:

1. Our Floral Friends (10 Studies). Smith.
2. Natural Colour Portraiture (12 Studies). Smith (7), Mackenzie (5).
   Dealing with details of costumes and flesh tints.
3. The S.S. "George Washington" leaving Southampton for New York. Mackenzie.
4. Scenes on the Riviera, South Coast of France, including Views of Cannes, Nice and Monte Carlo. Mackenzie.
5. Carnival and Battle of Flowers, Nice. Mackenzie.
6. Waves and Spray, Waterfall and Mountains (French Alps). Mackenzie.
7. The New Sultan of Turkey going to the Semelik, Constantinople. Smith.
8. Life on the River Thames from the Tower of London to Henley. Mackenzie.
9. "Our Farmyard Friends." Luncheon on Straw, Among the Sheep, Feeding a Lamb, Donkey and Carrot, the Parrot, Mesmerized Rooster, Rabbits, Cattle, Horses, Cat at Toilet, Kitten and Parrot, etc. Smith.
10. British Races and Military. The King's Derby, Royal Ascot, The Soldier's Pet, Band of the Cameron Highlanders, Sentry at Aldershot, March of Gordon Highlanders, etc. Smith (4), Mackenzie (2).
11. Their Majesties, the King and Queen of England, driving through London. Smith.
12. Scenes on Galata Bridge, Constantinople. Smith.
13. Motor Boat and Yacht Racing, England. Smith.
14. German Uhlans and Infantry, Berlin. Mackenzie.
15. West Point Cadets. Mackenzie.
16. Views of Potomac Falls (note rainbow) and the Home of George Washington, Mt. Vernon. Mackenzie.
17. The Harvest—Ploughing, Reaping, Loading Crops, off to the Barn, Threshing, Relaxation after Labour. Smith.
18. Review of the British Navy, at Spithead, England. Urban.
19. London Zoological Gardens, showing Pavilion and Flower Vase, Camels, Polar Bears, Buffalo, Tigers, Swans, Hippopotami, Zebra, Brown Bear, Leopards, Flamingoes, Elephants, Giraffes, Macaws, etc. Mackenzie.
20. "Old Glory," showing 2,000 children forming the Stars and Stripes on the steps of Albany Capitol during the Hudson-Fulton Celebration. Mackenzie.

In parenthesis the names of the actual photographers of these subjects are given, by which it will be seen that Mr. Smith and Mr. Mackenzie divided the honors, whilst Mr. Urban himself is also credited with a color picture. This, then, allows of publicity to be given to the fact that somebody else besides the inventor of the process can produce results by it.

The audience certainly seemed to highly appreciate the beauty of the pictures shown, being specially applausive of the scenes illustrative of an English harvest, the London Zoological Gardens and the rainbow effect in the views of the Potomac Falls. These subjects gave the Madison Square audience an idea of the process as we described it last week, namely, its use and capabilities of reproducing an almost unlimited range of color effects and color combinations. In other words, the program was especially diversified so as to bring out this point.

"This, then," to quote Mr. Elbert Hubbard, is Kinemacolor. It has been successfully demonstrated to the American moving picture public; and Mr. Urban and Mr. Smith, we believe, have returned to England, thoroughly well pleased with the reception of the process, and incidentally of having satisfied somebody who never doubted their abilities to do what they claimed to do. So far, so good. It only remains for us now to await further developments of Kinemacolor in the United States, which will be governed very largely by the course of events commercially and otherwise. Mr. Urban, we understand, has not yet decided in his own mind as to how the process is to be marketed here.

Kinemacolor.

The Theory and Practice of the Process Briefly Described by the Inventor, G. Albert Smith, F.R.A.S.

(Annotated from Moving Picture World of January 2, 1909.)

Animated photography is snap-shot photography, without much interval between the shots. To do the work you provide yourself with a special camera and a roll of sensitive film, which latter may be of any length from say, 50 to 500 feet, and on this film you take snap-shots at the rate of 16 per second. A handle on the camera actuates machinery which carries the film forward. You turn the handle at a speed which causes the film to pass behind the lens at the rate of one foot of film for every second of time, whilst a revolving shutter with an opening in it permits 16 images to the foot to fall in rotation upon the travelling sensitive surface. It is important to note that the sensitive film is not travelling past the lens continuously; the machinery causes it to stand still momentarily while the actual snap-shot is being taken, and whilst the film is being whisked forward preparatory to another snap-shot being recorded, the revolving black shutter intervenes to protect the moving film from light. Thus the film jumps forward sixteen times every second and stands still sixteen times every second. When all the film has run through the camera, or when you think enough of the scene has been recorded, the film is developed like any other negative. When dry, a contact print is made on another piece of transparent film of corresponding length, and when that print is finally developed and dried it is ready to exhibit to an audience. It is run through a machine fitted with a lens and provided with a good light, in such a manner that the snap-shots are projected just as lantern slides are shown, only that they change at the rate of 16 per second. A black shutter here again revolves and obliterates the light every time a picture changes. The sheet is, therefore, being bombarded with a stream of snap-shots at such a rapid rate that before one snap-shot has had time to fade from the observer's retina another one is in view, and as each view is a record slightly different from its predecessors, the illusion of movement is conveyed. The part played by persistence of vision in this process is important, because we shall meet with that phenomenon again presently.

It is admitted that "animated photographs" are of great interest and educational importance, enabling us, as they do, to participate at our ease in scenes and happenings which we can never witness without their aid. But now that the extreme novelty and wonder of the thing have lost their first spell over our minds, how frequently the thought occurs that if only color could be added a much more realistic impression of the situation would be conveyed.

HOW IS IT TO BE DONE?

But how is it to be done? What methods are open to us? Science tells us, with proofs that cannot be disputed, that there is no such thing as color in an objective sense; color is a sensation—a something supplied by our own minds—a subjective phenomenon entirely. A red object is conveying to our eyes a series of physical impulses numbering some millions per second; a violet object is sending impulses at nearly double the rate; other colors are sending impulses at different rates per second; and the brain translates these different impulses into sensations which we term color. Colors, then, in all their innumerable shades and gradations, are actually impulses, shocks, or waves of varying intensity and proportion, each impulse or shock having its own characteristic velocity by which we recognize it and assign it its value.

The only field of operations presented to our view (assuming that we have secured a photographic medium sensitive to all colors of the spectrum) is the three-color theory promulgated by Thomas Young early in the last century, and since adopted in every process of color photography with which I am acquainted. This theory refers all human color sensations to three primary ones—red, green, and violet. It suggests that we have a sort of triple seeing-mechanism capable of exciting sensations in the mind when stimulated by light-waves, and that all the color sensations we experience are caused by the stimulation and activity of these triple avenues in varying proportions.

Briefly, the theory indicates that, applied to photography, we are to take a photograph through red glass, which, by cutting out all other rays, permits us to secure a record of all that is red in the view and of all that relates to red; we are to take another through a green glass and so obtain a record of green and of all that relates to green, and of nothing else; finally, we are to take a third photograph through a violet glass and secure a record of all that is violet and of all that relates to violet. When these three photographs are ultimately viewed in the colored light that belongs to each, and they are somehow superimposed so that we view them all at once, each picture will contribute the requisite proportion of color recorded in it and the reconstruction of the colored scene will be complete.

The simplest illustration of the principle is perhaps the triple lantern, when the top lantern may shed a light through red glass on the sheet, the middle lantern may throw light through green glass, and the bottom lantern supply a beam of violet light. These three beams of colored light superimposed upon the sheet will form white light. Then if the photographs, taken as described, and made into lantern slides, are inserted in their appropriate lanterns, and correctly focussed and superimposed on the sheet, the proportions of colored light passed through the three slides suffice to reproduce to our eyes the proportions of color in the original scene.

The most startling example of the three-color theory is admittedly afforded by the recently-introduced and plate itself, so that one exposure secures the photograph wonderful Autochrome plate, in which, by the marvellous skill of the brothers Lumiere, the required color filters are embodied as microscopic particles in the photographic in three-color value, and, when finished, a light at the back of the plate enables us to see the three colors in proper proportion. The multitude of microscopic filters (red, green, and violet) embodied in the plate abolish all the intermediate steps necessary before the introduction of the plate, and at the same time afford the most brilliant example of the application of the three-color principle.

The three-color principle having been proved by numerous lines of demonstration to be a sound working theory, it would naturally suggest itself as being applicable to animated pictures.

THE INVENTOR AT WORK.

Some years back (1902), I was invited by Mr. Charles Urban to assist in a thorough trial which he was making, regardless of reasonable expense, of a three-color process applied to the cinematograph. At that date very little was known about the possibilities of sensitizing film to red and green, and, to that extent, we were handicapped, although we had very expert assistance. Nevertheless, in good sunlight we did succeed in taking a few negatives in which the three colors were duly recorded. It was when we came to superimpose the pictures on the sheet through the three colored glasses that we found the process unworkable. As soon as the handle of the projecting machine was worked the three pictures refused to remain in register, and no knowledge that any of us could bring to bear upon the matter could even begin to cure the trouble. I do not know whether any other workers, if there are any, succeeded where we failed; but, if they did succeed, the public have never, so far as I am aware, been permitted to see the results. The difficulty is mainly due to the fact that cinematograph pictures are small to begin with (about the size of a postage stamp), and they have to be enormously magnified in exhibiting, as you all know. The slightest defect in registration is pitilessly magnified, and when the minute defects of registration in the first three pictures are followed by minute defects of another sort in the next three, and by yet another sort in the succeeding three, and so on throughout the length of a film, the effect on the observer is almost unbearable.

During the last four years I have renewed the inquiry, to the exclusion of almost all other work, with the enthusiastic support and ever buoyant encouragement of Mr. Charles Urban. I have concentrated attention specifically upon four points:—1. Sensitizing the film to all color waves, specially pressing the sensitiveness as far into the red end of the spectrum as possible. 2. Superimposing the color records by persistence of vision. 3. Compressing the color records into a less number than three, so as to give the least possible interval of time between successive presentations. 4. To conform to the condition that any scheme must be easily applicable to the existing cinematograph machinery, and that the standard film with standard perforations must be used, so that any successful results might be readily adopted by every cinematograph user without much trouble or expense.

The first of these lines of inquiry (sensitizing) has been already referred to; it simply consisted of repeated trials and experiments day by day for a year or more until the required conditions for sensitizing emulsions for cinematograph work were better understood. The third line of inquiry, that of reducing the number of pictures in which the color waves could be recorded in a monochromatic scale from three records to two, also resolved itself into a matter of repeated trial. For, in addition to deciding upon the particular shades of grey deposit which should be adopted as the equivalent of particular colors, the variations of different emulsions in yielding these greys had to be taken into account. The final deduction from the experiments under the third heading was that, proceeding from the red end of the spectrum, all rays from dark red to blue could be recorded in proportions which our eyes accept as sufficiently truthful through two filters only.

If we ask individuals to set down the principal colors of nature, placing them in order of luminosity or brightness to the eye, the average of the lists will be as follows: White, yellow, orange, red, green, blue, violet, indigo, black.

Now reference has previously been made to the unfortunate fact, that photographic plates or emulsions do not see as we do; thus, to the plate, blue and violet come at the top of the scale next to white, and not at the bottom end, as they do in the luminosity scale. I find that it is possible with two carefully-adjusted filters to pass to the sensitized plate or film colors in proportions parallel to the above order. Through one filter I pass white and yellow, then on through orange and scarlet to the darkest red I can sensitize for. Through the other filter I pass white and yellow again, as these two are at the head in luminosity and require fullest representation; then on through green, blue-green, blue and violet in the proportions suggested by the above luminosity list. The aim is to secure, by a careful adaptation of filters to emulsion, a record of color luminosity stated in gradations of tone from white to black through a scale of greys, this scale being fully represented in two successive pictures.

I take the pictures with an Urban bioscope camera fitted with the required filters to come into action alternately. One film only is used, of the usual standard size, and I take the pictures at the rate of not less than 16 per second through each filter, or 32 pictures per second in all.

When the negative record has been duly developed, and a positive transparency made from it, this positive transparency represents, by its gradations of tone from white to black in each successive pair of pictures, not only a record in form and shape, but it also acts as a filter or sifter of light; for when it is passed in the path of rays of colored light it will screen or filter them so as to reconstruct for our eyes the various proportions of color luminosity which were present in the scene when the record was made.

In an interview we had this week with T. P. O'Connor, M. P., the well-known Home Rule champion and British newspaper editor, who has just concluded an important political mission to the United States, he expressed himself as much struck by the wonderful popularity of the moving picture in this country, and promised on his return to England to interest himself in the matter, journalistically and otherwise.

Competition on the lines of quality is the only sound basis for the success of any line of industry, and quality in moving picture making can only be attained by men who are trained in the various branches of the art. A few of the new Independent manufacturers realize this and have done their best to engage experienced men.

Some of these newcomers are frank in saying that their success counts much on being able to hire away the most expert help that older concerns have trained. On the ethics of this kind of competition we have our own opinion. If "all is fair in love and war" it must be also so in business, but experience will prove that an ensemble of workmen who have not been trained together will not command success until after years of common experience.

IMPRESSIONS OF KINEMACOLOR FILMS.

By Burton H. Allbee.

Whatever the trade may say it is to the layman, the people, those who go to the motion picture theaters, that pictures must appeal if they repay the inventor first, and the manufacturer next, for the effort exerted and the money expended in the development of a new process and the manufacture of the films after the process is perfected. Or, to put it another way, the pictures when finally shown on the screen must please the people or this is all useless. It may be, therefore, that the impressions of a layman will not be out of place in helping the trade to form an opinion of the merits of this revolutionary process and its value as an attraction in the theaters before an every-day audience.

Color may almost be said to be the life of the average picture. The principal objection to photography in pictorial work is it lacks color. Everything must be reproduced in monochrome, either black and white, brown or sepia and white or some other snigle color or tone. And though the photographer himself, and a few who have devoted some attention to art subjects appreciate the art quality of a perfectly graduated monochrome print, almost invariably the average person will say: "What a pity it is you can't get the color in that print." And unquestionably much the larger proportion of those who see photographs sympathize with this remark.

The same observation has applied to motion pictures, and the same feeling has led manufacturers to undertake the long, laborious process of painting the films by hand. When well done hand coloring is a reasonably satisfactory substitute for nature's colors, but even the best of them lack life; and this is said in no spirit of criticism or fault finding. It is stating an absolute fact, and no one recognizes it more forcibly than the manufacturers. But it is, in a great degree, a reproduction of nature, and has been brought to a high degree of perfection.

After seeing the wondrous delicate half tints in the different flowers shown in the new process, and after watching the horses and cattle walk across the screen in all the depth of full, rich, yes, pulsating, color and life of the original, the weakness of the really excellent substitute becomes more apparent, and the revolutionary character of the new invention is the more readily comprehended.

Perhaps the most marvelous thing shown at the Madison Square exhibition was the little rainbows in the spray rising from the Potomac Falls. To be able to catch and forever preserve for reproduction whenever one desires those little, flickering, flashes of color is an achievement quite as epoch making as the invention of the motion picture itself. The colors of flowers are permanent, and even in the ordinary printing out or developing paper their values can be preserved and pictures of great beauty can be made; but no film or plate has ever recorded those little, dancing, evanescent rainbows that dart here and there in the spray of all water falls. And yet there they were, reproduced in all their delicate beauty on the screen. It seemed like a glimpse of fairyland, with life and color and beauty appearing at the touch of some magic wand.

The home scenes, the harvest in England, rich in the beauty of coloring of the Autumn, the scenes about the farmyard, with the different animals and the varying color tones of their bodies perfectly reproduced suggested the multiplication of such pictures, taking the place, perhaps, of some of the questionable stories which form such a considerable portion of the motion pictures now shown. They will never supersede good dramas, of course, but they are infinitely more beautiful and will unquestionably prove infinitely more attractive than the artificial picture shown in so many theaters.

During the picture of the harvest in England the spectators saw nothing else. A bit of England, as much, perhaps, as the eye would ordinarily see, was spread before them, and they saw nothing else. The rich tints of the harvest, the life color of the horses and the men and women with their variegated costumes were all there, quite as plain, yes, and quite as lifelike as they would have been had one been standing on an eminence watching the various operations at a little distance. The life of the scene was all there but the spoken word, and a little distance away that would have been inaudible.

The possibilities of reproducing characteristic scenery of every clime are little short of infinite. One may be comfortable at home and yet see the life of the most distant regions perfectly reproduced. One may have brought to his door the brilliant colors of the Orient or the sombre hues of the Arctic. The brilliant bird of paradise may flash before one like a touch of flame from some invisible source, or the sober plumage of the farmyard fowl may be perfectly illustrated. The brilliant scarlet coats of the British soldier, the gay plaids of the Scotch and the dark hues of other costumes and objects are thrown on the same screen, side by side, as in actual life, and each color appears in its full strength, adding its share to the marvelous kaleidoscopic features of every-day life, little noticed because so common.

And with it all there was a stereoscopic quality about the pictures that made them appear the more real. The flowers stood out from the screen like real blooms, and the horses, straining at their tasks, seemed actually walking, so strongly accentuated was this quality, and when the birds with bright plumage fell from their perches one half expected to see them fluttering on the floor below the screen.

This is a layman's view, the opinion of one who understands something of photography and has followed the films closely for some considerable time. These pictures satisfy. They supply the lack. They reproduce life. No more would be possible.

THE OPTICAL DESIRABILITY OF COLOR IN MOVING PICTURES.

[Abstract of an address to the Massachusetts Optical Society.]

By W. W. Harmon.

The time is not far off when the moving picture shows will either be obliged to discover some method of giving color to their pictures or give up their business as conducted along the present lines. As it is now, the crude light vibrations are certainly productive of nervous headaches, partial paralysis of the optic nerve and disorders within the center of the head of every individual having the "habit" of attending this form of entertainment now so popular in every city in the country.

The whole secret of these nervous disorders lies in the fact that the rays of light producing the moving pictures are totally lacking in color and not caused, as is commonly supposed, by the so-called "flicker" of light on the screen. It is exactly on the same principle that snow blindness, dizziness and other disagreeable features are caused by traveling over a field of snow in the bright sunlight.

We are constantly surrounded by color, and the softening shades of color as constantly modify the effects of color, which in their crude and glaring form, without harmonious contrasts, are equally "jarring" to the more finely organized human being. Therefore, as we perceive and recognize in our consciousness these colors and shades of color through the medium of the eyes and are so susceptible to their effects, it is reasonable to suppose that there is a medium of transmission from the eyes to the conscious perception and that this medium of transmission is constructed to withstand certain normal conditions. The normal conditions consist of a continuous chromatic glow of color effect, and by being thus continuous throughout life it becomes an actual necessity to our well being. Consequently any sudden transition from these kaleidoscopic effects of color into a condition wherein there is an entire absence of color invariably results in an abnormal action and reaction of the whole nervous system in its effort to adjust itself to those conditions, their effects, or in other words, between the objects seen, the medium of transmission and the conscious perception there are no magnetic rays of color to relieve the high tension currents of unaccustomed forces, and the strain is too great from the objective condition to the subjective state of conscious perception.

Thus there are involved three possibilities of analysis—the object seen, the medium of transmission, and the conscious perception. Now, on this plane of physical existence there are three fundamental colors as found by physical science—red, indigo-blue and yellow. From these are produced all other colors and shades of color, but properly speaking there are seven colors whose vibrations range from the red to the violet. Although it has been demonstrated that there are slower vibrations than the red and far more rapid vibrations than the violet, yet our range of perceptible vibrations of color is limited to these seven.

The magnetic waves emanating from the 465 trillions of vibrations constituting the extreme red, is what gives conscious perception of the color red. The highest number of vibrations which the optic nerves are capable of transmitting to the conscious perception of color is that of the extreme violet, consisting of 759 trillions of vibrations. Thus between the extreme red and the extreme violet there are the other five colors having their proper rates of vibration, together with all known shades and color combinations. The white ray and its opposite—darkness—is simply the absence of perceptible color in either case, and this absence of visible color is magnetically opposed to the corresponding principles of the conscious perception, which is of necessity made up of corresponding magnetic conditions, that it may receive the chromatic effect of those color vibrations by which we are enabled to feel and understand the outer and visible world of effects and apply them to the inner and invisible world of consciousness.

As the electric wire is the medium of transmission through which the electric current is sent to produce certain effects, so the optic nerves are the wires through which the magnetic forces of color vibrations are sent to produce those effects termed the conscious perception of sight. Between the object seen, the medium of transmission, and the conscious perception there must be no violent intrusion. If an electric wire is intended for the conducting of only a certain number of "volts" it will soon be destroyed if the voltage is doubled, and so it is with those delicate nerves, constructed and educated by accustomed daily and hourly habit to withstand the necessary combination of color vibrations. Double the voltage, so to say, and the result must be nervous disorders.

As there are seven colors, so there are also seven magnetic qualities corresponding to those colors, both of which may be divided into two groups, each group corresponds to certain qualities within our consciousness, which gives us, what is commonly called, intelligent perception. The first and highest group consists of the blue, the yellow and the indigo; the second consists of the red, the orange and the green; while the violet acts as a synthesis or vehicle, so to say, of the sensation and form constituting the conscious perception of the object seen within the inner world.

Therefore, the right eye is more attuned to a reception of the first group, while the left eye is more attuned to a receptivity of the second group. But strange to say, the optic nerves cross each other, or rather some of the fibres of the optic nerves decussate, or mingle, in the commissure, located just back of the eyeballs before they terminate in the respective nucleus of gray matter and organs of the brain. Finally and from this latter point of anchorage there results certain chromatic effects of color upon a screen of radiant light in the center of the head and from whence consciousness itself may be said to derive its experience of the outer world of effects.

It is clear that these color vibrations are tremendous factors in the life of every human being. We may logically conclude and maintain that color has at least one-fifth of the whole power of character forming processes without going into any further argument, or analysis of its influence upon health and sickness, life and death, joy and sorrow, pleasure and pain, etc., for it has much to do with every pair of opposites, their affinities and their afflictions. We may now understand more fully the concatenation of causes leading to the nervous disorders spoken of at the beginning of this article. There is no need of argument to convince any member of this organization of the effect of impaired vision upon the whole nervous system, and therefore upon the general health of the body. Every one of you in your daily experience and practice know how the blue rays of the chromatic test will be focused as far in front of the retina as the red rays are foscused behind it if the eye is emmetropic, consequently the two rays will intersect at the position of the retina and cause the flame to appear as of a diffused violet color, with a fine border of deeper blue. If the eye is hypermetropic the retina will be advanced and approach the focus of the blue rays and cause the flame to appear with a blue center and a red border. In the myopic eye it is just the reverse, and so on through the more irregular forms of the flame as it appears to the eye of various degrees of astigmatism, etc. If color vibration is thus proven to be of such importance in demonstrating these various disorders, is it not equally demonstrative that the absence of all color must of necessity act and react upon the whole instrument of sight and in such a manner as to be worthy of our further investigation.

If at some future meeting it is desired that this question shall be gone into more fully, we will endeavor to do so, meanwhile I conclude by suggesting the following remedies as a partial improvement in the manner of lighting and treatment of films in the moving picture effects, some of which have been lately adopted by the better class of exhibitors:

First—Rays of light carry more detail and reflect more clearly and with less intensity of action in a hall dimly lighted by concealed lights than with the present method of having almost absolute darkness.

Second—Color the films in sections as near as possible to nature as the subject will allow.

A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year to all Moving Picture World readers.

The Kinemacolor Demonstration.

That was an ausipicious gathering of moving picture people at Madison Square Garden, last Saturday night, in response to the invitation of Mr. Charles Urban, F.Z.S., of London, England, to witness the first exhibition in this country of Kinemacolor, which, stripped of technical color of speech, means animated photography in natural colors. The exhibition was not given in what is popularly known as Madison Square Garden, but in the concert hall located in the upper part of the building. At the same time the great six-day bicycle race was in progress in the main part of the structure, where twelve to fourteen thousand people were yelling themselves hoarse in encouragement of their respective favorites in the great race, but this in no way interfered with the scientific demonstration. A few of the invited guests got into the wrong place, but eventually landed right. I do not think there has ever been such a gathering of picture people in New York, at least I know of none, and I have kept in pretty close touch with all of them. I do not mean that it was an exceptional one in point of numbers or distinguished representation, but refer to the bringing together at one time of many different interests. Ordinarily the manufacturers, film renters and exhibitors hold separate meetings. I cannot recall when all have met as they did last Saturday. All branches of the industry were represented. Mr. G. Albert Smith, F.R.A.S., England, who is co-inventor with Mr. Urban of Kinemacolor, lectured briefly on the new art. As the subject has been fully treated by The Moving Picture World, it would be superfluous to go into the matter at this time, and it is a little too early to reflect satisfactorily the impressions received by those who witnessed the exhibition. Time for reflection is always required in such matters, but the instantaneous verdict of all was that Messrs. Urban and Smith were deserving of the highest compliments for what they had attained.

The cordiality with which Mr. Urban was greeted publicly and privately at the exhibition was sufficiently convincing that he has many warm friends on this side of the Atlantic. I heard so many people address him as "Charlie" that for a time I was nonplussed. To tell the truth I felt a little nettled at what I considered a presumption, but upon inquiring into the familiarity I found that scores of those present knew the genial inventor and manufacturer twelve or fourteen years ago, when he resided in this city, and this acquaintance was revived upon each of his frequent trips to this country since that time, as he is always cordial and whole-souled, and no distinction he may attain seems to enlarge his cranium.

I believe I am justified in saying there is nothing connected with the technical branches of animated photography with which Mr. Urban is not thoroughly acquainted, but I am certain that as a story teller he eclipses all in the business. He always has a funny one on tap, and having this happy faculty, I do not understand why the Urban-Eclipse productions have not monopolized the field of comedy. He also has a keen eye for business and, from what he tells me, can "book up" with the best of them. The Kinemacolor has run for weeks in the largest halls of England at weekly rental equally as high as the salaries paid the best of vaudeville attractions, and in many instances surpassing them; and Mr. Urban says the bookings are way ahead.

Color Photographs by Wire.

Contemporaneous with the Urban demonstration my attention has been called to Paris correspondence in the New York World of the 12th inst., in which it is stated that "two Frenchmen have invented an apparatus for transmitting by wire the reflected likenesses of persons standing at either end, enabling people talking over a telephone to see as well as hear each other." Now if this referred simply to a conversation over the telephone between two individuals my interest in the announcement would not be aroused to the extent that it is; but the article also states that by increasing the candle power, number of wires, mirrors, etc., it will be possible to transmit moving pictures. Isn't that enough to take your breath away? The scope of such an accomplishment challenges the remotest conception of the revolutionizing effects on moving pictures as they exist to-day. The invention will be in practical working order in a few months, the inventors claim. There is consolation for the moving picture manufacturers and renters in the knowledge that similar inventions have been heralded before, but never developed into practicability. If this latest invention makes good we can see none but the exhibitors rejoicing. The manufacturers may buy it up and join in the jubilation, but the film renters will certainly be forced out of the field. For years experiments and demonstrations have fruitlessly been made to produce talking moving pictures mechanically as desired. The accomplishment of this is awaited with the greatest interest, but what effect will it have if the latest Paris invention is perfected? And I forgot one claim made by the Parisian inventors, which is of particular interest to Messrs. Urban and Smith. The two Frenchmen even assert that it will be possible to transmit pictures in natural colors. Whew! Just imagine a plant similar to that now used by the telephone companies furnishing all the theaters and nickelodeons in a city with talking pictures—and in natural colors! All the houses could be supplied with a change of program nightly and only one set of reels would be required each night by the central station! And the operators! It is chilling to think of the reduction that would be made in the required force. Thank goodness the invention is not perfected, and I can hear the prayers of many that it never will be. Imagine the distributing company having a switch tender in each theater and nickelodeon asking the manager: "How many reels do you want to-night?" and when the sufficient quantity has been delivered he pulls the switch, locks the handle and goes on his way, as the milkman does when he has given you your measure! There is one thing about it, if the invention becomes practicable the moving picture distributers will be able to guarantee the exhibitors that there will be no repeaters because they will not need enough reels to make repeaters necessary.

I can hear the clicking of the cables as directions are being hurried to France for representatives to investigate the report I have referred to, for certainly it is the most disconcerting that has been let loose since the advent of animated photography. It may be a premature reflection of some Frenchman's imagination, and yet it may be well founded. Men all over the world are constantly working to improve and introduce something new and novel in connection with the making and projection of moving pictures, and for that reason all reports of such a nature are worthy of at least some inquiry.

The Patents Company.

The anniversary of the organization of the Motion Picture Patents Company occurs on Saturday, December 18. It is not likely to be celebrated until some day during the week following. As Christmas falls on Saturday, the 25th, the affair will probably take place during the early part of the week. A dinner is likely to be held at one of the prominent hotels. Messrs. Urban and Smith would in all probability have been among the invited guests, but they sailed for England on the 15th inst., as they want to be "home for Christmas."

On my visits to the various film exchanges I find a well defined spirit of dissatisfaction on the part of the managers of them relative to the enforcement of the clause in the contract with the Motion Picture Patents Company relative to the return of old film, which has been operative since September 1. No objection is made to complying with this part of the contract, but it is felt that sufficient consideration is not accorded the exchanges under it. From the appearance of matters I conclude that a contingency that was not foreseen has arisen and that when the matter is brought before the Patents Company in a proper manner the exchanges will receive a concession, which is apparently due them. Each month the licensed exchanges are required to return to the respective manufacturers an amount of old film equal to the amount the exchanges received from them during the month dating back seven months. The points raised by the exchanges are that the licensed films are issued at approximate length and have been invariably from five to ten feet short. In addition to this, a film in use for seven months loses from 20 to 30 per cent. of its length by reason of the cut-outs and repairs in the exchanges and made by the operators. In other words, a film originally issued as 1,000 feet in length will very readily shrink during seven months' use to 800 or 700 feet. I have heard many having immediate knowledge of the film rental business say that these arguments are by no means unreasonable. The renters say that if some relief is not afforded they will eventually become demoralized, because to live up to the contract with no allowance for the striking shrinkage of length of subjects they must draw upon a supply of film that was really never contemplated. For instance, an exchange is required to return 10,000 feet of film to cover an equal amount it received from one manufacturer seven months ago. The exchange sends in that amount based on the lengths of the shubjects as originally received. The shrinkage being 20 to 30 per cent., aside from the oriignal approximate lengths, the exchange is notified later on that it only returned 8,000 or, possibly, 7,000, so that to make good its compliance with the contract the exchange must send in two or three more thousand feet, or two or three more reels, that really they should have reserved to apply to the returns to be made the following month. This one case embraces a large item of deficiency, but what must the deficiency and extra draw be in the case of an exchange that buys approximately eight thousand feet of film from, say, eight manufacturers per month. If the rate of shrinkage claimed applies in his case then he is required to make an extra draw on his stock of from sixteen to twenty-four thousand feet. I understand that steps have been taken to put the matter in shape for presentation to the Patents Company to secure an allowance that will bring the requirements more in keeping with the spirit of the contract and justice. I received an intimation the other day that if the claims could be sustained by the exchanges there would be no difficulty in securing a proper allowance, but that thus far no official steps had been taken to bring the matter before the attention of the proper parties; that the exchanges had only talked about the matter, and nothing more. In answer to my query the party who gave me this information stated that the exchanges should bring the matter to the attention of the Patents Company, as that company alone governs the matter and directs the licensed manufacturers as to what allowances shall be made.

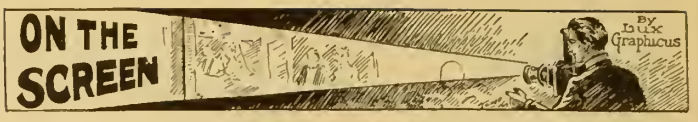
THE AMERICAN FILM MARKETS FROM BRITISH AND FRENCH VIEWPOINTS.

[From The Kinematograph.]

The American market has proved a disappointment. For some time prior to the formation of the International Projecting and Producing Company, little or nothing was being done with America. At the inception of that company, under the excellent leadership of Mr. J. J. Murdock orders commenced to pour into this country until June last, when they again ceased. It is agreed by all parties that if there is to be an open door for films in America, it requires a strong combine to carry the thing through. Mr. Murdock has worked unceasingly to prevent the tariff on films into the United States being raised to a prohibitive degree, but unless there is cohesion amongst the European makers, it is feared that the man who has broken the tariff will also be able to create one, and so prevent all outside supplies from entering the States. There is an old adage which says, "it is suicidal to cut off one's nose to spite one's face," and yet, if we are informed aright, this is what is being done in respect to the American market. The European makers should hold together like wax, for if petty jealousies are allowed to creep in, the whole structure will fall like a pack of cards. There is some talk of a few of the Continental makers starting a co-operation agency in the States, but all such ideas are hot air, unless the American branch can be subsidized with untold capital. At all events, endless litigation, instituted by the trust, is sure to follow such a campaign, and it seems a pity that negotiations, at all events at the present moment, should be transferred from the sphere of reason to the arena of force, when the European makers have not even got a fighting chance.

[Paris Correspondent of The Kinematograph.]

Of the conditions in the United States, which have been investigated by MM. de Beaulaincourt, Vandal, Ambrosio, and Prieur, we can only say very little without running the risk of being contradicted. They are more reticent than they ever were before. Mr. Prieur at least has decided his own way of meeting the emergency, and he probably has no need of keeping silent; his company indeed shows the greatest satisfaction at the results of his enterprise. What the other companies will do is still unknown, and only one thing is certain, and that is the dissatisfaction of the present, which does not exclude, however, a possible adjustment of future conditions. Mr. Raleigh, whom we saw at his busy headquarters, refuses to be drawn, and has only emphasized one point which we will note as of a certain value in the present uncertainty: He has absolute faith in the future of the Film Import and Trading Company, and highly praises the ability of the company's manager, Mr. Freeman, from whom he expects great achievements, and a considerable measure of success for the interests entrusted to him.



By Lux Graphicus.

I read an account the other day of what Senator Walsh proposes o do, or is doing, in that large new house of his which is approaching completion on upper Fifth avenue. Upper Fifth avenue is one of my favorite walks—I mean that little bit of the avenue just about the hotel, the Plaza, where I occasionally stop (outside), up to about Eighty-second street. Millionaire row, in fact. I have made up my mind to have one of those houses one of these days, and when I enter into possession of it I will invite all my enemies to a peace feast. You see, it being Christmas time, there or there abouts, I am in quite a benevolent mood.

What would happen at the festive plank when I and all my enemies gathered together I do not know, nor does it much matter; nor would it matter, I am sure, if I could get them all into such a house as I mean to live in—one of these days. They would be so lost in admiration of it that if they did not become my friends they would have no language left for calling me names; they would be simply bewildered by my good taste in the way of furniture, pictures, decorations and the like. For my house would be completer than Senator Walsh's. Besides all modern improvements, it would have something which I believe no large dwelling house at present possesses: namely, a private moving picture theater.

I think I am right in this. Ordinary theaters, concert rooms, gymnasia, Turkish baths, and other luxuries, are fairly common conveniences in your modern millionaire's house, but, so far, I never remember to have read that the moving picture theater has been included. This little ambition of mine has grown on me during the past few weeks, in making the acquaintance of the private exhibition rooms of the manufacturers and others, which are springing up in New York City, and I have never so strongly felt the desire to have a moving picture theater of my own as when I have been present in the Pathe private moving picture theater, on Twenty-fourth street, New York City—a theater which is always a pleasure to me as well as a duty to visit.

Everybody knows what a Pathe picture is in public. It is a marvel of steadiness, good photography and good acting. But to enjoy a Pathe picture at its very best, one must have the opportunity or privilege of examining a prominent release in Pathe's own little theater. Here you may sit at your ease in a quiet, spacious, tastefully appointed room and study Pathe drama almost by yourself, and realize beforehand something of the enormously pleasurable effect which those pictures are about to create on the great outside public.

It would be superfluous of me to hand out any more adjectives in regard to the general pleasure one gets from a Pathe premiere: let it suffice to say that one is conscious in the Pathe theater of having the pictures shown in the very best possible manner. This appealed to me very convincingly the other day when, having seen a recent release, the success of which depends very largely upon the well-timed dramatic action of the piece, Mr. Franconi, the courteous operator, remarked, "I hope all the operators who handle this film will time it properly." He, himself, had properly timed it. The result was that not a single part of the dramatic action was misrepresented in the way of speed and so one got an impression that the movements on the screen were perfectly natural and synchronized with the emotions of the characters photographed. This is half the battle in properly representing a moving picture to an audience.

There is another and most important respect in which the Pathe theater commends itself favorably to me. It is this: That here one is able to judge of the color in the Pathe colored pictures at sufficient leisure to enable one to appreciate the beautiful effects which the Pathe people get on their positives. As I remarked on this page a few weeks ago. "Color is in the air just now." Everybody in the moving picture field is talking about it, discussing it, praising it, criticising it, wanting it; the phrase "natural colors" is passing finally into the vocabulary of the writer on this subject; into the minds of manufacturers; into the minds of the public. So that some general interest attaches to the Pathe colored films.

There is no question that the Pathe colored films, however they may be produced, are very beautiful things, are very satisfactory things, and are assuredly very artistic things. Many a time have I sat and appreciated them in the Pathe theater. They seem to me, as a mere member of the great moving picture public who pays five or ten cents several times a week, to have a most esthetically pleasing effect on the mind, as pleasing as a richly colored stage scene produced by a Belasco or a Mansfield. They are always in good taste, you never see any crudities or violences of color. It would appear that the tints, however they may be applied to the positive, are chosen with knowledge and discretion. And the result, as I have said, is this, that on the minds of the public a Pathe colored picture has a very satisfying effect. It may not be either "nature" or "science." But let us call it "art," and if we accept it as such, then it must be considered very good art indeed.

The Pathe colored pictures have won enormous popularity in this last year. They are certainly very cleverly done and they win the commendation of those who are authorities on the subject of the mechanical application of pigments to printing surfaces. Under this head comes of course color printing, moving picture positive making and the like. So that they are entitled to the respectful consideration of those technically interested. It must always be understood that the world's masterpieces in color from the Greek and Roman painters down to the present have been produced by hand or very largely so, and consequently we have every justification for placing the Pathe film in the category of the artistic production. At a time like the present, when so much general discussion is being devoted to the color of moving pictures, I thought it only right and just that special mention should be given to the peculiar form of coloring adopted by Pathe.

Of course in the moving picture saloon of my upper Fifth avenue house, I should have the very best moving pictures the world produced, and in the very best possible style—that is, if the Patents Company would grant me a license, and the associated manufacturers would sell me their pictures. Then I should have every process illustrated. Of course I would have Kinemacolor, that is, if Smith and Urban would make me the pictures, and if Charles Urban would grant me a license. I would have everything of the best. Including pictures of my own manufacture by my own process! This I hope to do one day. Meanwhile, in all seriousness, I would like to see the wealthy classes who have large houses build moving picture theaters in their mansions. This would please their guests and families and stimulate interest in the subject, just as much as a private theater does. I do not know, by the way, whether a private theater is a common feature of an American mansion, but in some countries on the east of the Atlantic no castle or large house is nowadays complete without one. So now, you millionaires and others, get busy and make your houses complete by installing private moving picture theaters in them.

Some busybody has circulated the story that an advertisement appeared in last issue of the World on condition that the advertisement of a competitor be refused. The avowed principles of the publishers, to best serve the best interests of the trade stamp this as absurd; apart from the fact that such action is against the ethics of all newspaperdom and would render the publisher liable to heavy penalty. The advertising columns of the World are open to all legitimate concerns who pay the tariff rate and furnish their copy not later than noon of the Thursday of each week.

Mr. Chas. Higginbotham, proprietor of the Grand Theater, Holyoke, Mass., came to New York last week and placed an order for a complete "Hallberg" Economizer system for moving picture and incandescent lighting of his Grand Theater, including 600 assorted special incandescent lamps, varying in candle-power from 4 to 20, with two special "Hallberg" Economizers to operate these lamps. The moving picture lamp installation will be controlled by one 220-volt Standard Hallberg Economizer operating on 60-cycle A. C. circuit. The saving on the entire installation including the moving picture and incandescent lamps is guaranteed by Mr. Hallberg to be between 65 and 70 per cent. Mr. Higginbotham is the owner of three of the finest and largest theaters in Massachusetts, and is one of the men in the business who has made good in every respect, and is always on the lookout for any new devices which might reduce expenses or please his patrons.

The Kalem Company have deservedly promoted Mr. William Wright to the position of general sales manager at the main office. Mr. Wright has been the Western representative of Kalem pictures for the past two years and is succeeded in that capacity by Mr. W. F. Lynch.

The Unique Theater, of Jamaica, L. I., will soon be ready to produce high-class moving picture and vaudeville shows. After careful investigation of various makes of machines, they purchased a new Power's Cameragraph No. 5, New York approved type, and a 104-volt 50-ampere Power's adjustable inductor.

The Hudson Film Company advise us that they have received the first shipment of 300 reels from the Old Reliable Film Cleaning Company, and were surprised to find the condition in which their film were returned. Some of them are almost like new new, and as they have some films that are four or five years old, these, together with their new films which are added daily, should enable New York exhibitors to secure some very good service. They also extend an invitation to all the exhibitors to examine the films any time they so desire at their exhibition rooms at 138 East Fourteenth street, New York City.

"Santa Claus and the Miner's Child," a recent release of the Centaur Company, Bayonne, N. J., has been interdicted by the Chicago police and therefore denied public exhibition. We were invited by Mr. A. G. Whyte, the sales agent of the Centaur Company, to inspect the film with the view of passing an opinion upon it. And so we did; and do. An excellent piece of photography, the story is a mixture of drama, domesticity, sentiment and adventure in about equal proportions, with nothing gruesome, repulsive or immoral about it. The action of the Chicago police therefore calls for some explanation.

Mr. A. G. Whyte, who until recently had been general manager of the Film Import and Trading Company, has decided to put to his own use the experience he gained while in the employ of the above mentioned firm, and has opened a large office in the tower of the Metropolitan Building, at 1 Madison avenue, where he receives direct weekly shipments of foreign films. Mr. Whyte is also the sales agent of Centaur films. Starting in business at this time, a young man of his experience and acquaintance with the trade should make, as we predict, a very good future. Mr. Whyte extends a cordial invitation to visitors.

"Lest We Forget," the "Imp" release of this week, is a very pretty Christmas story told in a way that is both convincing and impressive. It is exceedingly gratifying to see the Independent Moving Picture Company adopt such a high standard in the selection of their stories and in their execution. "Lest We Forget" leaves an impression on the mind that is wholesome and the action and incident is lively enough to please any audience. It is unfortunate that the ultra-rich class, at whom the moral of the story is aimed, are not, as a rule, frequenters of moving picture theaters, but many will see it who will no doubt profit thereby. The photographic quality in this film sustains the press agent of the "Imp" films in his claim that each one would be better than the last.

"Everything for the moving picture theater," is the watchword of the Theatrical Equipment Company, of 51 West Twenty-eighth street, New York City, of which F. C. Taylor is manager. This means that Mr. Taylor caters for every possible need of the moving picture exhibitor. He will furnish the theater throughout, manage it, buy it or sell it. Public institutions, churches and the like can also be supplied with exhibitions of moving pictures. There is a film service available, and anyone in need of an operator can apply to the Theatrical Equipment Company. This last department of the business is a very important one, as the difficulty of securing first-class operators is ever present with the exhibitor. Stereopticons, lighting effects, etc., are also supplied by the Theatrical Equipment Company. We recommend moving picture exhibitors throughout the country to get in touch with the Theatrical Equipment Company, stating their requirements, when we have no doubt the latter will be met in the best, most business-like and up-to-date fashion.

"Rally Round the Flag" (Kalem).—One of those stirring, inspiring war dramas which cause a wave of patriotic emotion to sweep over the audience and bring tears to the eyes. Here is war epitomized. The recruiting sergeant surrounded with the eager young men anxious to sign the rolls and go forward in defense of their country; the battle field, with its varying fortunes, finally determined by a dashing charge in which one of the brothers is killed while gallantly fighting; the battle field, with the dead and dying and the long, mournful search for the dead brother; the return home, with the plaudits of the village people and the presentation of a sword for bravery displayed; the story of the brother's death to the father and mother, and finally the consummation of the love story begun long ago. Ah, well, the emotions engendered by such a picture are too deep for words, and as one sees the scenes constantly changing on the screen the years are rolled back and the yesterdays of life become more vivid and memories, long since slumbering, are aroused. One cannot criticise. The picture is too pregnant with the emotions which always surround the stirring representations of anything pertaining to war and its glories and griefs. The company is to be congratulated upon its success in this picture.

"Masquerader's Charity" (Pathe).—One of those little stories that touch the heart and cause one to feel that after all there are still kind hearts in the world and that poverty and want are not always allowed to go unrelieved by the rich and fortunate. The contrast between the little waifs and the wealthy gentleman who takes them home is great, and yet human hearts beat under silks and satins as well as under rags, and when once those hearts are reached they are found to be as gentle and loving as those each of us may know. This film is interesting chiefly because of the emotions it excites and one cannot but feel that it should be a helpful release at this season. Anything which can exert an influence toward relieving want and suffering is helpful, and this picture should make a powerful appeal in this direction.

"Bear Hunt in Russia" (Pathe).—An excellent record picture of a bear hunt in Russia, showing how it is done, and including the crowding and snarling dogs and the lumbering and unsuccessful attempts of the magnificent animal to escape. Then, at the last, the bear rolls over dead and is carried away by the hunters to their camp.

"The House of Cards" (Edison).—A drama of such power that one sits fascinated as the picture runs. It is pregnant with that strong, rugged, life of the plains, the life pulsating with the bigness, and whether or not it is always right is, at least, never little. A love story of more than ordinary interest is disclosed and the picture ends with a scene which in its intensity has probably never been surpassed on the screen of the silent drama. Here sit two men, their arms bared to the elbow, awaiting calmly the strike of a rattlesnake that will send one to his death. The sheriff took this way to give a man a fighting chance, and though it seems almost impossible, yet its strength lies in its novelty and its unusual character. But Cupid intervenes and the manly character of the sheriff finds a response in the heart of the girl, induced, perhaps, by its contrast to the character of the cowboy who stole his employer's gold to gamble with. And so the picture ends happily, yet showing clearly the marvelous strength and rugged characteristics of that knighthood of the West which is passing away as the finer civilization marches relentlessly Westward.

"Daughters of Poverty" (Gaumont).—A daughter of a poor laborer falls in love with a wealthy manufacturer's son, which drives her father to drink. He undertakes to kill his daughter and her lover, but is prevented by another sister, who is seriously hurt in the attempt. Then the young man asks for the hand of the daughter in marriage, and all ends well. A film like this may be interesting to foreign audiences, but to Americans the point is not plain. Photography, as usual with the Gaumont films, is good and the action, so far as possible, is good, but aside from these two features the picture carries little of interest.

"The Exploits of a Cowboy" (Pathe).—There is always something interesting in the wild Western life exhibited in these pictures of cowboys. This cowboy is very expert with the lasso, as shown at the start, and his dexterous work is shown in other scenes where he handles a bucking broncho, infected with all the devilment usually shown by his somewhat treacherous race. It is an interesting picture as a whole and represents interesting phases of cowboy life as it is in some parts of the West, and as it used to be almost altogether only a few years ago. The photography is clear, even though the movement is rapid some of the time, and the picturesque scenery is cleverly reproduced. So far as acting like real cowboys, they seem to do that satisfactorily.

"Willyboy Gets His" (Pathe).—An interesting story of how a masher was finally punished by two young women, who lead him a merry dance, even to the dentist's where he is forced to have some teeth extracted because he could not well escape, after pretending he had some difficulty with them. The girls then entice him home and offer him a cigarette, which is too much for him and he gets a bad attack of seasickness. The film is amusing and gets many a hearty laugh before it runs its course.

"The Ranchman's Rival" (Essanay).—A story of the West with the spirit of the big, broad ranches in the scenes and the love of a liberal hearted cowboy for a Western girl to add interest to the tale. The story is well told and there is a dash and go to the picture which can be imagined, but must be seen to be appreciated. The arrival of the apparently wealthy Eastern man, with the automobile, representing the lure of gold, followed by the coaxing of Annie to leave her Western lover and accept him, the arrangements for the false marriage, the sudden arrival of the Eastern man's wife, and all the attendant scenes and incidents add zest to the occasion. It is one of those stories which carry one along irresistibly and leave one wishing there were more of it, even though some of it is not altogether pleasant.

"Gambling with Death" (Vitagraph).—A story which deals with the uprising of a revolutionary mob against the nobility. A young count and his fiancee die, very dramatically, though the young man's death is wholly unexpected. The picture can scarcely be described, but perhaps it is sufficient to say that it is dramatically very strong and represents a possibility, rather than an actual occurrence. It might be said that the gambling mania is well represented here, since those who gambled lost. Even the priest's intervention did no good, and the picture ends with the pall of grief over all.

"The Heroine of Mafeking" (Selig).—Here is another of those stirring war dramas that sets the blood tingling and makes one want to cheer the brave woman who herself forces frightened natives to fill a water cart and then drives it through the zone of fire to where it is needed to restore the exhausted soldiers defending a kopje that commands the town. Then, womanlike, when she has succeeded and the danger is passed, falls fainting into her husband's arms. A war drama of this type, with its battle scenes and its lively action is always interesting and when enacted with the dash and spirit which the Selig Company puts into all it undertakes, makes the picture generally more attractive. One thinks that it is almost useless to undertake a criticism of a picture of this character. Possibly soldiers would see little things that are not as they are carried out in actual military practice, but it must be remembered that the average audience looks at these films as pictures, and the suppression of details helps rather than harms what appears on the screen. The action of the principal character, in this instance a woman, which adds to the interest of the picture, engages most of the attention, and right well does she perform her part. There is action and accomplishment, and the gallant officer who leads the charge on the kopje, Lady Mary's husband, by the way, is rewarded for his bravery by promotion. What more could a motion picture audience want?

"If Love Be True" (Lubin).—A love story, melodramatic in character, but spirited and alive. When a young millionaire leaves his proud position and goes to work to be near his sweetheart his action is certain to arouse a sympathetic response in the breasts of those who see the action reproduced. But here the action is carried still farther and he saves the life of his sweetheart from death by fire. That is the climax. A wedding is inevitable and occurs quite in the natural order of things. And in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it is assumed that these two people lived happily forever after. Devotion of this character is always interesting. It never fails to catch the attention and, one might as well say, the hearts, of the multitude. The photography is clear and good, and the action sufficiently lively to be in harmony with the subject.

"The Redman's View" (Biograph).—Much of poetry could be developed from the life of the Indian, even though he appears the embodiment of stoicism. Poetry, after all, is but the language of human passion, and perhaps the Indian had fully as much passion as he has been credited with possessing. The Biograph people have reproduced one of those scenes in which the Indian was forced to move from his home far into the unknown wilderness that the greed of the white man for more land might be satisfied. It is another chapter from the old story of persecution and wrong which characterized the white man's dealings with the Indians, and the Biograph Company is performing a beneficial service in reproducing it, emphasizing this feature of the case. They keep the Indian girl as a slave, but after the old chief's death, caused by the march and the heart break because driven from his old home, the young brave returns for his sweetheart, and after being apprehended in taking her away, is permitted to go in peace out toward the setting sun. There are reproductions of numerous Indian rites, such as the burial and others, which are accurately portrayed, while the costuming is perfectly reproduced. It is a successful picture.

"A Corner in Wheat" (Biograph).—The sowers go forth to sow. They lay the foundation for the future harvest and a very picturesque picture they make. They are, in effect, an animated reproduction of Millet's famous painting, "The Sowers," and they reck not of the future. They are absorbed in getting the grain into the ground in the present. The scene shifts suddenly. The audience is introduced to the struggling mass of brokers at the Exchange where the wheat king is engineering a corner which will give him absolute control of the wheat supply. This picture should do much to assist in clarifying the atmosphere when the question of wheat gambling and whether it should be stopped or not comes up for discussion. At last he is triumphant. Through a mass of wrecked fortunes he has succeeded in reaching victory, strewing suffering and privation everywhere he went. The scene changes again. The king is showing some friends through his bins which hold so many thousands of bushels of the grain. He stumbles and falls and is buried beneath the golden grain, feeling indeed the vengeance of the wheat. A fitting title would have been "The Vengeance of the Wheat." Nothing more graphic could have been obtained. The title given it is explanatory, but there is something beyond the corner which is forcibly taught. The vengeance of a Power higher than man is invoked to crush the man or the combination which causes the price of a necessity of life to advance so sharply that the poor must go hungry. In time the vengeance will come. Perhaps not so suddenly as it did in this instance, but it will come and that surely. This picture teaches a lesson worth while. It should serve as a warning to those who undertake to corner and control the food supply and an encouragement to those who see the menace in such illegal and altogether inhuman operations. The picture is worked out with all the skill and attention to details which characterize the Biograph work and deserves a long run. The company is to be congratulated upon producing such a graphic and satisfactory film.

"When Courage Fled" (Lubin).—A little comedy which has all the Lubin quality and sets the audience laughing within the first few feet. The little woman was afraid of nothing but a tiny mouse. That is the theme and upon it Lubin has constructed one of his characteristic and altogether delectable films. It is one of those pictures which needs to be seen to be appreciated. It is funny. It will make you laugh and when it ends you will wish it were more than 225 feet long. It is, in short, a good thing wrapped in a small bundle.

"The Tramp's Romance" (Pathe).—A story of a dream which did not come true and for which the tramp was made even more cognizant of his distress than before. He imagines himself the possessor of a fortune, seeks the hand of a beautiful young woman in marriage and is rudely awakened by a policeman to the stern realities of his existence. Nevertheless he picks a bouquet which he has the pleasure of presenting to the bride as she leaves the church on the arm of her new made husband. The picture is beautifully done and there is a certain degree of pathos about it which adds to its attractiveness. The suggestiveness of it makes it more important, or seem more important, than it really is, perhaps. These suggestions are frequently stronger than actual representation.

"The Pine Ridge Feud" (Selig).—Sometimes one feels as though these oft told stories of rough life and adventure take on a fresh interest when reproduced by Selig. His players thoroughly understand making a story of this sort so real that the characters live before one. And for a time the screen seems to be peopled with the persons who are only represented. The feud is well understood. There is a love story connected with this one and through that love story the older members of the two families, really the only ones left, are finally reunited and made friends for what is left of their natural life. There is a certain degree of ruggedness of character depicted in this picture, yet it must be admitted that the whole theory of the feud is so repugnant to the sane mind that the picture fascinates more by its horror than by any interest in the actual subject. These pictures are, in a degree, educational, in that they represent powerfully the feelings which may be engendered between two families that will last as long as there are two descendants or relatives to keep the feud alive. One or the other must be annihilated. This picture ends happier, but it is to be feared that it is scarcely representative of the actual feuds. Technically it is good and there is no fault with the acting. Both combined make an interesting film.

"Nothing Is Ever Lost" (Gaumont).—A comedy which deals rather graphically with the vagaries of an absent-minded person, who loses a number of important adjuncts to his well-being, one of which was his wife, who fell into the water and was rescued and restored to him just as he nearly forgot her. He loses his purse as a last straw, and that is not returned to him. The film is funny, and that is what is wanted in cases of this character.

"The Life Buoy" (Gaumont).—A sort of surprise story which has much in it of interest. A poor fisherman finds a baby in a life buoy, and after being driven to desperation by his creditors, he seizes the buoy and breaks it open, finding inside a roll of money sufficient to satisfy all his pressing needs.

"Fenton of the 42d" (Edison).—This picture is commonplace in the beginning, but later it gets exciting, and the battle scene, including the defense of the building in which the party has taken refuge, is so real that the spectator forgets for the moment that this is a drama reproduced on canvas. The girl's assistance in loading the guns and helping the wounded is graphically portrayed, and up to the very last she struggles valiantly to save her brother's life. But after it is all over, and the defending party has been killed or captured, the story ends happily, with the lovers in each other's arms. The acting is so real and there is so much of the actual fighting spirit in this picture that one must needs commend it, even though, as has been said, the opening is commonplace and apparently promises nothing beyond the dull, ordinary life of a frontier ranch.

"The Professor and the Thomas Cats" (Vitagraph).—The story of a luckless professor, disturbed in his slumbers by a cat, he undertakes to dislodge the discordantly musical beast from the roof next door, without avail, the ordinary articles of offense having no effect. So he climbs to the attic, is locked up there by the servant girl and has the time of his life getting back to his downy bed. But whatever vicissitudes he may have suffered, the cat has disappeared when he finally gets back. There is a good deal of fun wrapped up in this picture and the hearty laughter of the audience testifies to their appreciation of its absurdities.

"A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year" (Vitagraph). One of those stories that everyone thoroughly enjoys, at the same time realizing the virtual impossibility. It is true faithful service is certain to be rewarded in some way, but not always is it possible for an employe to turn the tables on a close-fisted employer and turn him out as is done in this instance. It is melodramatic, but none the less vigorous and enjoyable, and probably everyone experiences a sensation of exultation when the former bookkeeper shares his sudden prosperity with his former fellow employes.

"The Red Signal" (Urban).—A thrilling railroad story which brings out first the struggle of the daughter of a railroad signalman with a villain, who is soundly thrashed by her sweetheart. The villain plots, with some accomplices, the wreck of an express train. But the girl learns of it and stops the train just as it reaches the obstruction. The usual congratulations and reward follow. The picture has a goodly number of thrills, an important point in maintaining interest, and there is a good deal of dramatic ability displayed in working out the details. The photography is clear, and the pictorial work is of a high order of excellence. Most audiences will take very kindly to this picture.

"Switzerland: Conquering the Alps" (Urban).—Travel in the Alps, even under modern conditions, is attended with considerable difficulty and discomfort, and is not wholly devoid of danger. The average individual can obtain a reasonably accurate idea of the grandeur of the Alps by looking at this picture. The photographer understood his work and succeeded in transferring to his negative much of the grandeur and beauty of the scenery in that marvelous region. The clearness of the photography, and the masterly way in which the operator did his portion of the work combine to produce what is one of the most satisfactory pictures of scenery in the Alps ever put on the motion picture screen.

"The Living Doll" (Melies).—A Christmas story which will delight the little people. It is about a little girl who dreams that all sorts of strange things happen to her, among which is her being carried away by kidnapers, her escape, and finally she changes places with a doll, which is carried to a house and down a chimney with many other presents. But she is awakened by the nurse, and discovers that it was all a dream. The many pictures of Santa Claus and the altogether delightful Christmas features introduced tend to make the picture of unusual attraction, while its timeliness adds to the interest it excites.

"The Ugly Girl" (Pathe).—A beautiful story, told in a beautifully colored film. While this picture contains no thrills, it excites pity for the unfortunate girl whose face is ugly and who is abused because it is. Her noble character is revealed when she allows the lotion to be applied to the eyes of her blind lover, believing all the while that he will turn from her because she is ugly. But instead she is transformed into a beautiful maiden. Such touching stories, so beautifully wrought out, exert a beneficial influence upon everyone fortunate enough to see the pictures. Producers can't bring out too many of this type.

"Punch and Judy" (Pathe).—Here is a delightful juvenile picture which possesses all the attractive elements required in a juvenile picture. The children are delighted with it and older ones will not pass it by. The film is worked out with all the fidelity to details which characterizes the usual Pathe film.

"The Female Reporter" (Essanay).—A story which is intended to show some of the fool things the modern editor may do, and when he sends out Miss Flip, the society reporter, to undertake a burglary to prove that the police are not on the job, after a series of moving adventures she is confronted by the man of the house. But when he calls for the police she succeeds in getting his revolver and holds him at bay until the police arrive, when she denounces him and he is marched away to the station house. The film is funny and cannot fail to keep the audience in the best of humor. Such subjects, handled by this company, take on a more than ordinarily humorous aspect and vigorous applause greets some of the scenes as the film runs.

"The Amateur Hold-Up" (Essanay).—A complication of circumstances arising from a scare which a nervous individual received when he discovered that his watch and money were missing. There were two apparent hold-ups and a generally comical mix-up which contributes to the amusement of the onlookers. The situations are all well worked out and the sport increases as the picture progresses, reaching its culmination in the heavy fine imposed upon the frightened Brown for carrying concealed weapons. The picture has all the dash and go which characterize the Essanay films and does not fail to please.

"The Two Sons" (Imp).—A war drama, based upon a supposed episode in the Franco-German war, depicting very graphically the lives of a mother and her two sons, one a brave man, the other a coward. The brave one is killed while bearing an important dispatch. The coward dies a dastard's death. The story is graphically told, and represents an advance dramatically and photographically over some of the work of this new corner in the field.

"The Sailor's Son" (Theo. Pathe).—A story of some dramatic interest based upon a mother's reluctance to allow her son to follow the sea, in which her husband had been drowned. But an exhibition of bravery in a rescue by the son changes her mind and she permits him to go. The interest will lie more in the picturesque views than in either the story or the acting, both of which are little more than commonplace.

"Mr. Sadman's Cure" (Raleigh & Robert).—A comic representing a gentleman going away a helpless invalid and returning fully cured and carrying a liberal proportion of embonpoint. The picture is disposed to be rough-house, and its fun lies in its tumbles and some of the absurdities of action.

"The Thames in Winter" (Hepwix).—A long film, bearing nothing but one continuous snow picture of one bank of the Thames, without a sign of life. As snow scenes the pictures are good and they have an unusually strong stereoscopic quality which adds materially to the picturesque appearance. As a record it is a success, but it is little else. The real pictorial quality is lacking and the still, snowclad bank of a river in Winter offers nothing in dramatic interest.

"A Surprising Powder" (Cines).—One of those pictures which represents a professor as producing a powder that will engender a feeling of love in whoever it touches. The idea is not new, nor are the results worked out in a new way. It is reasonably funny, and is not too long to be tedious.

HOLIDAY SLIDES.

It is indeed a pleasure to see the beautiful Christmas and New Year slides which the Novelty Slide Company of New York City has ready for the Yuletide season. The designs are appropriate and very carefully executed, the photography is perfect, and the coloring, as usual, is artistic and rich in beautiful, bright colors. Exhibitors will find these slides inexpensive additions to the holiday program, and from the large number of orders coming in, it seems that every exhibitor wants them.

NEW FILM PRODUCER.

Mr. A. B. McMillan is authority for the statement that the Exclusive Film Exchange, which recently sold out to Mr. J. M. Reilly, who is also connected with the American Film Exchange, of Pittsburg, and the Southern Film Company, of Cincinnati, have completed arrangements whereby on December 30 they will put on the market an exclusive American film with the title "A Romance of the South." Mr. McMillan tells us that this will be but the first of a series of American subjects to be put on the market by the company in which he and Mr. F. M. Tracey are associated, and which will be termed "The Exclusive American Film Company." The importing business in which this company has been engaged will be continued according to present plans.

Mr. Jas. Lee Reilly, who has purchased the exchange interests formerly operated under the name of the Exclusive Film Exchange, is in active charge now in the Chicago field and is operating under the name of the Precision Film Company. As stated before, Mr. Reilly retains his interests in the American Film Exchange of Pittsburg, and the Southern Film Exchange of Cincinnati.

PUZZLE PICTURES FOR THE MOVING PICTURE THEATER.

The National Slide Company, of 53 State street, Boston, Mass., are utilizing the lantern slide part of a moving picture entertainment for introducing a novelty which should appeal to the millions of small patrons of moving picture houses. This novelty is the projection of a picture puzzle on the screen. They put out what is called a combination carrier which allows either the ordinary song slides or the Roto puzzle picture slides to be shown. These latter, as the name implies, are made to revolve in the carrier by being placed in a special holder. The revolution is effected by the movement of a belt which causes the slide to revolve in the holder and consequently on the screen. The puzzle pictures are diagrammatic in form and are colored. They cost $5.00 per set of seven slides. The carrier costs $5.00, so that it will be an easy and inexpensive matter for the moving picture exhibitor to try out this ingenious little scheme of interesting his audience. You throw a puzzle picture on the screen between the reels and there is no reason why you should not either give prizes to your audience for solutions of these puzzles, which are not too difficult, and yet are ingenious enough to keep the audience guessing. It is the intention of the National Slide Company to release two sets of new slides and subjects each week. The company takes its idea from the newspapers which, as our readers know, publish puzzles and give prizes for them. They especially appeal to children and at this season of the year and in those theaters patronized by the little ones, we have no doubt that these ingenious puzzle pictures will be popular. Exhibitors should write to the National Slide Company, 53 State street, Boston, Mass., for a descriptive circular of the scheme, and film exchanges and song slide exchanges are also recommended to get in touch with the company.

MORE FIGHT PICTURES COMING.

Abe Attell, featherweight champion of the world, holder of the title for many years, long before Battling Nelson came into prominence, is going to battle Owen Moran, England's best featherweight in this country again. Jimmy Coffroth, the dean of fight promoters, is on his way to England now to secure Moran for a July date. He plans on matching Attell and Moran as a preliminary to the big Johnson-Jeffries fight. Moran and Attell fought once before, motion pictures of which battle are now in the hands of the Fistiana Film Exchange of Chicago. There are thousands of fight fans throughout the country who know of Attell's wonderful fighting ability, having read it in all of the metropolitan dailies, yet they know little of his real style, simply because they have been deprived of the right to see him battle. They know little or nothing of Moran, yet the English fighter is so good that he secured a draw with our champion after twenty rounds of fighting. Attell beat every man he has ever faced, including Battling Nelson. These thousands of fans throughout the country want to know the relative ability of these two featherweights; they would like a line on them so that should they desire to wager, they would not be betting blindly. They have no chance to judge their relative ability except through their former battle. They would get a good idea if they were given a chance to see the fighters in action on the screen. Picture houses have made the fight pictures popular and to-day a good fight picture draws probably a greater crowd than any picture on the market. Fitzsimmons-Corbett picture earned $200,000, Nelson-Britt earned $165,000, Gans-Nelson earned over $65,000; these are but a few examples of what the game is. Pictures are a great aid to the public and the film renters should give the public more pictures from which they can derive knowledge, no matter whether it be knowledge of fighters or of travel.

RENEWING FILMS..

Something Good for the Exchanges.

Moving picture films are like human beings in that their life or general good condition must be looked after constantly, or they will deteriorate. If we, who are writing this paragraph, were not dosed and physicked at times, we should wear out and become useless and we should write no more paragraphs; whereas, as we are constantly renewing ourselves, we hope to write many more paragraphs and pages. So it is with the moving picture film. Its good condition is very much a matter of careful treatment in the work that it has to do. Even after a day's passage through a machine it has suffered some deterioration, but when it goes on from week to week without being looked to, then all the evils of rainstorms, dirt marks, scratches and general deterioration of the film sets in and instead of it being a pleasure to the audience, it becomes an eyesore. The Old Reliable Film Renovating Company, of 132 Lake street, Chicago, Ill., here steps in as film doctors or renewers. They especially appeal to exchange men throughout the country to have their films renewed every few weeks. They have a process whereby a film, after it has run for a certain time, can have its scratches and rain marks removed and the surface hardened and brightened without interfering with or weakening the image. A film so treated actually becomes improved and takes on, as it were, a new lease of life. They point out very properly that the public want clean pictures and they quote the experience of exhibitors in this respect. It is therefore up to the exchange man to make a point of taking advantage of the service of the Old Reliable Film Renovating Company. This company carefully inspects each film before treating it, keeps it at its works only 48 hours, and also undertakes the renovation of non-inflammable film as well as the re-renovation of all films. In other words, a film can be brought back to its pristine state many times. The process should be especially valuable for standard films which are in use for great periods of time. Many well-known exchanges, including Swanson, the Dixie, the 20th Century Optiscope Company, the Twin City Calcium Light and Film Company, and others have given the Old Reliable Film Renovating Company testimonials as to the efficacy of their film renewing process.

INDEPENDENT FILMS ON FOURTEENTH STREET.

Mr. Rosenquest, manager of the well-known Fourteenth Street Theater, has solved the problem of diversified programs on Moving Picture Row, by announcing that beginning this week he will show Independent films. He has no fault to find with the licensed service he has been getting, but realizes that with six show houses between him and Third avenue, he had very little chance of drawing any patronage from the teeming East Side. He has had the idea in mind for some time, but there was no Independent exchange that could guarantee him the quality of service. A few weeks ago a new exchange started out right by buying all the new films first and then going after the customers. The United Film Renting Company, 121 East Twenty-third street, convinced Mr. Rosenquest of their ability to supply him—and the fact convinces us that their business principles are right.

Since the United Film Renting Company came into the field the independent manufacturers have had a good supporter and many more exhibitors are talking of going independent.

Fort Madison, Iowa.—A. E. Burke, of St. Louis, is preparing to open a new moving picture theater here.

ON THE ROAD.

Pittsburg.—The Pittsburg press is antagonistic to the moving pictures and has done its best to kill the amusement of the people. If the editors would only walk up and down Fifth avenue, during the present busy shopping season, they would realize how dear moving pictures are to ladies and children. The Government has appointed a commission to determine the danger of the film. Those scientists made some great tests; one of these is of placing some film in a bottle and corking and heating same. Although those scientific tests can have a relative value, we cannot abide by them, as, if we wanted to put faith in all tests, we would go hungry, as our great professors show us microbes in everything. A theater is far from a corked bottle; at least, that is my experience, as I am suffering from a severe cold, caught in one of the show places. With a continuous performance, the doors are constantly swinging in and out, and no gases could ever accumulate in such a volume as to cause an explosion. If a foot of film is required to explode a bottle, it would require millions of feet of film to generate enough gas to cause an explosion, and no theater carries more than five to six thousand feet of film at a time. The newspaper proprietors are not such ignoramuses as represented. They want sensational news to create a circulation, as the circulation booms up the advertising. As the moving picture folks do not advertise in the dailies and as the moving picture managers have ruined the theatrical managers by adopting the vaudeville, it is only natural for the newspapers to protect their regular advertisers, the theatrical managers, in running down the moving pictures. Before leaving Pittsburg I had the pleasure of meeting Charles E. Williams, the inventor and manufacturer of the Excela Soundograph, a most ingenious device to increase the value of a picture in reproducing the sound effects.

Harrisburg is doing a good business, and, according to the local exchanges, everything is as could be desired. I did not question the statement of Mr. Bernstein, the owner of the Union Film Exchange, as his office shows great prosperity, and a pleasant smile greets everyone. My main object in stopping in Harrisburg was to interview the Chief Factory Inspector on the recent laws which have caused so much trouble to the Pennsylvania exhibitors. I was well received and found them well disposed to give me all the information in their power. The chief clerk presented me with a set of the acts and a blue print showing how the new booths should be constructed. The Chief Factory Inspector will strictly enforce the laws on all new places. We cannot blame him, for he is a State officer and must obey the law. The exhibitor has no excuse whatever, as before erecting a new place it should be his duty, or the duty of his architect, to conform the plans to the laws in existence. As to the old places, the Chief Inspector does not wish to be quoted as unjust; he studies each case, and if he sees that the place can be made safe without fully enforcing the acts passed by the last Legislature, he will grant a permit. This is optional with the Chief Factory Inspector; he uses his own judgment, and he does not want Jones to believe that he is entitled to the leniency shown Smith. There are many points considered by the Inspector—the personal character of the exhibitor, his desire to make his place as safe as possible, the sort of help employed, the original construction of the building, etc. In the eye of the Inspector we have a number of undesirable exhibitors that have to be watched very closely, and with such men the law must be enforced. The question of help is a very serious one, and I understand that a bill will be presented at the next Legislature, that only proper and competent help be employed in moving picture parlors. The Inspector finds that too many show places are a mere family affair. The father smokes his cigar in front of the place to show himself or act as a barker, the mother sells the tickets, the daughter plays the piano, a boy in knee pants operates the machine, while the other sons act as ushers. Under those circumstances the Inspector claims that the safest place is a menacing danger. Yes, in case of an explosion there would not be a cool head; there would not be strong, brave ushers to calm a panic, establish order, and even rescue victims. As the new Legislature will not meet before 1911, the Inspector is looking over acts to see if he cannot find a way to keep mere boys from acting as operators and ushers. I can safely say that the Chief Factory Inspector is a friend to all Pennsylvania exhibitors willing to conduct a legitimate business.

York.—Upon reaching York, fresh from Harrisburg, I had a chance to examine one of the new booths at the Jackson, and proclaim same as a safe device. York is doing a good business. I do not care what some unscrupulous exhibitors try to hammer into my head—that the public wants long shows with vaudeville acts, etc. Once more I say, No, and tell them frankly that they do not know how to manage their places. The Jackson was not showing five reels of old junk, was not showing vaudeville; was showing only two reels, but—yes, this is where the "but" comes in—two reels of Biograph and Selig. It was the second day (the Jackson changes three times a week) and a very disagreeable night, the highest point of the cold wave, yet the Jackson was doing a good business. F. E. Barry, the manager, claims that the four houses controlled by Mr. Jackson are doing a good business in following the policy of spending money on films of quality and cutting off the expense of cheap vaudeville. Mr. Barry's statement is true, as in my last letter I said that the Palace, of Lancaster, and the Alvin, of Columbia (both Jackson houses), were doing an excellent business.

Baltimore.—This was my first visit to the Monumental City since the big fire of 1904. I was fairly amazed at what should be called "Moving Picture Row," the section of Baltimore street between Holiday and Gay streets. Nine moving picture palaces, six of them one after the other, and all fine looking houses. Baltimore seems to lead the way in another direction. They are tired of names like "Bijou Dream," "Nickolet," "Palace," etc., but they adopt originality in naming their places "Blue Mouse," "Black Cat," "Red Moon," "Red Feathers," "Rainbow," etc. They do not seem to care for white or cream-colored fronts; they have a mixture of white or colored marble, and the rich ornaments are either imitations of dark woods, old gold, old silver, bronze, etc. Most of the houses have very rich and artistic fronts. The "Black Cat" is perhaps the longest hall in existence; in fact, too long for a good projection. To obtain a good picture, A. Steen, the owner, projects his pictures from behind the screen. He obtains a well-lighted, clear and better picture at a reduced cost. Mr. Steen's arrangement increases the safety, as the machine and films are not in the audience proper, but behind the screen. The "Blue Mouse" shows us the greatest improvement in cinematography. The pictures are projected on what is called a mirror screen. The effects are great, as the darkest pictures appear clear and show much relief and perspective. Bohannan & Levy have a good cement for non-inflammable films. At the "Wizard" they make a specialty of showing Biograph films, and the folks wishing to see Selig's productions are sure to find them at the "New Wizard" (same owners) on their release days. As both "Wizards" are good-sized houses, it is another conclusive proof that good pictures can draw big audiences without having to be sandwiched between cheap vaudeville acts. At the "Grand," Mr. Moorehead showed me his improved screen; it is a preparation of his own, bringing out the best effects of any dull picture. As my time was limited, I promised Mr. Moorehead that I would pay him another visit to study his new invention.

CHICAGO NOTES.

The Exclusive Film Company, of Chicago, have disposed of their interest in the film exchange business to J. M. Reilly, of Pittsburg and Cincinnati. In an interview with F. M. Tracey, general manager of the Exclusive Film Company, he informs us the intention of his firm is to devote their entire energy to the importation of high-grade European films and also the entering in the field with at least one release a week of American-made American subjects, all of which are "exclusive" and obtainable only through the Exclusive Film Company. The first release of their American film will be on December 30 and entitled "A Romance of the South." The trade-mark will be "The Exclusive American Film Company."

The old Exclusive Film Exchange will operate under the name of Precision Film Company, and Mr. Reilly will retain his interests in the American Film Exchange, Pittsburg, and Southern Film Exchange, Cincinnati.

The Royal Film Exchange have removed their location from Security building to 225 Dearborn street.

Morton Cohn, of the Morton Film Exchange, Portland, Ore., is in town, stopping at the Annex.

William W. Wright, Chicago representative of the Kalem Company, will leave Chicago, December 23, to spend Christmas with his folks in Boston. Mr. Wright will not return to Chicago, but settle permanently in New York City in capacity of sales manager for the Kalem Company. William Wright is popular as few here in Chicago and we all hate to see him go. His many friends wish him every success in his new enterprise. The interests of the Kalem Company will be represented here by W. F. Lynch, a well-known man in commercial circles. Mr. Lynch is a gentleman of travel and experience, having spent several years in South America and, in connection with his brother, run a large mercantile enterprise in Buenos Aires, Argentine Republic.

Practical Talks to Operators.

IV.—THE PROJECTOR AND ITS USE.—Continued.

By Arthur S. Newman, in "The Bioscope."

The special parts of the projector hitherto treated of in these articles have been common to all projectors, and although next in importance come certain items concerning the intermittent mechanism, I think it best to deal first with such points as are usually present in the machines, irrespective of the systems on which they are constructed. The automatic shutter or cut-off has come to be considered an almost essential part of a complete projector. Whether its utility is great, I shall not discuss here; it is a very general adjunct to a projector, and must be dealt with. The automatic cut-off may be said to be the most delicate part of the machine, and is in consequence very liable to derangement. Many forms are in use, all depending upon the principle of the centrifugal governor. Turning the handle of the machine, or otherwise driving it, one of the quick running spindles, by communicating its motion to a part or parts, arranged to change position by being whirled round; causes a shutter to lift when a certain speed has been attained. When the speed decreases, the parts being no longer under the influence of sufficient centrifugal force to keep the shutter open, it is allowed to close. The idea is, that should the machine cease running, the automatic shutter will cut off the light and heat from the film before the machine comes to rest. Automatic shutters as a rule work well when leaving the factory, and will work well to the end of the time of utility of the machine—if properly attended to. The mechanism governing them must be kept scrupulously clean, and well oiled with a lubricant of high quality—good clock oil, for instance. An oil with the slightest tendency to become gummy will be fatal to the perfect action of most of these devices. Being lightly made, containing many joints, and usually having sliding fittings in some part of their anatomy, they are especially liable to stick if not quite clean, and to bind if they receive the smallest injury. Usually a pair of governor balls, or a disc mounted on a spindle by a pin-joint on which it can turn through several degrees of arc in a direction at right angles to the main spindle, constitutes the actuating mechanism, which follows very closely the throttle actuating mechanism of a steam engine. The governor balls are, or the disc is, usually opposed by a spring acting in antagonism to the position they tend to assume during rotation. A sleeve sliding on the spindle, and having a groove into which a lever connected to the shutter works, is usually the means of connection between the rotating governor and the stationary shutter parts. Both the rod on which the sleeve slides, and the end of the lever engaging with the sleeve, should have special attention as to cleanliness, and should be wiped and oiled daily if any dependence is to be placed on the device. Some of the shutters work on pin-joints, others run on slides, and in the latter case the slides should also have special attention paid to them. It needs but a very small accumulation of dirt to cause a light running slide to bind, and all these devices are necessarily light running. Some are provided with an adjustment by which they can be regulated to close at any desired speed, usually by regulating the strength of the opposing spring. The details of design vary considerably in different makes of projector, but the principle is almost the same in all. The only advice I can offer is: If you wish the automatic shutter to work well, keep it clean, and guard it from injury, and when you have done this, don't depend upon it, but depend upon your own manipulation of the hand cut-off in case of stoppage of the film.

To some of these automatic shutters is added an attachment which causes them to cut-off in the case of either the upper or lower loop of the film pulling tight or becoming too large; so that should anything go wrong and cause the film to stop in the gate, the cut-off shall act, although the machinery still runs at its normal speed. This sounds like a great improvement, and if it can be effected without introducing complication, should be of utility; but even with this addition, there still remains the danger that a piece of celluloid may shear off the edge of the film, and remain caught in the gate in the path of the rays, when, if the operator be not alert, the result may be a burn up, in spite of the automatic mechanism. This may seem a somewhat remote contingency for which to provide; it has, however, occurred twice in my experience. The proper thing to do is to at once shut off and remove the loose piece from the gate, because, should it ignite, it may be carried along with the film and fall into the lower loop. Some automatic shutters are provided with a catch to hold them out of action while the light is being adjusted to give an even appearance on the screen, and should the operator forget to set the shutter free before starting the machine, the device remains inoperative. I should advise the complete removal of this catch, because it is so easily possible to forget to set the shutter free. In adjusting the light the shutter can be held open by the finger, and will always be ready for action when the film is threaded up, or an arrangement to automatically set free the shutter catch when opening the gate could easily be devised. Whether dependence is placed on an automatic shutter or not, it should be an axiom with every operator to see that the hand cut-off works easily and certainly, so that it can be closed by a touch of the finger, and that it will remain closed, and not be liable to jar open, also that its lever is in a convenient and easily reached position. A certain amount of confusion exists owing to the fact that all hand cut-offs do not act in exactly the same way, and that some require to be pushed, and others pulled, and that the direction of the pushing and pulling is different in different makes.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—We are overwhelmed by the number of replies received in response to the editorial in your issue of December 11.

Will you kindly say in your next issue that owing to the number of replies received and coming in with every mail it will be utterly impossible to answer them all?

You will also confer a favor by printing the list of slides we furnished you with last "copy." Price of slides will be twenty cents apiece in colors and made by one of the best manufacturers in New York City. Shipments will be made promptly in the order received.

Will you also advise exhibitors who have not yet sent in their orders to do so at once, as there is more in this proposition than appears upon the surface.

Thanking you in advance, I beg to remain,

Very truly yours,

A NOTE OF WARNING.

12 West Ontario street, Chicago, Ill.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Your editorial in the issue of the 27th, "A Note of Warning," is timely and should have some effect in bringing manufacturers to their senses.

Aside from "length and flatness," spoken of in the editorial as the cause for a slump in business, there is another for which the theater owner is responsible: the choice of a program.

This afternoon I visited a moving picture theater on Madison street and witnessed a series of pictures which dealt with death in each case, and I, for one, do not approve of such a choice of subjects when there is such a variety to choose from.

First there was a lecture and pictures of scenes of death at the mine disaster at Cherry, Ill. Next, "Judgment," in which four people die; and as a fitting climax to all this, the next film was a story of war, in which were shown scene after scene of death and the horrors of war. Surely a poor selection of pictures—no happiness among them all.

Another theater nearby had "The Red Girl," a picture so full of brutality and murders as to be positively disgusting.

These are only a few cases. Programs should be selected that are varied and should combine comedy with tragedy.

The Western pictures, while excellent in their way, are bad because of the brutality and amount of killing depicted, which is bound to make some people shun them for this reason. The unhappy ending of many of these makes for dissatisfaction and is not popular.

That the happy ending is the best was shown clearly in the case of a play in New York, "The Fourth Estate," which had a sad ending at first, but because of general dissatisfaction and the possibility of failure, the ending was changed, and this play, doomed at first to failure, is now one of the greatest successes of the year. So it is with moving pictures. The wholesome drama and the happy ending are a combination which send an audience away happy and contented.

The moving picture should not be used for the presentation of horrors; brutal treatment of women and men and cold-blooded murders. When this sort of thing is modified, many of the Western subjects will be more pleasing and have a better effect on people's minds and will not drive them from the theater; for the contemplation of brutality and death is not pleasure for anyone.

Carl Laemmle's prediction in your issue of the 27th, that moving picture outfits would be sold in private homes, would certainly be a great thing for the industry, and suggests many possibilities. Its use in the family circle and in family gatherings would be of great value, both for education and amusement. Moving pictures could be taken of members of a family from infancy to old age, showing them at work and at play, and we would witness the passing of the "Family Album" and the substitution of the "Family Films." These films could be kept in a safe and taken out to show friends in after years; old folks could sit and see themselves as they appeared in their youth, and there would be no use of dreaming of childhood days. After a person's death, the film would take on an added value and interest, as it would be a great comfort to a family to have their loved one with them as he or she appeared in actual life. These films could be sent to relatives in all parts of the world, forming a collection of great value and preserving for all time the family in actual life—a pictorial family history.

Yours truly,

CHARLES R. WILHELM.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

The releases announced by the Vitagraph Company for January 4th and 8th constitute a rather unusual event in the motion picture business in America, inasmuch as both are elaborate feature productions and they are being realeased in the same week. The realease for January 4th is the second reel in the important Biblical series dealing with "The Life of Moses," and the release for January 8th is the film de luxe "Richelieu," which is declared to be one of the best things the Vitagraph has ever done. The Vitagraph Company's lavishness in thus issuing two big films within four days of each other would appear to indicate that the company feels secure in its ability to maintain an exceedingly high standard of releases in the weeks to follow.

The Vitagraph's motor boat story, "Cupid and the Motor Boat," coming out New Year's Day, has added interest from the fact that it was taken at Sound Beach, near the Summer residence of Mr. Blackton of the Vitagraph Company. Sound Beach is one of the most picturesque spots on Long Island Sound and it is said that the scenes shown in the film are remarkable for their beauty and interest. The story is described as intensely thrilling, yet entirely logical. Looking into the future we may confidently anticipate other thrilling motor boat picture stories by the Vitagraph next season, as both Mr. Smith and Mr. Blackton of the Vitagraph Company are having new motor boats of large and fast design constructed for their personal use. The possibilities of producing sensational marine stories with the aid of the big motor boat fleet that will then be at the company's disposal are such that they are not likely to be overlooked.

A TRAP FOR SANTA CLAUS.—He is a contemptible misanthrope who would dissipate in the minds of the little ones their faith in Santa Claus, the children's deity, to whom their fervent prayers are seldom unanswered. Scarcely do they leave their Thanksgiving dinner when they turn with wide-eyed expectancy towards the Yule season. What a beautiful sight, as the little innocents scamper expectantly from their cots in the morning to the room gaily festooned with evergreens where a stately tree stands, its branches pendant with ornaments of card and tinsel interspersed with tiny wax candles. Beneath this tree are arranged the special favors of Santa, while at the fireplace hangs their stocking cornucopia buiging with good things. This is indeed the child's elysium. We all know how the little ones have tried to keep awake during the night with the hopes of getting a glimpse of that most elusive being; alert at every sound until their eyelids, heavy with sleep, shut them from the material to the land of dreams. It was on an occasion of this kind that two little children, determined to catch old Santa, brought peace and happiness to the home of sorrow. Arthur Rogers had been in the worst of luck for some time. Honest and industrious by nature, he was in the depths of despair at the sight of the misery his little family of a wife and two small children were subjected to. They were, in fact, on the verge of starvation. With crushed spirit, he seeks solace in drink, and in a drunken condition feels his wife would be better off without him, so he leaves. Immediately after his departure a lawyer calls to apprise Mrs. Rogers that her aunt's estate, long in litigation, has been settled, leaving her a moderate fortune. This indeed is pleasant news, but if it had only come before her husband's rash act. However, they remove to new quarters, and the children, at least, are happy. It is the night before Christmas, and they are ready for bed. They want to wait for Santa Claus, but mamma tells them if they don't go to sleep he will not come, for as there is no chimney he must come through the window. They tumble into bed and mamma goes to prepare to play Santa—how different would he the day if Arthur were home. Meanwhile, the children plan to catch Santa, and creeping from bed they place a tub in front of the window and tie a string to the window sash with the other end fastened to one of their feet, so that when the window is raised the string will awaken them and they will catch him for he will have fallen into the tub. The scheme works fine. The window is raised and a form is seen to enter the window, but the crash brings the mother, who sees there Arthur whom grim misfortune has forced to desperate deeds, and he has broken into the house not knowing its occupants. The wife realizes at once his sad plight, and with a hurried explanation, smuggles him into the side room, where he dons the Santa Claus suit she intended to wear, so when the children appear he pretends to be caught by their trap, and they are simply wild with delight.

IN LITTLE ITALY.—One of the most dominant traits in the Sicilian's nature is indefatigability of purpose where a score is to be reckoned. No amount of hindrance or disappointments can shake his bulldog sedulity, for he will wait, days, weeks, and even years to accomplish his plan and this Biograph story portrays this propensity most vividly, making it one of the most thrilling subjects yet released. Marie Cadrona, a widowed mother of two small children, is sought in marriage by Victor Ratazzi, a barber, and Tony Guilletto, a laborer. Marie rejects Tony's suit, but harkens to the love songs of Victor, who serenades the pretty widow accompanied by the accordion. Tony, upon learning of Victor's acceptance, is determined to be revenged. He decides to wait, surprise him and strike him down. Several times the opportunity seems to present itself, but just as the fatal blow is about to be given some one appears on the scene to prevent it. Meanwhile, Victor is totally ignorant of the threatening danger, for Tony plays well the serpent. An Italian ball is held, and Victor escorts Marie there. Tony is present and feels now is his chance. Victor and Marie are dancing and as they pass Tony, Victor drops from a stab wound in the side—of course inflicted by Tony, who gets away unnoticed. The next morning he visits the corner saloon with an expression of satisfaction on his countenance only to learn that his deed was not fatal, and his victim is being cared for at the home of the widow. Enraged beyond measure, he makes his way to her house and tries to get into the room where Victor lies on a cot, wounded. The door being barricaded, he tries to effect an entrance through the window, but a portable cupboard placed in front prevents him, so kicking in the cellar door he climbs up a ladder to a trap in the floor; on this trap the widow places a heavy trunk and she and one of the children sit on it to increase the weight, while she dispatches the other child for the constable. Tony soon overcomes this resistance and forcing his way through the trap is just about to finish the destruction of Victor, when a well directed shot from the constable's gun, who has just arrived, causes the stiletto to fall from his hand. Tony is taken into custody, and Marie, unmolested, attends Victor, looking forward to the day when he will be well enough to make her his wife. In conclusion, we must add that this is positively one of the most intensely thrilling, as well as consistent, productions ever issued.

A HAPPY ACCIDENT.—A wealthy young lady is traveling across the country in her auto on Christmas Eve en route to her sister's home with a trunk full of presents for her nieces. The engine of the auto refuses to work when the journey is half completed. The chauffeur goes to a small cottage near by and inquires for the man of the house. No one is home but two children, a girl of twelve and her little lame sister. The lady enters and finds a home in which poverty is in evidence. The little ones are getting supper, their mother being away at a sick neighbor's.

The lady concludes to remain for the night, and, after instructing the chauffeur to bring in the trunk, she helps the children prepare supper, during the course of which she tells them of Santa Claus. She sends the chauffeur into the woods to cut a tree and, after putting the children to bed, starts to arrange the tree and decorate it with the presents intended for her nieces. The mother returns at this juncture and, after being informed of the intentions of the lady, enter into the Christmas spirit with a will.

The close of the picture shows the joy of the little ones on Christmas morning and the satisfaction of the young lady at giving happiness to others. It is a simple, touching story and full of the joy of Christmas.

THE MISCHIEVOUS ELF.—An elf on mischief bent enters a room in which a young man is making love to his sweetheart. The elf transfers the couple, still seated on the bench, across the room and in front of the door just as the girl's father enters. Of course, the old gentleman's feelings are hurt when he tumbles over the bench, and he is naturally a bit angry.

This is only one of the elf's many pranks; and strange to say the girl's father accuses the young man of causing all the trouble, and promptly orders him out of the house. Shortly after the young man leaves the father and daughter, both see the elf for the first time, and, in their fright, leave the house as rapidly as possible. Overtaking the young man in the woods, the father offers him his daughter's hand if he will get the elf out of his house.

Now, it so happened that the young man knew of a friendly witch who could do wonderful things, and he promptly called upon her. She gave him a bag of magic sand with which to lay a trail into a large box. When the elf followed this trail into the box the young man was to nail him up and throw him overboard. Her directions were followed and the elf disposed of to the satisfaction of the father.

This story, as all stories should, ends happily, with the lovers in each other's arms; and we presume they lived happily ever after. The trick effects in the picture are mystifying and the film is replete with laughable situations and incidents. The photography is also of a high order.

FAUST.—Faust, an aged philosopher and magician who has grown weary of life and has sought in vain for the secret of eternal youth, decides, after a night's long vigil, to call forth from the realms of darkness the evil one to aid him. Mephistopheles appears and offers him his services in return for Faust's soul. The aged philosopher refuses to accept until the devil shows him a vision of Marguerite in all her maiden simplicity and beauty. Faust agrees to accept the compact providing Mephistopheles will give him youth, wealth and love. This the devil agrees to do. The bond is signed—the devil gives him a powerful drink which transforms the aged man into a dashing young cavalier, and forth they go into the world to seek the pleasures of life, but which, under the evil spell, turn to wormwood and gall.

Faust meets Marguerite coming from church and offers to escort her home, but with maidenly modesty she declines. He is fired with love and enamored of her beauty, and the devil offers a plan to win her love. Stealing into her garden, a jewel casket is left filled with "pearls, rubies and diamonds rare." Marguerite finds the casket and cannot forbear to adorn herself with the jewels. It is while she is thus occupied that a neighbor, Dame Martha, discovers her. Shortly afterwards Faust and Mephistopheles appear, and here follows the winning of Marguerite's love in the rose garden.

Night draws its mystic veil around them while the mocking demon gloats over his victims. We next see Marguerite betrayed and deserted. She falls pleading at the shrine of the Virgin for forgiveness, but is even denied this solace by the presence of the devil. Valentine, Marguerite's brother, returns from the war and learns of his sister's betrayal. He seeks out Faust and engages him in a duel. By Mephistopheles' aid Valentine is stabbed. Dying, he curses Marguerite and ends his life as a soldier and a man.

Marguerite's reason has been shaken by her grief and sorrow. She kills her child and is cast into prison, where Mephistopheles brings Faust in order that he may fly with Marguerite, but she, poor thing, does not comprehend. She understands only her great love for him, and, her mind possessed by that one thought, she plucks once again the daisy of love, counting each imaginary petal as it falls. Faust in his agony begs for her forgiveness. Her dying reply, "Forgiveness! Faust, I love thee," tells the whole story, as from his arms she sinks away into eternity. Mephistopheles pronounces her damned, but the angels of heaven appear and proclaim her saved; while Faust sinks into eternal damnation, writhing under the scorn and mockery of the devil, who now claims him for his own.

ESSANAY FILM MFG. CO.

OBJECT: MATRIMONY.—Peace has reigned for three solid weeks at Miss Neverwed's Select School for Young Ladies—an unprecedented record in the history of the institution. In the girl's dormitory, the hotbed of insurrection, a dozen or more young ladies hold counsel, each one earnestly endeavoring to "start something." An opportunity comes when Miss Neverwed, wearing a long, sober face, appears and accuses one of them of some atrocious crime in the schoolroom, of which the girl is innocent. The girls immediately resolve to get even.

Miss Neverwed has a dislike for all men, since years ago she had refused to marry Timothy Pettihone, and the girls, knowing what an annoyance any masculine is to her principal, decide to at least endeavor to force her into marriage. Consequently, the next day an interesting advertisement appears in the personal columns of the local paper:

> MAIDEN LADY, not beautiful, but with warm heart and $30,000, wishes to meet gentleman of means. Object: matrimony. Address J. A., Box 23, Herald Office.

The next day large numbers of answers arrive, to which the girls mail the same reply:

> Dear Sir: I will pass along Main street and Joy avenue about 4 p. m. to-morrow with a companion and will wear a red rose and white waist. JULIET.

At the appointed time on the following afternoon, Miss Neverwed's favorite pupil coaxes her principal out for a walk, after pinning a red rose on her white shirtwaist. At the point named in the letter numbers of persistent suitors crowd about the bewildered Miss Neverwed, each arguing his case and offering her his credentials.

At this critical moment a tall, handsome gentleman comes on the scene, disperses the annoying suitors, lifts his hat to Miss Neverwed and begs permission to escort her home.

At the doorstep she holds him a moment and searches his face.

"Are—you Timothy Pettihone?"

"I am, indeed, my dear Juliet," answers Timothy. "I have come back again to plead my suit."

"O, Timothy," sobs the happy little Juliet, falling into his arms.

A few minutes later the mob of disappointed suitors again come on the scene, but Timothy waves them off, telling them that Miss Neverwed has consented to be his wife.

Later, when Miss Neverwed learns that her good luck came about through her pupils' practical joke, she scolds and lectures a little but ends in showering abundant forgiveness and thanks upon them.

A KISS IN THE DARK.—Peter O'Rourke and his pretty young wife, Mollie, receive a letter from their old-time friend Frank Morrison, who states that he is just returning from India to pay them a short visit. Mollie's heart is made glad, as the letter states that Frank is bringing her a number of priceless curios for her already extensive collection. But Peter is skeptical, as Frank was at one time Mollie's sweetheart and he is not thoroughly convinced that Mollie has quite forgotten him.

Frank arrives. He is warmly welcomed and told to make himself at home. Peter, who is inclined to be jealous, proposes a little scheme to Frank to find out what Mollie would do if another man made love to her.

Mollie and Frank are left alone, Peter stating that he is leaving the house for a few minutes, but in reality he spies on them from the window. Frank begins making love. Mollie, who has learned her husband's plan, resolves to make him thoroughly jealous, and makes love to Frank. Peter from the window shows his deep outrage and when the affair has gone far enough, as he thinks, he enters and upbraids Frank.

Evening comes and Peter tries another scheme. He daubs Mollie's cheek with ink and again leaves the house. Frank enters, mistakes Mollie for his own wife who is expected to arrive at any moment, kisses her and gets a portion of the ink on his own cheek. Mollie screams and runs out of the room. The maid enters, makes fun of Frank, who spitefully kisses her on the cheek. In comes Bill, the hired man, who kisses his fair one and also gets his cheek blackened.

Frank's wife arrives and finds the room empty. Finally Frank appears and kisses her fondly on the cheek. Peter sees the couple and thinks the woman is Mollie, preparing to elope with Frank. He rushes in with a pair of horse pistols and a carving knife, resolved to annihilate the entire colony.

He sees his mistake when Mrs. Morrison reveals her features. Mrs. O'Rourke appears, Peter falls on his knees and begs forgiveness. She takes him in her arms and presses her cheek to his. Peter looks into the glass and at the other guests. All their cheeks are daubed with ink.

THE CARD BOARD BABY

A FAIRY STORY FOR CHILDREN

LENGTH 855 FEET

How many children attend your shows? How many of your pictures do they understand?

These are questions every up-to-date manager should answer. We have investigated the matter very thoroughly and we are convinced that there is a great need of more films adapted to the afternoon shows, that any manager who will advertise to and cater to this trade will come up to his evening's business absolutely on velvet. Try it out. Use a fairy story, a travel film and a good clean comedy and talk big about your Children's Matinees. Don't think the grown-up will not come. The mothers and big sisters will bring the youngsters.

Here is the first of the new KALEM series of FAIRY STORIES for AMERICAN CHILDREN. No tights, no ballets, just clean mystery and fun.

THE CARDBOARD BABY

Briefly, the story of this new film tells how a little girl was taught by a good fairy to control her temper. To be sure it was all a dream, but it seemed a reality to the little girl and she had all sorts of astouishiug and amusing things happen before she awoke.

Get this film and try it out. Write us how it goes. If the idea is a good one we will give you a new subject every week.

THE HEART OF A COWBOY.—Two handsome young Americans, cowboys of the "Bar O" ranch, fall in love with Kitty Blair, the pretty daughter of a neighboring ranchman. The two young fellows have been pals up to the time they meet Kitty, when a bitter rivalry rises between them. Kitty presents Stephen Bronson, one of her admirers, with her latest photograph, but shows her impartiality when she gives Stephen Howard, the other suitor, a similar photograph.

The two young fellows finally resolve to see the girl together and ask her to choose between them. When they state their case to Kitty, she hesitates but a moment and gives her hand to Bronson. Howard manfully withdraws, after shaking hands with Bronson and wishing the two a happy life together.

It is not long, however, before Bronson shows the other side of his nature. Bronson loses money gambling and plans to reimburse himself by appropriating another ranchman's cattle. Bronson takes into his confidence one Will Parsons, another cowpuncher, and when night falls they visit the corral and make away with a half-dozen of the ranchman's choicest steers. Parsons is sent on to sell the cattle while Bronson rides off to visit his sweetheart.

In the meantime discovery of the theft is made, and a photograph of Kitty, bearing the legend, "To my friend Steve," is found close to the spot where the cattle were rounded up.

A visit to Steve Howard's "dobe" follows, but Howard's entire ignorance of the entire affair seems to point out his innocence.

There can be but one other Steve who could be guilty, and Bronson is hunted up. He is apprised at his sweetheart's home, accused of the theft, and is about to be led away to the lynching tree, when Howard, who has come upon the scene, steps in front of Bronson and shoulders the guilt himself.

Bronson is thunderstruck but does not offer to interfere when Howard is led away. He is not quite capable in his black soul of appreciating the nobleness of Howard's sacrifice. On the other hand Howard is firmly convinced that Bronson is innocent and it is to make happy the girl he loves in taking Bronson's place.

Bronson, after the party has left, turns to the girl and begs her to go East with him. She consents and goes into the house to pack her suitcase. While she is in the house Parsons, having sold the cattle and returned with the money, calls Bronson aside and tells him he is ready to divide.

They are in the midst of this transaction when Kitty comes out of the house and hears them talking about the theft. Immediately she realizes Howard's great sacrifice, for the cowardly knave she has agreed to marry, and in a moment desperately resolves to turn them over to justice and to save Howard's life.

They are surprised when they look up into Kitty's revolver, but she forces Bronson to write a confession, clearing Howard, and jumping astride Bronson's horse, gallops off after the sheriff and his posse.

She arrives just in the nick of time. The rope has been thrown over Howard's neck and is ready to draw him to his death. The girl's timely arrival prevents this and her screams for them not to hang the man check them. Kitty brings forth the confession from Bronson, Howard is liberated and Kitty goes to his arms.

The sheriff and his posse jump on their horses again and ride off in pursuit of Parsons and Bronson. They overtake them finally and the two meet their just deserts.

GAUMONT.

THE STRANGER.—The scene depicts the home of a country man, a widower, who has one little daughter. The father's love is all centered in his child and everything goes smoothly and happily until an attractive peasant woman, a stranger from other parts, comes across their pathway. The countryman falls in love with this fascinating creature, whom he marries and brings to share his home with his little daughter.

Antagonism soon manifests itself between the stepmother and daughter. Finally, there is a quarrel and the little girl goes voluntarily away to stay with strangers in a distant town. These people treat her kindly, but homesickness has such an effect on the poor child's health that she writes piteous letters to the father begging him to take her home again.

The deceitful stepmother intercepts this and subsequent letters and reads them to the father in such a manner that he is led to suppose that all is well with his child.

Finally the poor little thing gets so sick with grieving that her guardians become alarmed and take her home.

Then all is explained and the deceitfulness of the treacherous stepmother is exposed. She is expelled by the angry father and the countryman and his little girl are left together in peace. The daughter now teaches the father to read so that he may never be deceived again in the same manner.

THE GREEK SLAVE'S PASSION.—Amid the most beautiful natural surroundings a young shepherd meets a beautiful slave girl and they pledge their love to one another before the statue of the great god Pan, to whom they make an offering of wreaths of flowers.

Unhappily, the poor girl is sold by her master in the slave market of Alexandria to a rich merchant who intends to marry her.

The shepherd lover is in despair and after making careful inquiries he learns of her whereabouts.

He joins a troupe of musicians and dancers and so gets into the palace of the merchant where his sweetheart is. He recognizes her at once and notices how sad she looks. In order to cheer her up he plays a tune with which she is familiar and so makes himself known to her. She throws herself into his arms and evinces the deepest emotion.

As soon as the good merchant sees the condition of affairs he gives up his slave and permits her to go free with her shepherd lover.

THE CARDBOARD BABY.—A modern fairy story for American children.

Scene I.—Elsie Neglects Her Lessons and Has Her Dollie Taken Aaway. "You see, it was this way: I was sitting on our front porch trying to do my lessons, but I just couldn't seem to get them and at last I threw down my slate and books and began to play with dollie. Mamma came out just then and when she found that I did not know my lessons she scolded me dreadfully and took dollie away and said that I could not have her again until I finished my lessons. I was awfully mad and I guess I acted real horrid and I'm sorry for it now. Anyhow, I finished at last, but was awfully tired by that time and I suppose I fell asleep, for the next thing I remember—

Scene II.—Elsie's Dream. "I was running down the garden path, just as a big wagon was passing the house. It had a baby food sign on it. I had made up my mind to run away to some place where I wouldn't have to study any more lessons. As I was crossing the street I looked down, and what do you think? I found a big Cardboard Baby, just like the one I saw in the drug store window. It must have fallen off the wagon.

Scene III.—"Maybe you think I wasn't happy to think that I had found the Cardboard Baby. Of course, it wasn't as nice as dollie, but it was better than nothing to play with. So I took it into the park.

Scene IV.—The Fairy Gives Elsie the Elixir of Life. "And as I was running by the big fountain, I stumbled and fell on the Cardboard Baby, breaking it. Of course that nearly broke my heart, too, and I began to cry, when suddenly I looked up and my heart nearly stopped beating, for there before me, was the most beautiful fairy, just like I read about in my book of fairy stories. Well, she asked why I was crying and I told her. Then she said that if I would promise to be good and always obey my mother and study my lessons and never lose my temper, that she would give me something that would make the Cardboard Baby come to life any time I wanted it to. Of course I promised and then she held out her hand and——I don't know where it came from, but while I was looking at her hand, all of a sudden, a bottle appeared in it, and on the bottle in large letters it said, 'Elixir of Life.' She handed me the bottle and I read the directions and when I looked up again she was gone. I was awful sorry for that and looked all around for her. Well at last I decided to try and bring the baby to life, so I pulled the cork out of the bottle and dropped one little drop of the Elixir on the Cardboard Baby, and, would you believe it, standing right before me, was the prettiest little live baby I had ever seen. It was just exactly like the Cardboard Baby, only it was alive. I was dreadfully scared at first, but when I touched its face and it smiled at me, I just loved it, and loved it and started right home to show it to mamma, only—Scene V.—"I met Howard and Minnie Stuart at their front gate and we all went to play in their yard.

Scene VI.—Elsie's Little Playmates are Frightened. "Howard ran on ahead with Minnie to the front lawn and I followed with the baby, wondering what they would think if they knew about the baby. We started playing 'Ring-a-round-the-Rosy,' when all of a sudden, the baby turned to cardboard again. My! Wasn't Howard and Minnie scared. Howard fell over backward and then both of them ran away screaming. Of course I followed them.

Scene VII.—"I tried to catch them and called them back, but they were too scared and at last I was all out of breath from laughing and running and just had to stop. Then I brought the baby to life again and we started home once more.

Scene VIII.—Fun With Mike, the Gardener. "But we met old Mike, the gardener. He was busy picking up old pieces of paper and dead leaves and taking them away in his wheelbarrow. I called to him and he stopped and when he saw the baby he just fell in love with her, and sat down on the wheelbarrow and took baby on his lap and began to tell us a story. Just then the baby turned to cardboard again. I wish you had been there to see it. You would have died laughing. Mike was nearly scared to death and fell over the wheelbarrow. He was so scared and tried to get away so fast that he fell all over himself. I tried to hold him and explain, but he got away. Wasn't he the foolish old thing? I brought baby to life again and started home once more.

Scene IX.—"I was feeling so happy by this time that I felt like singing and dancing and so I grabbed baby's hands and began to dance with her, when, what do you think? She turned to cardboard again. After that I thought that I would take her home that way and show mamma how I could bring her to life.

Scene X.—The Cardboard Baby Meets With an Accident. "On the way home, I stopped at a pretty lake near our house, to feed the swans. I leaned the Cardboard Baby against the wall and as I was stooping to pick up something to give the swans, the Cardboard Baby fell into the lake. I don't know which of us was the most upset. I couldn't reach it so I got a stick and after a lot of hard work I got her out, but my, she was a sight! All soaked with water just like a dishrag. So I spread her on the ground to dry.

Scene IX.—Elsie Loses Her Temper and the Fairy Punishes Her. "When it was dry it was almost as good as new, only its dress and hair was all mussed up. So I got the bottle and brought the baby to life again so that I could straighten its clothes and hair. When it came to life it acted awful contrary. Just wouldn't stand still and I suppose I must have forgotten my promise to the fairy and lost my temper, because I was just about to slap baby's face when it turned to cardboard again, and I looked up and there stood the fairy, with the saddest look on her face. My! but I was scared. Because I know I had done wrong. The fairy said I had broken my word to her and that I could never bring the Cardboard Baby to life any more. She made me give her the bottle and then she threw it against the wall and smashed it, and was gone. I picked up the pieces of broken bottle and then I realized how bad I had been and fell on the ground sobbing.

Scene XII.—Elsie Awakens and Resolves Never to Lose Her Temper Again. "Mother says that when she came out on the porch I was asleep, but was sobbing as if my heart would break. I told her about my dream and promised to be good and when she found that I had done my lessons before I went to sleep, she gave me back my dollie, and I was happy once more. Anyway, I believe I love dollie best after all. But one thing is certain—'I do believe in fairies.'"

THE POLICEMAN'S CHRISTMAS EVE.—A dainty touch of sentiment and the spirit of Christmas. John Barkman, a policeman, invests heavily in toys for his little ones. He has no time to help trim the tree, for he must hurry to go on duty, but his beat takes him past the house and he promises the little wife to peep in later and see the results of her efforts. Things are different in the Carter home, for Robert Carter has been out of work for several weeks and there is little food and no money for presents. He goes out upon the street to see if he cannot earn a little money in the bustle of Christmas Eve carrying packages, but his way to the shopping district leads him past the policeman's house. He peers in and temptation overcomes him. The window is slightly raised and he climbs in. Barkman, patroling his beat, glances into the window, and is surprised to see a burglar making away with the toys he bought for his little ones. He slips into the house, but before he can make an arrest Carter discovers the tiny stockings dangling from the mantelpiece. He cannot rob other children to make a happy Christmas for his own little ones and he puts the toys back just as Barkman steps out to arrest him. His eloquent tale of poverty and misery touches the officer's heart and with the toys in his arms they set out to verify the story. The truth is easily learned and not only the toys, but a generous gift of money gladdens the hearts of the unfortunates.

THREE CHRISTMAS DINNERS.—Three small boys whose ambitions are greater than their appetites, hit upon a clever scheme for prolonging the Christmas feasting. They find that different dinner hours make it possible to attend three functions. They set out to perfect their plans and each in turn introduces his playfellows to his mother with the doleful tale that they are to have no Christmas dinner at their home and the request that they be permitted to share the home dinner. Each of the three members returns a ready assent and presently we see them hugely enjoying the first of the feasts. The board groans with the weight of good things which rapidly disappear under the valiant attack of the youthful trio and they hurry off to the second dinner with joyous anticipation. But, somehow, the second dinner does not taste as good as the first; they stop with the second helping of turkey and only have ice cream three times. Still worse is the third dinner. The hospitable hostess is alarmed at their lack of appetite and anxiously urges them to eat, but they push their plates listlessly aside and are glad when they are excused from the table. You can guess the rest, a lively climax to a most attractive story; one that will more than hold its own with other Christmas releases.

BLISSVILLE THE BEAUTIFUL.—The Booths, a young married couple, envy a friend who recently moved to the country. They learn that she located the new home in the newspapers and Mrs. Booth urges her husband to get all of the Sunday newspapers that they may find a home of their own where healthful breezes blow and city nuisances do not exist. Blissville, the Beautiful, seems the most attractive name and they decide to investigate. The city agency of the new suburb is visited,

A TRAP FOR SANTA CLAUS

How the artlessness of two children righted a great wrong

This Biograph subject is possibly one of the most unique Christmas stories ever produced. It shows a poor family of husband, wife and two small children. Things have gone badly with the man. There is no work for him, and starvation seems their inevitable lot. Despairing, he seeks solace in drink, and while in this condition he determines that they would be better off without him, so he leaves. Shortly after, the wife is informed that her aunt's estate, long in litigation, has been settled, leaving her a moderate fortune. It is now Christmas Eve in their new home and the children are bent upon encountering Santa Claus, and set a trap for him. The mother, of course, must needs play Santa. However, the father, whom grim misfortune forces to desperate deeds, breaks into the house, ignorant as to who the occupants are, and is caught in the children's trap. Hence their little trick brought about the happiest Yuletide they had ever known. Length, 989 feet.

Released December 23rd, 1909

IN LITTLE ITALY

The story of a rejected suitor's persistence

One of the most dominant traits in the Sicilian's nature is indefatigability of purpose where a score is to be reckoned, and this Biograph story vividly portrays this where the widow is sought in marriage by two suitors. Victor is the favored one, and Tony, the rejected, vows revenge. He follows him from place to place, and just as he is about to strike the blow something occurs to prevent it. Finally, at an Italian ball, while waltzing around the hall he passes Victor dancing with the widow, and his chance comes. Elated at first, he is furious when he learns that his deed was not fatal, and his victim is being cared for by the widow. He goes to her house and tries to finish his work. The door is barricaded, so he tries to enter by the window. Here he also meets resistance, and he finally gets in by way of a trap from the cellar. It looks as if he would be successful, but the timely arrival of the police not only saves his intended victim, but puts him where he can do no harm. Length, 956 feet.

but they want to see the place itself and insist upon going down.

Accompanied by a man from the agent's they arrive at Blissville, a tiny flag station, and their hopes are rudely dashed, but they are still under the thrall of the persuasive talker and they permit him to take them over the land. They fall into mud holes and tiny lakes, they suffer all sorts of mishaps, not the least of which is getting caught in a heavy shower. When the skies clear they find that they have a long wait for a train and in their hurry to get back to town they borrow a handcar and escape from the still eager agent.

THE NEW CHIEF.—Ever since the days of the Caliph of Bagdad, who went among his subjects in disguise, putting yourself in the other fellow's place has been a favorite recreation of new public officials. The new Chief Superintendent of the Municipal Refuges has heard of the many abuses which have crept into the city's charitable system and he determines to make a personal test disguised as a tramp. Refuge "A" is visited first and things happen following his visit. Word is passed along the line and the Superintendent of Refuge "B" warns his subordinates to prepare for a visitation. Weary Willie, an amiable hobo, applies for a night's lodging. He treads softly, as experience has taught him to do, and he is surprised and not a little alarmed at the cordial reception given him, for he is mistaken for the new Chief and after being registered is given the supper ordered by the Superintendent for himself. When the last crumb is swallowed Willie feels like a different man and a cigar completes his satisfaction. He grows critical and declines to sleep in the dormitory, demanding a better bed. He is accommodated with the Superintendent's own bed while the latter prepares to take a nap in a chair. As he sleeps the real Chief enters and finds no one to receive him. He wakens the sleeping official and discloses his identity. Willie is rudely roused from his slumbers and thrown into the street, but we are left to guess what happens to the negligent Superintendent which calls for no great tax upon the imagination.

THE PERSISTENT POET.—Algernon Swinburne Higgs is a poet. He is a poor poet—most poets are poor—but Algernon is poor because he is a poor poet. He is not even able to pay his washwoman her trifling bill. Instead he reads her his new ode and drives her from the room. Putting on his hat he goes out to sell it, but he shoots the chute out of the first editorial office he enters and when he tries to make a second attempt he runs into an artist and as a result of the encounter the later's drawing is smashed. Algernon pursues his way reading the poem to unwilling victims until he falls into the hands of the police. In court many of his victims appear against him and he is sentenced to three months on the rock pile. This should be enough to cure any ordinary poet, but Algernon is not an ordinary poet. He hides his poem and brings it out when the guard is not watching. All of the convicts are stunned by the weird composition and even the guard falls senseless as the poet reads on. Seeking new audience he enters the office of the warden and when that official pleads for mercy a new idea strikes him. He demands that his clothes he brought him and exchanges the striped suit for his own apparel, stalking forth into the street, escorted by the warden who is only too glad to get rid of this most unwelcome guest.

THREE FINGERED JACK.—"Three Fingered" Jack Doyle is the product of the slums, a good hearted boy when left alone, but a thief through force of environment. He is loafing in one of the cheap dives in the poor quarter when a more energetic companion proposes an enterprise of burglary and Jack consents. But a moment before he threw away his schooner of beer at the urging of a Salvation Army lassie, but now he is equally willing to accept an invitation to crime. The robbery is successful, the money being abstracted from a desk by means of pick-locks which leave no trace of the crime. The day following the Salvation Army girl visits the scene of the robbery on a collection trip and through circumstances is accused of the theft. She has seen the imprint of Jack's hand upon the blotter on the table and when she is permitted to go she hurried to the dive, taxing Jack with the robbery. He admits his guilt, for he has learned to love the gentle faced little woman and he makes his partner give up his share of the spoils. Lily leads him to the church before she takes him to the home of the robbed man where he makes confession and restitution and in response to Lily's plea the charge is not pressed. Jack is to be given a chance to make a man of himself and under Lily's loving guidance it is clear that he will succeed in bringing out the good inherent in his nature.

PATHE FRERES.

THE DEATH OF THE DUKE D'ENGHIEN.—The incidents in this picture took place in 1803-4 when Napoleon was First Consul. In August, 1803, Napoleon discovered a conspiracy batched in England in which three Englishmen were implicated. The aim of the conspirators was to restore to the throne of France one of the Bourbons. The Prince de Conde, father of the Duke D'Enghien, was in England at this time and he probably was associated with the conspirators. The Duke D'Enghien had already borne arms against the French Republic in the Austrian army, but there was no particular reason for supposing that he was interested in this particular conspiracy against Napoleon Bonaparte, except that it had been learned through some of the conspirators, that had already been arrested, that a Prince of the Bourbon family was about to come on French soil and take active measures towards regaining the throne. As the Duke D'Enghien was residing at this time at Ettenheim just over the border line and was at times absent from his home several days together, Napoleon fixed on him as the probable Prince. This was altogether wrong, however, as the Duke was not interested in the affairs of state, but very much interested in those of the heart. He was very much in love with and spent most of his time in paying court to the beautiful Charlotte de Rohan and in the pleasures of the chase. One of Napoleon's officers was sent to Ettenheim, however, to spy on the Duke and on March 10th this officer sent a report to Napoleon which convinced the latter that the Duke was one of the conspirators. After consulting with his ministers it was decided to rush into Germany and capture the Duke. This was done five days after Napoleon received the information, and the Duke was brought to Strasburg and then to Versailles. Napoleon was so undecided as to what punishment to mete out to his prisoner that he retired to Malmaison for several days to give the matter serious consideration, but finally came to the conclusion that the Duke's death was a necessary political move, as the royalists must be intimidated at any cost. Murat, Napoleon's brother-is-law, was so disinclined to sign the Duke's death warrant that the first consul was incensed at their lack of appreciation of the necessity of this political step and signed the order himself. The Duke was conducted to the place of execution in the courtyard of Versailles by Col. Savary, where he was shot to death. His body was buried on the spot where he fell. It was made known after his death that Mr. Real had been sent by Napoleon to question the Duke further to find if possible a sufficiently good excuse to pardon him, but Mr. Real was not told of Napoleon's message until late and arrived at Versailles a few moments after the execution.

CONTEST FOR A HANDKERCHIEF.—Gus is making violent love to his cousin Sue, to whom he is engaged, when all at once, he has a desire to sneeze and finds to his consternation that he is without that very necessary article, a pocket handkerchief. Becoming very much excited in his embarrassment, he begins turning his pockets inside out and getting redder and looking more awkward every minute, until Sue, becoming disenchanted with her foolish looking lover, hastens to greet Arthur, whom she sees approaching. It is plain that the latter is gaining ground with Miss Sue, when all at once (due to the same draught that was the cause of the downfall in his fiancee's estimation of poor Gus) he begins to sneeze and is unable also to locate his handkerchief. He forgets that on entering he had laid it with his hat on the table, where Gus was fortunate to find it and owing to which good fortune the latter is able to regain the side of his fiancee, who is now alone, as Arthur, feeling that awful tickling sensation in his nose, had to flee.

THE LOVE TOKEN.—Mercedes, the beautiful Mexican girl, loves Pietro, who is poor, and as a token of her love gives him a medal which the faithful fellow hangs around his neck. He is very much in love with Mercedes, but she is courted by a wealthy planter and her father, who is anxious that his daughter make a good match, gives the planter his consent and encouragement to the suit. The latter, however, discovers the love of Mercedes for Pietro, and being of a very jealous nature and unscrupulous withal, hides behind some bushes and from this ambush shoots his rival. Pietro, however, is not killed, as the bullet strikes the medal on his breast and is stopped in its murderous career.

Mercedes' father, upon hearing of the attempted assassination, at last awakens to the true nature of the planter and drives him from the country. Then calling his daughter and her devoted admirer he grants his consent to their marriage and gives them his blessing. The picture is all taken in the open air and is a marvel of perfect action and photography.

THE BIRTH OF JESUS.—This story needs no detailed account, as it is beyond doubt familiar to everyone. The film follows the Bible story closely in the inimitable style of Pathe. A most appropriate and entertaining film for Christmas. The picture is beautifully colored.

AGRICULTURE IN HUNGARY.—This picture will be thoroughly enjoyed by everyone, but particularly those to whom rural life appeals. The wide wheat fields are shown with the Hungarian peasants at work gathering the grain and threshing the golden harvest. In Hungary the women work in the fields with the men and the quaint costumes add a picturesque touch to the beautiful scene.

THE GOOD DOCTOR.—Marie, the doctor's daughter, after setting the clock forward, makes her poor old father believe that it is his bedtime and sees him safely on his way to bed. She then jumps up on a chair and with a long pole, kept for that purpose, raps three times on the ceiling to let her lover know that papa is out of the way and he can come down and visit her for a while. The lover, quick to respond to the summons, is soon on the scene and the two are billing and cooing together, happy at the thought that there is no danger of being disturbed by a straitlaced and unsympathetic papa.

The latter, however, upstairs in his comfortable big bed, finds it impossible to go to sleep and wonders why, little dreaming that it is far from being his usual hour for retiring. Thinking he will go down to the library and read a while, he almost catches the two lovers, but his daughter's presence of mind saves them. Shoving her lover into the fireplace, she hastens to greet papa. The latter on entering finds it somewhat chilly so insists upon lighting the logs in the fireplace. An invisible hand, however, snatches the match from him each time he tries to light the wood. He finally succeeds, however, and the poor lover has to climb right up the chimney in an effort to get away from the flames and smoke. We get a good view of him as he makes his perilous ascent crawling along like a monkey with his poor face covered with soot. The daughter is at her wits' end, but finally decides to give papa a narcotic; papa does not feel thirsty, however, so her plans are all upset. She then writes a letter and signing it with the name of the doctor's oldest patients, rings the door bell and answering it herself brings her father the note. The latter hurries off and Marie looks up the chimney in an agony of fear. Her lover comes bounding out and suffering agonies from the heat rushes over and drains the glass containing the narcotic. Before long he falls into a deep sleep and the terrified young girl finally succeeds in getting him out in the hall in an attempt to take him back to his own apartment. Just as she is pulling and tugging away at his limp body she hears her father and rushes back to her own rooms. The doctor, seeing the man lying helpless, quickly tries to revive him, and failing to do this picks him up and takes him into his own apartment, where the application of electricity soon restores him to consciousness. The lover is so grateful to the kind doctor that he writes to his sweetheart saying that in honor they can no longer deceive the poor old man who has saved his life, and unless she promises to tell her father all he can no longer visit her.

THE HAPPY WIDOWER.—Not wishing one of her own sex to enjoy the companionship of her husband after her death and also have the benefit of her fortune, an heiress in making her will, by which she bequeathes everything to her better half, adds a clause that should the latter marry she will haunt him for the remainder of his days. When the maker of the will passes away the husband at first pays little attention to the strange clause, taking it all as a joke. He soon finds out, however, that his wife meant what she said, for every time he begins to flirt with a pretty woman an invisible hand grabs him by the leg and throws him headlong on his face. No matter where the widower happens to be, in the street, in the house, it matters little where, the ghost (a tall, thin woman enveloped in a filmy white veil) is always on the watch and causes the poor man no end of embarrassment. Realizing that he cuts anything but a romantic figure as he goes crashing down on his face while whispering some impassioned words in the ear of a beautiful woman, the widower comes to the conclusion that the only thing to do is to renounce all right to his former wife's fortune if he wishes to retain his dignity as a man and marry the woman of his choice without fear of being molested by the ghost of his former life partner.

THROUGH THE HOOD RIVER VALLEY AND ALONG THE COLUMBIA RIVER IN OREGON.—An educational scenic novelty of compelling interest, an excerpt made from a vast quantity of recent negatives taken along the Northwest Coast of America to the stay-at-homes. The film will prove a revelation, to the traveler it will recall many pleasant moments spent in that beautiful region of scenic wonders—"Oregon."

The salmon industry is little understood by the average citizen and the marvelous reproduction here shown will leave a lasting impression on the minds of all who witness it, glimpses of the gigantic apple interests, the Hood River Valley, entertaining panoramic views of orchards containing thousands of trees, the methods of caring for them, and the final disposition of the crop are all placed before your eyes, and in a few minutes of time you will learn more about the industries peculiar to this section of America than you would gain by weeks of arduous travel.

THE CHRISTMAS MARTYRS.—A romantic tragedy of early Rome, the story woven around the life of the Empress Faustina, the mother of Nero. She was a corrupt and voluptuous queen, who knew no law but to break it, obeyed no will except her own, and at the period of her life when occur the scenes of our present picture, she was thirty-five years of age, and madly infatuated with a handsome Roman soldier, Flavian Gato. He was a general in the Queen's service, and our opening scene shows Faustina in her magnificent pleasure craft, drifting down the Tiber to meet her lover upon his return from the wars. Flavian has prepared a feast for the

There Are 3 Good Reasons Why You Should Buy

THE EDISON KINETOSCOPE

If you are starting in the motion picture business.

First—The pictures are constant, steady and clear, insuring good patronage from the start. No jerks, blurs, stops and long waits between.

Second—The Edison is the most durable machine made—requires fewest repairs and will outlast any other. You get all the profit and you keep it.

Third—If you buy a cheap machine first and then have to buy a good one, you have not only injured your patronage, but you've doubled the cost of your instrument and it will take you twice as long to get your money back. Buy the best machine first—the Edison Kinetoscope.

Empress, and we are present at the revels—a faithful reproduction of life in Rome nearly two thousand years ago. After Faustina's departure, Flavian regales his Roman friends with a description of his battles. A slave girl, Naodamia, enters with a flagon of wine, and Flavian sees her for the first time; he becomes enamored of the girl's beauty and innocence, dismisses his followers, and orders the girl to entertain him. The impetuous Roman is used to having his own way with both men and women, and when Naodamia pleads to be gone, the infatuated soldier madly declares his love. "No, no, my lord, you cannot and must not love me, for see I am a Christian," and she holds up a cross, the emblem of her faith, before his astonished eyes. It is well known throughout Rome that the Empress hates Christians and never fails to destroy them wherever found. Flavian does not betray the girl's confidence by denouncing her, but bids her go. Cupid, however, played the same pranks in these times as he does to-day—Flavian cannot dismiss the girl from his mind. They meet again, but she is adamant: "Become a Christian; believe in the true God and His Holy Sacrament of Marriage and I will become thy wife as well as thy slave; coerce me and I will destroy my body, that my soul can live purer hereafter." Flavian listens to her pleadings and consents to accept her faith. Mantua, a jester and confidant of Faustina, overbears the compact, and rushing into the Queen's retiring room, gleefully tells of the interview. The Queen accompanies him to a rest hall within Flavian's grounds, and there she sees her lover holding the Christian girl in his arms. Mad with jealous fury, she is about to order their arrest, when Mantua makes a discovery—it is a small, white wooden cross, that has become unfastened from Naodamia's girdle and fallen to the ground. "See, your Majesty, she is lion food, for she is a hated Christian!" The Queen laughs with savage joy at the vengeful project this information offers. "But stop! He, too, must be compromised. He is strong with the Senators. I must know that he, too, belongs to the cursed sect." Disguised, she follows the Christians to an underworld church beneath the streets of Rome and accompanied by her soldiers she arrests Flavian and Naodamia at the Christian altar. Flavian pleads to be allowed to marry the slave girl. The Empress feigns consent and offers Flavian a glass of wine to show that she forgives him, but the wine is drugged, and as the soldier falls unconscious at her feet she proceeds to put into execution a plan of vengeance that only such a mind as hers could have conceived. She calls the populace together at the circus maximus and when the crowd has assembled she announces her program, sports of the arena, then twenty Christians fed to the lions. Amongst the martys waits Naodamia, a note left by Faustina for Flavian reads, "When you awake from the drug I gave you the Christian slave you dared to love will be no more. Come to the lion's feast if you dare." The horror stricken Flavian awakes, reads, and rushing to his stables secures a steed and gallops madly to the circus, pushes his way through the gaping crowd to Faustina's side. We have seen the poor girl dragged to the lion's barred door, seen her kneel in supplication. Flavian looks over the box rail and finds he is too late to save the woman he loves, and maddened by her awful fate, draws his sword and before her attendants can prevent he has revenged Naodamia. As the guards of the Empress clutch at his robe he leaps to the arena below and finds death beside his lost love.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

TWO CHRISTMAS TIDES.—The first scene of this pretty Christmas story shows two rival suitors for the hand of a young lady. She loves the one, but the other is wealthy and she chooses the wealth, while the rejected one, with his faith in woman shattered, remains a bachelor, prosperous but alone.

Ten years later. A bare and poverty-stricken home. The rich man having died and left no provision for his widow, she supports herself and her children by taking in washing. It is Christmas Eve and out of their window the children are wistfully watching the decorating of a Christmas tree in the window of a well-to-do neighbor. The poor mother sighs as she realizes that her loved ones cannot enjoy such pleasures as she and the little boy goes out to deliver her work.

The little girl, left alone again, goes to the window and watches the preparations across the road and as they pull down the curtain, shutting off her view she, with childish simplicity, writes a postal card to Santa Claus:

"Dear Santa: Please don't forget Bobby and me. Mamma is a widow and has no money. We live at 76 Wilson street on the top floor.
"MARIE TRIMLOW."

She goes out to mail the card, but finds that she is too small to reach the letter box and asks a passing gentleman to oblige. He becomes interested and looking at the card recognizes the name of the woman he loved and lost. Asking the girl a few questions he tells her that Santa will surely not forget.

It is Christmas. A tiny plant on the table is all the tree that Mrs. Trimlow and her children can have. A knock at the door. Bobby opens and starts back in wonder as a really and truly Santa enters laden with all kinds of presents. After he has distributed the gifts and the children are spreading them out in another room he pulls off his mask and reveals himself. It does not take long for Mrs. Trimlow to yield to his entreaty, and a more happy Christmas party it would be hard to find.

THE FORGOTTEN WATCH.—Jumping at wrong conclusions has often brought the most dignified personages into ridiculous situations, but an actual misconception and its finale was never more cleverly illustrated than in this Vitagraph comedy. Police Commissioner Forgetry leaves his home to keep an appointment but forgets his watch on the bureau, which his wife discovers after he has gone and places it in a drawer for safe keeping. Forgetry boards a crowded trolley, and when he alights at his destination he feels for his watch. Watch and chain gone, he jumps at the conclusion that he has been robbed, and as a young man who has also gotten off the car at the same time rushes away in a hurry, Forgetry thinks this must be the thief. After a hot chase and a fight, in which Forgetry gets decidedly the worst of it, he has the young man arrested and at the police station excitedly identifies the watch, which is passed over to him and the young man is locked up in spite of his protests. Forgetry is too mussed up after his chase to keep his appointment, so he goes home and explains to his wife the cause of his disordered appearance. She goes to the bureau drawer and produces her husband's timepiece; and he, after recovering from his surprise, calls up the police sergeant at the station and explains the case and asks that the young man be discharged and sent to his house. Forgetry makes humble apologies for the mistake and hands the young man back his watch. Seeing the young man to the door, Forgetry offers him a cigar, strikes a match for him and while he is lighting the cigar the young man deftly helps himself to Forgetry's watch and departs. Forgetry goes inside and his wife, missing the fob, asks where is the watch. The expression on Forgetry's face, as he finds he has been "stung" and collapses in a chair, would bring a smile to the face of a Sphinx.

THE COOK MAKES MADEIRA SAUCE.—The manager of a large hotel, having prepared a banquet for a distinguished party, sends for the chef and gives him directions, among which is to prepare a Madeira sauce. We next see the chef coming up out of the cellar with three bottles of Madeira under each arm. As he enters the kitchen the three or four other cooks are electrified by the appearance of half a dozen bottles of wine and asks what they are for as they crowd around. The chef points to the menu and all laugh, with sidelong glances at the bottles, while the chief cook agrees that they will drink to the success of the sauce with one bottle. One by one the bottles are emptied, while the cooks become hilarious and their duties are neglected. The last bottle the chief cook seizes and says that must be used for the sauce, but the temptation is too strong and it also is emptied.

The chef is now at a loss to prepare his sauce, but spies a bottle of Worcestershire sauce and gets an idea. He empties it in a saucepan, adds some red pepper and some other equally fiery condiments, helped by the other cooks, who by this time are scarcely able to stand.

Meanwhile the diners are seated at the table and the waiters begin to bring on the dishes. A young lady tastes one of the dishes and puts her handkerchief to her mouth; others taste their dishes and get their mouths burned. General disorder. The manager is called and, picking up a dish, enters the kitchen and asks what it means. "This sauce is no good." "No good!" cries the inebriated cook: "call my cooking no good! Take that—and that!" as he dashes the contents of the dishes over the manager. The waiters rush in and a general melee follows, ending with the firemen being called and a stream of water being played on the drunken cooks to drive them from the kitchen.

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.—Theseus, the Duke of Athens, is engaged to be married to Hippolyta. One of the Duke's courtiers has a daughter, Hermia, who, for business reasons, he decides shall marry Demetrius; but she is in love with Lysander. Her father appeals to the Duke and he decrees that Hermia must obey her father or forever remain unmarried. The lovers decide to elope and they are followed by the rejected suitor, Demetrius, and Helena, who loves him in vain.

On the night of the elopement a number of townspeople are rehearsing in the woods a play which they intend to present at the wedding of Duke Theseus. The eloping lovers, followed by Demetrius and Helena, wander to the same part of the forest that the players frequent.

Meanwhile among the fairies of the forest a little love episode has ended in a tiff and Oberon, the king of the fairies, sends his messenger, Puck, for an herb, which, when placed upon the eyes of a sleeper, will cause him or her to love the first creature seen upon awakening.

The eloping lovers, Lysander and Hermia, overcome by fatigue, have lain down to sleep, as also have Demetrius and Helena. Puck, a mischievous sprite, touches the eyes of Lysander with the magic herb and he first sees Helena when he awakes and immdiately falls in love with her. Demetrius, who has also felt the magic spell, awakes and also first sees Helena and loves her. Helena now has two lovers and Hermia, who formerly had two, now has none. The two men quarrel over Helena. Puck has also come across the tradesmen rehearsing their play, and because Bottom, a weaver, insists that he can act a part, Puck changes his head into that of an ass. Titania, the Queen of the fairies, awakes and discovering Bottom, the ass, falls in love with him.

Oberon, the king of the fairies, discovering the mischief that has been done by his messenger, orders Puck to keep the quarreling lovers apart until the ravel is untangled. He restores Bottom to his normal shape and Titania to her normal senses. Lysander's love for Hermia is restored, while Demetrius is allowed to remain in love with Helena.

The Duke and his retinue, coming through the forest on a hunting expedition in the morning, find the four lovers happily paired off and the next day there are three weddings instead of one and the tradespeople give their play in honor of the occasion.

LEST WE FORGET.—It is Christmas eve, and an impoverished mother and child are shivering, hungry, in their cheerless home. Too weak to go herself, the mother writes a note, and the little girl goes out with it in the hope of obtaining relief. She is seated on the doorstep of a fine mansion as an auto rolls up and a finely dressed child of her own age alights; the poor waif just hands her the note, when the mother sees them; she promptly summons the butler, who orders the child away, and they enter the house

Inside the fine home, we see a nurse putting the little girl to bed; but she has written her note to Santa Claus, and when she is deep in slumberland fond parents, butler and servants stealthily carry a great array of toys up to the room, her usual Christmas treat.

But the poor, ragged child—she has gone home empty-handed and to bed supperless. The broken-hearted mother sees the piteous scrawled note to Kris Kringle, and resolves to do something to cheer the little innocent heart; but her constitution is too weak from want—she reels back from the door and falls to the hard floor.

Meanwhile the wealthy child has dreamed that she herself was poor, and she sees herself and mother living in the barren little room; a big, live French doll takes her there, and she and mamma go out begging on the streets; and she is cold and hungry—and suddenly awakens. Her cries arouse the household, parents and servants soon fill the room, and she tells them of her dream; and as she tells them of it she remembers the little girl who gave her the note yesterday, which she had put in her coat pocket.

Mother takes it out now, reads it and in a jiffy all are getting up a relief expedition. With a big basket of good cheer, they go to the address given in the note, and the sight that greets their eyes melts their hearts; tenderly they lift the poor young mother from the floor, where she had fallen, and to their fine home they take her and the child.

It is Christmas morn, and we see the forlorn souls being gladdened by the blessed Yuletide sunshine that lights up the hearts of men.

AN ITALIAN LOVE STORY.

Marica, a young Italian girl, when carrying from a vineyard a basket on her head, spurns assistance offered by Philipo, but later gladly accepts aid from Guido. This naturally angers Philipo, who awaits his chance for revenge, which comes all too soon. He is ploughing lazily, and when reprimanded by Guido, starts a quarrel. He comes off the victor, but in his haste to get away from his crime, leaves his knife. When Guido is discovered, Marica, after overcoming her grief, recognize's Philipo's weapon, and vows to avenge Guido. Philipo leaves his native town, but not without first being seen by a young boy, who darts off to inform Marica. When she learns of this, she, too, bids farewell to her home and starts after Philipo. A year later she is playing an organ in the streets in New York, and is surrounded by many listeners. A man joins the crowd and in him Marica recognizes Philipo, whom she attempts to stab, but is prevented by two men. He escapes, while Marica is held. Philipo, however, meets with an untimely end. He fails to hear warning of a blast, and keeps on working among the rocks. They find him dying and carry him to a soft spot, where Marica finds him. Seeing his miserable plight, she throws away the knife and leaves his punishment in the hands of the Lord.

POWERS CO.

EXCELSIOR.—Weary Waggles, a fat, lazy hobo, seeing a sign outside the Excelsior Food Company's door calling for men to engage in easy work, applies and on account of his heroic figure is immediately hired as the leader of the advertising crew that has been engaged to proclaim to the world the merits of this wonderful food. The arvertising army issue forth amidst the cheering plaudits of an enthusiastic populace. Led by Weary encased in polished armor and mounted on a spirited gray jackass, the line of march continue to the very center of the city, where Weary, surrounded by his valiant army, mounts a box and declaims volubly on the use of Excelsior as a national food. A young gypsy girl, pursued by a cruel father, sees the knightly figure and appeals to Weary for protection, which he and his army give, until threatened by the long stiletto of the angry parent, who shows such willingness to use it on the entire outfit that the army and leader scatter in all directions. The exertion of Weary's quick getaway and his trouble in gathering his scattered force together have had a somewhat depressing effect and the army gathers together in a secluded street to rest and incidentally make a meal of the remaining food samples. Here Weary is approached by a lean individual who relates to him the wonderful adventures of that famous knight, Don Quixote. He marvels that Weary with his knightly figure does not go forth and seek adventure. Weary's laughable adventures in his endeavors to aid the distressed will always be of historical interest. Unfortunately for him all his endeavors seem to result in each case in his getting treatment of a decidedly harsh nature. Offering his services to a fair maiden in distress, his efforts in her behalf result in his being soaked from head to foot with a garden hose, after which he is thrown down the well by the enemy. His exploit of the woodshed results in the entire dispersal of his army, who decide that self-preservation is better than valor. Endeavoring to save a runaway baby carriage, he is held up by a policeman. In aiding a cook to subdue a fire in a kitchen the only reward he obtains is burns and bruises. To crown it all, his services offered to an eloping couple end by his being filled with buckthos by an irat parent, arrested and thrown into the adjoining cell to his faithful jackass, where he now is a sadder but wiser man.

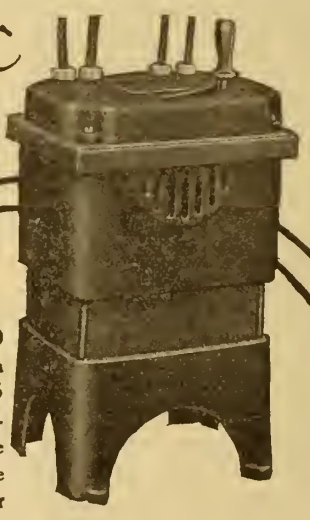
COMPENSARC

This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills



Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

We Want Every Picture Show In America to Try Our

Silverine
TRADE MARK

CURTAIN COATING

If your Exchange don't handle it, order direct from us. Send cash with order and we will prepay the Express Charges. SILVERINE is the BEST Curtain Paint on Earth We guarantee it to be the best. It will cut the ghost and glary whites out of your picture, and the objects will stand out in an almost stereoscopic relief. Silverine gives a soft, but intensely brilliant picture, that is pleasing to the eyes. Good pictures advertises your business. You can't get good pictures without SILVERINE. A trial will convince.

"Down With That Fool Ten Per Cent!"

Exhibitors everywhere are determined to knock that ten per cent penalty of the trust film exchanges higher than Gilroy's kite and the result is a regular stampede to the live Independent exchanges. And now's the time to keep your head cool and level. Don't switch your business to any exchange on God's green earth till you are first dead sure that that particular exchange is actually buying the newest Independent films from week to week. There are lots of exchanges claiming to be "Independent" but which are not buying one cent's worth of new films. They are operating on old, old, old stuff. They are taking advantage of the stampede toward the Independent movement. It is a physical impossibility for them to give you film service that is fit to be used in even the worst kind of a "dump." How can you be sure which Independent exchange is buying? That's easy. Write to the reputable Independent manufacturerers and ask them! You'll find that I am by far the biggest buyer of new Independent films in America and am therefore best equipped to give you an ideal, representative Independent service. Satisfy yourself on this score. It will mean hard dollars and cents to you. Become Independent, but DO IT RIGHT!

HERE I AM

new, right out of the bandbox, with the best makes of Independent pictures. I have been an exhibitor for several years and know the wants of an exhibitor. How many times have I put on my program to see poorly developed pictures with no story at all and jumping all over the screen. I would cuss and say to myself, why in the D——— does the exchange buy those kind of pictures? Occasionally a good one would come and keep me living in hopes. But I became tired for the sake of my customers and my pocketbook. So I have opened an exchange, the biggest and best in this part of the country, receiving TWELVE REELS weekly of the best Foreign and American Makes. Now, Mr. Exhibitor, I AM THE MAN YOU HAVE BEEN WAITING FOR. I CAN ASSURE YOU A FAR MORE SUPERIOR SERVICE THAN OTHER EXCHANGES AND AT A REASONABLE PRICE, TOO

Write or call and be convinced that I have and can deliver the goods.

THREE XMAS DINNERS

Three boy friends accept invitations of their respective mothers and thus are treated to three Xmas dinners. One tastes good, two are too many, and the third is not appreciated at all. An excellent comedy. Length, 495 ft.

A POLICEMAN'S XMAS EVE

A policeman surprises a burglar in his own home. The old man confesses that he wanted to steal some toys for his little children, as he cannot afford to buy them Xmas presents. Upon investigation the policeman learns the truth and plays Santa Claus himself. Length, 440 ft.

RELEASED DECEMBER 23, 1909.

BLISSVILLE THE BEAUTIFUL

A young couple attracted by the beautifully worded advertisement of a real estate agent, decide to purchase a country site. Wishing to see Blissville, the much praised town, they find that the real estate does not do any honor to its name. This is the best comedy of the year. Length, 830 ft.

Your satisfaction comes first--or ours not at all

We are not satisfied unless we give our customers more both in Quality and in Service than they can get elsewhere. Otherwise this would be an ordinary Film Exchange.

The results is the established confidence—both in our Film Service and in ourselves—of an unusually large number of very particular exhibitors.

It is only by giving the best of ourselves as to both Quality and Service that we achieve the customer's own idea of satisfaction in a Film Service.

Just now we are proving the sterling merits of Premier Film Service to over a hundred accounts.

Can we add your account.

ITALA FILM CABLE SIMILAR

TO THE TRADE:—

On December 20, 1909, a two-page letter on the letter head of the Film Import and Trading Co., and signed by that firm was sent you. The letter did not state that the N. Y. Motion Picture Co. did not have the Ambrosio and Itala contracts, but informed the trade in general that they (The Film Import and Trading Co.) were the sole agents of the two concerns aforementioned, under a contract with Raleigh & Robert, of Paris, which purports to expire some time in 1913.

We, THE N. Y. MOTION PICTURE CO., desire to inform you and every one connected with the film trade, that we have contracts direct with Ambrosio and Itala Film Cos., for the exclusive agency in the United States of America of all their products.

The contract of itself being a lengthy document, we have had these two concerns cable us confirmations of the same for publication in the Trade Papers, of which the above is a reproduction.

Mention was made in the letter of the Film Import and Trading Co. referred to that it was possible to falsify the names of these makers on film purported to have been manufactured by them, or cause the unloading of a quantity of so-called "cold" and "old copies," which may be in the United States at this time.

In this wise, we desire to inform you that we stand ready, and take the responsibility in each and every instance that the goods which will be released by our concern will be fresh goods, new subjects, and released on dates corresponding to those in Europe, as our arrangements with these concerns require shipment to be made to us within sufficient time to provide for this contingency.

This notice to you should once and for all set your mind at rest as to the true condition of affairs affecting the products of the aforementioned manufacturers. It also would be well for those persons purchasing film advertised as products of Ambrosio and Itala Film Companies to ascertain for their own satisfaction that the goods they are getting at the present time are strictly goods manufactured by these concerns, and are up-to-date fresh productions.

Yours truly,

N. Y. MOTION PICTURE CO.,
Chas. O. Baumann, Sec'y and Treasurer.

BISON FILMS

ONE REEL A WEEK TRADE MARK

REGULAR RELEASE DAY FRIDAY TRADE MARK

FOUR REELS A WEEK

Beginning with the week of January 10th, 1910, we will issue four reels a week on regular release days, as follows:

Tuesday,	January 11, 1910,	a "Bison"
Wednesday,	" 12, 1910,	Italia
Friday,	" 14, 1910,	a "Bison"
Saturday,	" 15, 1910,	Ambrosio and then each and every week, thereafter on the same days, one reel of the same producers. You can absolutely count on these releases and make up your programs accordingly.

Ambrosio and Italia Films

The imported reels of Ambrosio and Italia will be released in this country on the corresponding date that they will be released in Europe, so as to protect all exchanges and their first run customers. It is a well established fact that these foreign film manufacturers produce the best of all European productions.

Lithographs and Posters Free

We will furnish as usual all exchanges handling these productions with one sheet four color lithographs, also posters containing synopsis, absolutely free with each reel.

PATHÉ FRÈRES

WILL RELEASE

On Wednesday, Jan. 12th

THE FILM D'ART

CAMILLE

Staged and photographed by Pathé Frères in their own inimitable style and enacted by Film d'Art actors.

A thrilling and dramatic presentation of that masterpiece of Alexander Dumas, fils known all over the English speaking world as "Camille." The story is too well known to need any synopsis. For a generation it has been enjoyed by old and young both in book form and in Verdi's masterful adaptation known to the opera-goers as

"La Dame aux Camelias"

"La Traviata"

The film represents the acme of perfection. Every shade of meaning is portrayed with the utmost skill and fidelity. For those who have read Camille this picture will be of especial interest—after seeing it. The unfortunare Margurite Gautier, who was in real life the Camille of the story, and her unhappy lover, Armand Duval, will be real characters, who will live forever in their memory.

Killing the Goose.

To kill the goose that lays the golden eggs is equivalent to cutting off one's nose to spite one's face. We hope the reader will forgive these and other recent incursions into the domain of proverbial philosophy, but frankly we feel like it. And we feel like it because current happenings in the moving picture field are such as to evoke comments of a proverbially philosophic or sententious nature. In other words, they are in the nature of suggested texts.

Now, we do not know how their ledger accounts stand, but we think Keith & Proctor have started out to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. Two weeks ago we described their policy of interspersing their moving picture shows with third-rate vaudeville entertainments as a setback. Other newspaper writers concurred. They, like ourselves, see the game from the point of view of the public. Keith & Proctor, here in New York City alone, cater each day and night to many thousands of patrons—patrons who want the moving picture show in a particular style. Yet Keith & Proctor, for some reason not obvious to us, are annoying, disgruntling and repelling those patrons by temporarily appealing to a small and negligible section of the community that are lovers of inferior vaudeville.

What the public want is the picture, the picture only, first, last and all the time. And consider, too, that, as we point out in another article in this week's WORLD, the millions and millions of women and children who support the moving picture; educated women and children, refined women and children. These people do not want vaudeville of the "knockabout variety," or the vulgar double entendre, or the questionable dialogue which sometimes passes current on Fourteenth street and which is more suited to the Bowery. The moving picture public from coast to coast does not want this sort of thing. We reiterate that it wants the pictures only, and the pictures well shown.

We do hope that Keith & Proctor will be wise in their generation and bring their entertainments in line with the requirements of their patrons. We perceive, by the way, that Klaw & Erlanger are favorably inclined towards the moving picture. We perceive, too, that the Shuberts are also dallying with it. Keith & Proctor, therefore, are face to face with this situation, that if they fall down by diluting their entertainments with stupid vaudeville, the Shuberts, Klaw & Erlanger and other theatrical men are ready to grasp the opportunity that is offered to them.

The Press and the Moving Picture.

Amongst the great New York newspapers, the "New York Times" has always shown a sympathetic attitude towards the moving picture. The articles that it has printed have been appreciative of the good work that has been done in the moving picture field—appreciative of the dramatic and other qualities of those pictures. The writers of these articles have shown an evident wish to understand what is being done in the moving picture field to entertain the public. This intelligent attitude is rather exceptional in this way. As a rule the conductors of the great newspapers have so far taken little pains to keep themselves in touch with moving picture matters—the articles that appear in their pages are mostly written by incompetent hands and show a lamentable ignorance of the situation. Not so with the "New York Times," and we therefore feel that in this policy the paper in question will get itself a large volume of support from the general public who are interested in moving pictures.

On Sunday, November 12th, nearly a whole page of the "Times" was devoted to a description of the Urban-Smith process together with a resume of recent work in the moving picture field. In the issue of December 19th, a still more striking tribute to the popularity of the moving picture is given. This is the devotion of a half a page of their pictorial supplement to the illustration of art in moving pictures. There are seven illustrations of the recent Pathe release, "Rigoletto." The principal actors have their photos given and two striking scenes from the film are also reproduced. "The New York Times" pays tribute to the artistic quality of these pictures. We congratulate our contemporary upon its discovery of a large field for the adornment of its pictorial pages. If its art editor will only take the trouble he will find that the field before him for pictorial illustration is just as wide as that of stationary photography. He will find every phase of pictorial representation in the moving picture. There are landscapes, seascapes, groups, there are country scenes, industrial subjects, dramatic scenes, military pictures, naval pictures, history, ancient and modern, humor, comedy and tragedy. There is, in short, no phase of ancient or modern life that is not illustrated by the moving picture and which the art editor of our contemporary can reproduce in his pages. He can reproduce a scene from "Hiawatha," or one from "Nero," a scene from the Life of Washington or Lincoln, a battle subject, the inauguration of one President, the funeral procession of another, in short, in the way of illustration the moving picture affords him every opportunity of saying to himself that "the world is all before him there to choose."

We hope that this departure by the "New York Times" will be followed by other illustrated papers throughout the country and that the "Times" itself will proceed in the good path that it has set out for itself. To quote our contemporary, "of late the mediocre and the commonplace have been tabooed by discriminating audiences, and there has sprung up an ever-increasing demand for a higher order of entertainment, something more satisfying to the intellect and more pleasing to the eye." As we have already said, our contemporary will find an almost illimitable field to draw from in the way of high-class illustrations from moving pictures. The work of Pathe has deservedly won recognition, but even so, the "New York Times" can find quite a good supply of pictures in the films of Edison, Biograph, Kalem, Selig, Lubin, Gaumont and others who from time to time astonish the public with the beautiful and artistic quality of their pictures. We welcome the "New York Times" as an ally in popularizing good moving pictures with the public.

An Open Market.

The past year witnessed the Icarus-like rise and fall of the International Projecting and Producing Company. Icarus was one of those unpleasant persons in the classics who, to put it mildly, went up like a rocket and came down like a stick. To all intents and purposes the International Projecting and Producing Company is dead and buried. Mr. Murdock, with all his ability, and we believe him to be a man of great ability, is, it seems, out of the game. They are advertising film at four and five cents per foot, and so the history of this company can be written down in one word, "failure." Will Hector Jedediah Streckymans please note?

But we want to hear more of J. J. Murdock because his record shows him to be a man of great possibilities. We believe that when he started out with the International Projecting and Producing Company if he had been surrounded by good and loyal helpers, the company would have been going this moment in some shape or form. Frankly, we never sympathized with its entire program. It started out to do too much. If it had contented itself by simply being a well-conducted distributing agency for imported films it would have been doing business this moment. But it wanted to assume control, where control not only cannot be assumed, but is undesirable. Without having any fundamental assets such as the Patents Company admittedly has, it wanted to play the Patent Company's game. And it failed in the game because never at any point of it did the International Company hold a winning card.

The Patents Company has held together this year on clear business grounds; they have some securities in their vault. Those securities are certain patents and the rights to them. Like sensible business men they are making the most of those patents. We should do the same if we were in their place. We would sell our goods in the best market, which is one of the first elements of business. What is more, people who did business with us would do business on our terms. Those are the principles upon which we conduct THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, as we told the reader last week.

Now to the application of all this: Undismayed by the failure of the International Company and its president, Mr. Murdock, there are yet other concerns in the field not unreasonably suspected of an attempt to corral the Independent manufacturing and renting part of the American moving picture business. This is what the International Company tried to do and failed to do. This is what, we are informed, is the intention of the Film Import and Trading Company, of 127 East 23d street, New York City, the very next building to that in which we are dictating this article.

Ever since the Film Import and Trading Company commenced business we have been sympathetic observers of their methods. We welcomed them into the moving picture field because, unlike many other people in it, they went about their work in a business-like way. There are so few business men in the moving picture field that when we meet an individual or a company animated by correct principles we extend to them what is popularly known as the "glad hand." And this we have done to the Film Import and Trading Company, whose managing director, Mr. C. M. Freeman, will bear out the truth of what we are saying.

With the details of management of this concern, and its policy, or with the petty squabbles that circle round the name of the Film Import and Trading Company, we have nothing to do, and we want nothing to do. The pages of our theatrical and other contemporaries which deal with the moving picture are filled week by week with gossip and tittle-tattle about this company which reminds us of nothing so much as the stupid chattering of the servants' hall. The conductors of these papers seem indifferent to the fact that by printing this rubbish they insult the intelligence of their readers. Our concern is with this company in its public capacity and in regard to its avowed policy of attempting to control the Independent side of things. In its own interest we advise the Film Import and Trading Company to take warning by the fate of the International Company and not to adventure into territory where Murdock got lost. In the first place, the thing is impracticable. We have information that the Independent manufacturers and most of the renters decline to be controlled by the Film Import and Trading Company, and we have information that many of the foreign manufacturers decline to give their agencies to the Film Import and Trading Company or to any American agency firm. We have information on these heads from Chicago and other large American centers, and from London and Paris. We know exactly what is doing in the matter; we know as much about it as the Film Import and Trading Company, and what is more, we know that we know a little more than they do.

It is the policy of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD to keep the door open. We refused to let the International close it on freedom of independence. We shall go on keeping the door open. Will our excellent friends, the Film Import and Trading Company, kindly note this declaration of policy.

CHILDREN'S SUBJECTS FOR THE MOVING PICTURE.

Kalem Company Inaugurate A New Policy.

Anything which tends to popularize the moving picture amongst the children of the community earns the praise of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD. We have more than once drawn attention to the fact that it is desirable from all points to elicit the sympathies of the millions of children who annually spend their dimes and nickels in a moving picture theater. The children of to-day are the men and women of the future, and if a favorable impression is formed on the juvenile mind by the moving picture, be sure it will last through adolescence, up to manhood and womanhood. The way to do this, as we have pointed out over and over again, is to specially cater to the children with suitable subjects. Only last week we drew attention to the fact that this Christmas season is marked by the dissemination of numerous toys on the moving picture principle. This is bound to favorably influence the children of the community towards taking an intelligent interest in moving pictures.

By far a larger percentage of those who patronize moving picture entertainments are women and children. Where the child goes, there goes the mother; where the child is pleased, entertained or instructed in a refined way, the mother wants to go. As it is with stationary photography, so it is with moving picture photography. The mother and the child are the mainstays of the entertainment. Offend the child, you displease the mother and you keep away both from the entertainment. One of the regulations of the famous Grid-Iron Club of Washington is, at its annual dinners, that ladies are always present. In other words, that nothing must be said which would offend the ladies. So it should be with the moving picture. Nothing should ever be shown that would repel ladies and their children.

This week the Kalem Company inaugurate a new policy which is bound, we think, to result favorably to the interest of this enterprising concern as well as to further popularize the moving picture amongst women and children. The company is shortly releasing two reels per week. One of those reels is to be devoted to juvenile subjects—subjects which will appeal directly to the suffrages of the children and of course to their parents, particularly their mothers. We saw the first of these subjects. It is called "The Cardboard Baby." It is a fairy story for children worked out with great charm and delicacy. It shows how, under the influence of a good fairy, a little girl was taught to control her temepr. There are many amusing adventures which the child has with the cardboard baby and a real baby. The way in which the scenes change from one to the other is singularly well managed. The whole story is simple, idyllic and pleasing, and is of a type, in our opinion, which is bound to please the small children. The picture is released this week and it is the forerunner of many similar subjects. The idea is to interest the moving picture exhibitor especially in this class of picture and to induce him to have child matinees. We have no doubt that properly handled this scheme will be a success.

It will be a good thing for the Kalem Company, we think, if they will stick to this admirable policy and get themselves the reputation of being the film makers par excellence for the juvenile public of the moving picture field—a public which is to be counted by the millions. They make a very good and timely start, for this is the season of the year when we are all united to make the lives of the little ones as happy as possible with special gifts, entertainments, etc. Consequently, as we say, the new scheme is inaugurated at a timely season.

Most moving picture entertainments leave the child out of consideration. The average show appeals more to the mind of the grown-up person. It is hardly to be expected that high-class comedy and tragedy appeal especially to children, but animals, scenes of wonder, adventure, and the like do so, more or less. The juvenile subject will do so directly and it is eminently desirable, therefore, that the juvenile subject should form part of the entertainment some time or other in every moving picture house. If anybody will glance down the list of the releases which we publish every week, it will be seen that too many of the subjects do not directly appeal to a juvenile audience, but this defect with the new Kalem policy will be remedied. It is desirable that a specific attempt should be made to enlist children in regard to the moving picture. It is only a year ago that the press and the pulpit were denouncing the average moving picture theater as unsuitable for the attendance of children. This agitation has evaporated. But still here and there the objection exists. This again in its turn will vanish, we believe, if it is known that the film makers are setting themselves down to producing pictures especially for children, and that those subjects are suitable, drawn from a literature which children understand—a literature of the fairy-like, the simple, the innocuous and the mentally refreshing. Fortunately there is a wide choice of subject open to the Kalem Company, whose child releases we shall watch with sympathetic interest throughout the coming year.

THE EDISON BANQUET.

The anniversary of the foundation of the Motion Picture Patents Company and the association with that company of the principal film manufacturers of the United States of America was recently made the opportunity of a unique celebration in the history of the moving picture. The manufacturers took occasion to banquet Mr. Thomas Alva Edison at the Plaza Hotel, New York City, on Monday evening, December 20, and they made a presentation to him for the work he has done in the field of the moving picture.

Men of the type of Thomas A. Edison find their chief pleasure in the laboratory or workshop. It is a common thing to find men whose names are household words all over the world, eschew the pleasures of the table and society. Were it otherwise they would never do their work. If success brings many rewards it also brings many penalties. And amongst the latter to the earnest worker in any branch of progress is that of publicity—the necessity of taking part in society, of seeing, and being seen. Ask any man who occupies a prominent place in the world's mind to-day what his chief pleasure in life is, and he will tell you work. He looks upon the alleged pleasures of life as so many obstacles in the way of his work. He endures and tolerates them, but rarely welcomes them. Mr. Edison is one of these men. So that it was not an easy matter to get him to the banquet.

Those present at the latter were the men most prominently identified with the commercial exploitation of the moving picture in the world to-day. They were: Mr. Thomas Armat, of Washington, D. C.; Mr. Frank L. Dyer, Mr. George F. Scull, Mr. J. J. Kennedy, Mr. H. N. Marvin, Mr. George K. Spoor, of Chicago; Mr. F. J. Marion, Mr. S. Long, Mr. George Kleine, of Chicago; Mr. S. Lubin, of Philadelphia; Mr. F. W. Singhi, of Philadelphia; Mons. Gaston Melies, of Paris; Mr. J. A. Berst, of New York; Mr. W. N. Selig, of Chicago; Mr. William T. Rock, Mr. J. Stuart Blackton and Mr. Albert E. Smith.

THOMAS A. EDISON.

The dinner can be described as a very sumptuous repast served amidst delightful surroundings. The presentation to Mr. Edison took the form of a silver vase, which is of a very artistic design and wrought by the Tiffany Company. It stands 21 inches high and weighs a thousand ounces. In making the presentation, Mr. J. J. Kennedy, of the Biograph Company, eulogized Mr. Edison for having brought into existence a new industry and a new field of human endeavor, and for giving the world what might properly be called a new moral force, the educational and elevating power of which has not yet been fully realized.

"Being no orator," to quote Shakespeare, Mr. Edison accepted the gift through the mouth of Mr. F. L. Dyer. And those were all the official speeches that were made at a very notable gathering of film men.

Oddly enough, though his name and work have been identified for many years with the moving picture, Mr. Edison himself had never been photographed in the moving picture camera, so that earlier in the day of the banquet, the chance occurred to include him in a film in which all his hosts at the subsequent banquet also appeared. These gentlemen shook hands with Mr. Edison, and the film that was made of the exhibition should be a very interesting souvenir of a unique gathering. Evidently, then, the associated manufacturers start on the second year of their existence in complete harmony, a fact which disposes of many of the rumors that have been put in circulation with regard to the probability of disintegration.

Mr. J. J. Kennedy's speech of presentation:

"Mr. Edison: My associates, the manufacturers and importers of motion pictures, licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Company, have conferred upon me the honor and pleasure of acting as their spokesman in conveying to you their deep appreciation of your inventive genius and the great results that you have accomplished in the field of animated photography.

"You have brought into existence a new industry and a new field of human endeavor, and greater still, you have given to the world what might properly be called a new moral force, the educational and elevating power of which has not yet been fully realized.

"Animated photography, as you have given it to us, appears to be the next logical step to the telephone in the advance of civilization. One annihilates distance in talking, while the other annihilates distance in seeing.

"As licensees of the Motion Picture Patents Company, privileged to use your inventions, it is our aim to continue your good work by utilizing animated photography in educating, elevating and entertaining the public.

"As licensees of the Motion Picture Patents Company, we have made great progress during the first year of our combined and harmonious effort. The friendly rivalry that exists between us and which prompts every one of us to excel the others in the merit of our productions, while working together as a unit, will, we hope, in future years produce results that will be gratifying to you as well as to ourselves.

"Allow us to present to you this token of our appreciation of the opportunities that you have given us, and we ask you to let it be a constant reminder of the fact that we are earnestly engaged in continuing your work.

"We feel honored in having you as our guest to-night and we look forward to your being with us at our future annual gatherings."

Mr. Dyer's speech of acceptance:

"Mr. Kennedy and Gentlemen: Mr. Edison, as you know, has made it one of the principles of his life to avoid public speaking, although I can assure you from years of close contact with him that no one is better qualified than he to make a forcible address. I rise, therefore, to thank you in his behalf for this more than beautiful symbol of your regard and good will for him. He will always appreciate it, not only from its intrinsic value, but because of the kind and friendly thoughts that go with it and prompted the gift. He has followed with great interest the development of the industry and the work we have accomplished during the past year, and he looks forward to the future with the confident belief that the good work will go on; that the moving picture business will be raised to a higher and higher plane and that the public ,without exception, may be taught that moving pictures have a serious and important position in the realms of amusement and instruction. He has observed with the greatest pleasure the strong bonds of cooperation which have cemented us together in a friendly and harmonious body; all of us working in honest competition and all striving to bring the moving picture business into its own. The future is more than bright and it rests with us to realize our hopes by continuing, as in the past, the friendly relations between ourselves and settling our difficulties and differences by sensible discussion, rather than by commercial warfare and costly litigation.

"I thank you again on Mr. Edison's behalf for your beautiful gift, which he will always appreciate as a most delightful memento of his association with all of you."

Animated Photography

Presented to
THOMAS ALVA EDISON
December 29, 1909
by the
LICENSED MANUFACTURERS AND
IMPORTERS OF MOVING PICTURES

The Christmas Day release of the Vitagraph, Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," is said to be a charming and magnificent adaptation from the great bard's most poetic play. The outdoor scenes were chosen with a special view to their harmony with the theme. Fortunately the weather and atmospheric conditions were perfect for superb photography so that a series of art pictures have been produced that should attract wide attention.

I was about to say something about the "Merry Yule Tide" and odds and ends in that direction, but what's the use? Commercialism seems to have outclassed conviviality, so sentiment must take a back seat. There was a time when "A Merry Christmas" would go the rounds for a while among the moving picture people, but it seems now that the very mention of Christmas is justifiable grounds for a good fight. It takes an old timer to understand the change. A few years ago, when prices were good and there were not so many in the business, it was more like a family affair and the fellow with a grouch fell into the merry, merry idea by force of circumstances. Now the moving picture business is overcrowded by manufacturers, film renters, exhibitors, operators, and people with money to invest, and the mix-up is so general that nobody has time to think of Christmas or New Years. Everybody is losing money and the pictures alone are moving! The only fellow who can't get in is the fellow who wants to invest. You will also find him hitched to the coat-tails of some operator. Somebody has put him wise that if he wants to break into the business right he must first cultivate the acquaintance of the operator in the place he has his eye upon. The operator can tell him how much the house takes in a week, the seating capacity, the bill for current, what the manager gets, how much the manager doesn't get, how much his wife draws out of the box office, what the soubrette gets and what she's worth, and all that kind of chop suey, so that everybody is enjoying himself except the man with the money.

Eight men told me this week that if they could sell out for cash and get back one-third of what they had invested they would say Merry Chrismas and a Happy New Year to everybody and eat hearty Christmas with their families. Now that is a part of the "Christmas Joys and Sorrows," quoting the title of an old-time play, but it is not a sincere part. I find that the most of the fellows who are always talking about selling are the last to hold on. Do you know that the real sellers in the business are those who open picure places for the purpose of selling them? That is what hurts the business. Here is a storeroom that has passed through many hands without success and an enterprising fellow points out to him the advantages offered by the moving picture field. He readily invests a few hundred dollars to put a bold front (on the store) and otherwise arrange for the opening of a "grand moving picture palace." Box office receipts are but a remote consideration on the part of the promoters. There are friends enough on both sides to maintain a look of prosperity about the place and judiciously inserted advertisements do the rest. An old game, in fact, in new dress. The chief point is to get a long lease at a good rental, and the new one gets his Christmas present. Oh, you Santa Claus!

By the way, did you see that Christmas present the Show World handed to the Independents in its last issue? It was certainly a fine one. It was a contribution by one of the staff writers and I place it as one of the most important incidents in the moving picture field of the season. It would seem that the writer is well posted. On first reading one is inclined to think that the publication, which has been a staunch supporter of the Independents, is flopping over, but taking the article from start to finish, it must be classed as one of the most sensible and courageous declarations that has been given publicity by any journal devoted to that side of the business. Many independents may not accept this view, but it cannot be denied that there are many independents who have been ignorant of the true state of affairs, and the article referred to has, or may, stir them to a realization of the real situation. While it is to some the forerunner of an expose, it is really not of that nature. It is more like the sounding of a warning to the Independents. The writer states that they have been misguided, that pledges have not been kept, that the general action lacks nutriment.

If I were to tell the gosped truth, which I would if the appetites of some people would not be spoiled for their Christmas dinner, I would furnish facts demonstrating that if some of the Independent forces were working under the Licensed arrangements and some of the present Licensed units were forced into the Independent ranks the latter would be the subject of far more criticism by the Show World than they are to-day. I say this in all fairness to both sides, but with an eye that sees. There are some men outside the Licensed ranks to-day who allowed themselves to be governed more by pride than sense, and some of these very people are being scored by the very people whose cause they espoused.

But I am drifting over the map. Perhaps I am influenced to a more or less extent by the virtues of those I refer to, but I will drop the reflection and come back to the homeland —the good old New York. With their Christmas the exhibitors may combine a joyful Thanksgiving. One year ago a tyrannical hand fell upon them and closed up every nickelodeon in the city. In the midst of festivities the policeman, deputy sheriff and city marshal appeared with badge of office boldly displayed. "The Mayor's orders are that you close up." Like so many dens of vice the popular places of amusement were obliged to close and remain closed until the fertile minds and resources of the more energetic and persistent managers reopened the doors the next day. That was a busy Christmas Eve and morning, and it will not be forgotten by those who took part in it. It was a battle of right against might, and progress of events showed it was a knockout of graft. The Christmas Eve of 1909 was, indeed, an Oh, you Santa Claus! There was none in 1908.

Another Christmas gift to the moving picture interests is the renewal of association of the Censor Board. Several weeks ago this board practically became inactive, but it is now in operation again and we hope to see it continue so. As I understand it, some difference arose as to the method and nature of criticisms, but whatever the differences may have been the fact stands out clear and decisive that it is better to have a Censor Board. No one can question the personnel of the board, and no one can doubt the effect its endorsement of productions has with the public. Makers of moving pictures are not infallible and suggestions of improvement, especially in a moral sense, must be entirely welcome. It must also be acknowledged that before the Censors became a factor in the moving picture world there were thousands of people who would not patronize a moving picture show who are to-day enthusiastic admirers and patrons of them.

And here's to Ani Matograph! May she live long and prosper; may she always be in good hands and conducted for the benefit of the public at large. May she ever reflect credit upon the manufacturer; may the exhibitor always reflect credit upon himself; and may all concerned enjoy a Merry Christmas.

"Yes," says the exhibitor; "how am I to reflect anything if I don't get what I ask for?

"Aye, there's the rub," says the film exchange; "he's coming back at me again, but how can I deliver the goods if I don't get the price?"

"That's so," says Santa Claus, "but a good time is coming. The exhibitors will soon train their audiences to the thought tha a new film is not made every minute and that there must be moderation in all things."

Personally, I think this first run craze has been run into the ground. It cannot survive. The manufacturers are worked to capacity when quality is considered and the best combination of the best selection could not meet some of the demands that are made. The other day I happened to be in an office when a well-to-do exhibitor walked in and said to a film renter: "I'm here with my money. They say money can get anything. Now I'm willing to win or lose and you can get my money if you want it. If you don't take it somebody else will. Now what do you say?"

"You're in the right place; just tell me what you want."

"I'll give you $500 a week to beat the fellow that thinks he got the shine on me."

"Good. I've got your five———"

"Wait a minute. I have the choice of stuff?"

"Sure. You own the shop; only just tell us what you want us to give to you."

"Well, that's easily done. Let me see. That snide across the street advertises first run every day. Now, I've watched his bill every day for two weeks and I find he runs three reels. Two of these are dead ones, but one is the real stuff. The only way I can beat him out and prevent him from coming back is to get three first runs every day and———"

"Excuse me," said the film renter, "I forgot to wish you

"A HAPPY NEW YEAR."

OBSERVATIONS BY WIDE-AWAKE EXHIBITORS.

The Editors Invite Contributions for this page from Exhibitors who can Express an Idea that will be Beneficial to the Business.

ADVANCE ADVERTISING OF PROGRAMS.

By B. L. Morris.

Manufacturers of moving pictures can aid materially in the advancement of the business in general and the popularizing of their pictures in particular by sending out their advertising matter a little more in advance. Most of the advertisements in the Moving Picture World are of the current week's films, a few are a week ahead. This does not give the exhibitor of first run films any chance to prepare his advertising. Advance descriptions may not increase the manufacturers' sales under the present conditions, but these descriptions will enable the wide-awake exhibitor to post advance announcements in his lobby and in his local newspaper, to keep up the interest of the public, which will ultimately benefit all concerned. Better still if the manufacturer will send to the exhibitor an advance poster or lithograph. This the exhibitor can display a week or so in advance so that their patrons will have something to look for. An instance in support of this is the "coming" posters which the Kalem Company sent out for their "Governor's Daugher" and "Rally Around the Flag." A house in my city which runs practically the entire output of the licensed manufacturers used these posters in their lobby. Patrons saw them and remarked about them and when the pictures finally rolled around in their turn they remembered that they were something that they had been looking for and the result was a considerable increase in business—and the pictures were worthy of it.

A house which draws a steady class of patronage—people who go out to spend an evening—is the one that special advertising helps. The advertising signs and posters that are being now put out by the manufacturers are effective, but they usually come the same day the picture does and lose their value as advance advertising. They may get the transient trade, but they would be still more effective if they announced the arrival of a film which the exhibitor had been posted on and had advertised in advance.

Another thing, there is not enough of the right kind of local advertising being done by the exhibitors. Invitation tickets to the reporters of the local papers will always get a line or two. An advertisement in the same paper will generally be good for twice its space in reading matter if you can get the city editor interested in your show. And here is where the advance advertising and advance stories of the films that are published in the Moving Picture World can be used to advantage. Instead of simply advertising in your local paper, "Fine pictures to-night," give the title of the film, its maker and a brief synopsis of the story. I know of several instances where the local newspaper prints as news matter the full description of the films, and the editor considers it good copy. Why not in your case? Educate your patrons to the names of the different manufacturers. Familiarize them, let each one stand for something, just the same as Belasco, Erlanger, Nixon, Thomas and many other names stand for something in the living theaters. One good story of a film is better as an advertisement than a list of a dozen meaningless titles being run.

INCONSISTENCIES OF AMERICAN AUTHORS AND PRODUCERS.

By Hans Leigh.

There is a painful tendency on the part of the freeborn American to Americanize everything he touches, no matter how un-American the subject is or should be.

When Elizabeth Stuart Phelps wrote her "Nebuchadnezzar," she made the kingly Babylonian and the priests of Baal talk exactly like Luke Otis, "daown to Boston," and even went as far as to set a good Yankee thermometer sizzling in the house of the prophet Daniel. When another American author, whose name I cannot recall, produced "When Knighthood Was in Flower," he made an English princess of the sixteenth century talk and act just like a Detroit debutante at the Michigan University (class of 1911); and when Maude Adams portrays the character of the Emperor Napoleon in "L'Aiglon," she cannot help making him talk with the accent of a Vassar girl.

Such being the case among authors and actors, it is not surprising that the American film manufacturer should cast the shadow of the great republic on such foreign scenes as he essays to reproduce from "faked" American settings. These reflections arise on viewing the film "Dora," recently placed upon the market. "Dora" is after—a long way after—the poem by Lord Tennyson. There is nothing American about the poem and there is absolutely nothing English about the film. Farmer Allen presents none of the characteristics of the English farmer—the John Bull whom we all know so well. Who says "Go" to his laborers and not "Come"; who rides his horse to hounds and works with his brains and not his hands. The Farmer Allen whom we see in the motion picture "Dora" is not an English farmer at all. He is a plain 50-acre Jerseyman who wears the latest thing in Sixth avenue "hand-me-downs" and a collar that was bought last August at Siegel-Cooper's.

This might be excused, but when the picture artist produces a field of Indian corn in the middle of a supposed English farm and makes the laborers reap it with Cuban machetes—well, as Artemus Ward used to say, "That is 2 mutch." Of course we can easily understand how the artist made the error. The poem certainly does speak of corn and of course the picture artist never heard of any corn except the kind that grows on the cob. Did he not know or did he overlook the fact that the Indian corn such as we eat oft the cob at Dennett's or Delmonico's and which he pictures in "Dora" is not grown in England—except perhaps as a curiosity in some gentleman's garden? Did he not know that what we call "corn" is known in England as "maize" and is imported from the United States and that what the Englishman calls "corn" is nothing but plain old-fashioned wheat?

The fact is that the compeer of Tennyson's poem had nothing in it but plain wheat, but the moving picture artist fills it with good American Indian maize, eight feet high, and then sets Farmer Allen husking it!

Isn't that the limit?

But no, I forgot the machetes!

J. W. Rosenquest Says, "Independents Have The Goods."

Veteran Manager Discusses His Change of Policy—A Few Kind Words for the "Imp."

Sitting in the cozy little office, in which he has for twenty-eight years presided over the destiny of the Fourteenth Street Theater, New York City, J. Wesley Rosenquest wondered why the fact that his house changed to Independent film service interested his interviewer so much.

"My reason?" he queried. "Why, business, of course. I have always done a great deal of what women call 'snooping around'—walking from Third to Sixth avenues on Fourteenth street, and I tell you, the sameness of the shows in all the houses along there has gotten on my nerves. And here I was, the same as the rest of them. All of us taking the same kind of service, day after day. I, therefore, determined to look into the works of the Independent side of it and I have come to the conclusion that I can get just as excellent amusement for these patrons you see here."

"These patrons," at the time, meant a packed S. R. O. house.

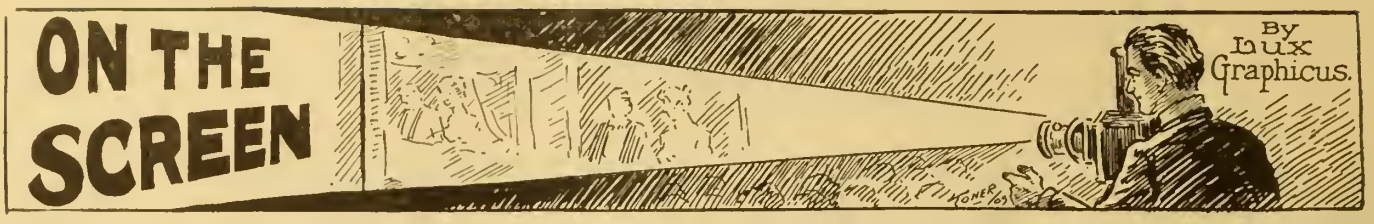
Speaking further on the question of subjects, he said that he was glad to see the excellence of the work in American films, a feature the Independents had been short on.

"Mr. Rosenquest, it has been publicly announced that it was the excellence of the foreign importations which induced you to show an Independent program."

The interruption of an employee, who came to say that "the act just tried out is rotten," filled him with sympathy (for the audience, too, I hope) and changed his mood.

The conversation switched to American makers again, and it was brought up that the mainstay of the Independents in this regard is the "Imp" and the "Bison."

"Yes, their work is excellent," he said. "Perfectly beautiful photography and acting by people who know how. Nothing amateurish about that work, I tell you. It has never been very hard for the Independents to compete with the Patents Company in foreign-made films, but their weak point has been the shortage of American subjects. Now, it seems to my satisfaction, they are sufficiently well equipped to supply adequately.



Precisely what my nationality, or the length of my residence in this country, has to do with the making and selling of moving pictures, it would take a far cleverer individual than Hector Jedediah Streyckmans to explain. This young man, in the Christmas number of the Show World, devotes some parts of his article on "Motographic History" in the making to certain distortions of what I have said and done, which in the interests of historic accuracy, it is desirable to nail down at once as wholesale terminological inexactitudes, or, in other words, falschoods. Incidentally, he refers to my English nationality and the length of my residence here in somewhat disparaging terms. This reminds me of an anecdote atrributed to the late Lord Beaconsfield, probably the greatest British statesman of the nineteenth century. Beaconsfield was a Jew, and a thoughtless Englishman twitted him on the fact of his being a Jew. Beaconsfield's reply was as follows: "As a matter of fact I am more of an Englishman than you are. You could not help yourself when you were born an Englishman. I am an Englishman by choice." Equally so, I am a resident of this country by choice. Hector Jedediah could not help the place of his birth. He cannot help many other things.

Some men are born great; some have greatness thrust upon them; others achieve greatness. To which of these sources Hector Jedediah attributed his great position last February, I do not know. But he was great—great in his position and opportunities, and great in his failures. He was so great, according to my observation, and the observations of others in the Empire City of the East, that Broadway, The Great White Way, was not big enough to hold his greatness. And so, continuing in the path that fate or accident had marked out for him, his poor little head became so unconscionably swollen that the inevitable catastrophe which supplements excessive greatness ultimately overtook him. The position of secretary of the International Projecting and Producing Company was not big enough for him. So he stepped down and out.

* * *

Then, like another Alexander sighing for more worlds to conquer, and having unsuccessfully applied for the position of Chicago representative of The Moving Picture World, and being politely but firmly refused that position, Hector Jedediah found himself at the awe inspiring desk of publicity agent of the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance. This position he filled with such success and distinction that at the end of about thirty days his resignation was invited. Such is the amazing progress of this self-constituted historian of motography.

There is even another chapter to be written in the history of this historian. Hector Jedediah, flushed with success, completes the circle of his achievements and returns full of glory and honors to the lofty position which he condescended, in the interests of the history of motography, to quit early last year. He rejoins the staff of the Show World and, fortified by his experience and success, he publishes a "History of Motography in the Year 1909."

* * *

Now, when a man sits down to write history, no matter what the subject may be, it is presupposed that he has acquired the necessary qualifications for the work. He would necessarily educate himself in the theory and practice of the subject and acquaint himself with his facts. He would have developed that condition of mind which enables your true historian to arrive at the truth of the matters which he makes it his business to elucidate for the information of his readers. This is the usual method of all historians, whether they deal with scientific, national or, indeed, any subject of particular or general interest.

What are Hector Jedediah's qualifications for the self-arrogated position of historian of motography? So far as I can ascertain, he started out to equip himself for this position by fulfilling a menial position at the Sherman House, Chicago. Thereafter, he drifted into newspaper work. After having drifted into newspaper work, he drifted along the illustrious path of success, which I have already outlined. To quote the Holy Scriptures, "These be thy gods, Oh, Israel."

* * *

To come to the more personal qualifications of Hector Jedediah as an accurate historian, it is permissible to inquire how he comported himself towards his employers in his kaleidoscopic career during the past twelve months. Was he loyal to the Show World during the period of his peregrinations? I pause for a reply. Was he loyal to Mr. Murdock, or was he not? Hector Jedediah can supply an answer to this question; and so can some other people in Chicago, including Mr. Murdock himself. But to the printed law and testimony: In the Show World article to which I am referring, Streyckmans permits himself to say of Murdock that "he would sell anything he had, if he got his price." I wonder what Mr. Murdock thinks of his ex-secretary? I wonder what the moving picture public throughout the United States and England thinks of the man who would write of his former employer and benefactor in this way?

This is not all. For a little while, that is, in the early days of the recently formed Alliance, Streckymans was virtually employed by Wm. H. Swanson, the secretary of the Alliance. Now read what this grateful-minded historian has to say of Swanson: "The past year has shattered the halo of Wm. H. Swanson as a film factor and marked his appearance as an agitator. In the latter role he has been fitted by his previous experience with a 'black-top' from which he gained quite a reputation as a spieler and originator of bally-hoos." Can you beat that?

So much for Streckymans. About a column of the Streyckmans' article is devoted to some ill-founded attacks on myself. The references he makes to me are so absurd that to anybody who knows me they carry their own refutation. But for the benefit of my readers in Chicago, I will explain that the outbreak is caused by the circumstance that a few months ago Streyckmans called upon me and, being unwise enough to afflict his own peculiar views on things in general upon me, I had to handle the gentleman in such a manner that he was glad to apologize for his impertinence.

Turning over my books the other night, I find that it is a good many years since I first began to address the American reading public. In the pages of the Photo Beacon, published by my friend, F. Dundas Todd, in the very city which has the doubtful honor of including Hector Jedediah amongst its inhabitants, my writings often figured. Similarly I may say that, since the year 1891, my writings in many other photographic papers of the United States have been voluminous and, I am bound to say, have been generally well received. In fact it has been one of my special privileges that for years past, while I worked in England, I had a very large reading public in the United States, many of whom, since I have been a resident in New York, have written me, called upon me and renewed acquaintance formed across the Atlantic years and years ago.

It is equally worthy of notice that, inasmuch as my entry into the moving picture field has been a logical move from work in stationary photography, the same fact holds good with hundreds if not thousands of others who are working in the moving picture field to-day. They and I first met in the stationary photographic field years ago. We are known to each other, so to speak, all the world over. We are in communication either through these pages or by the mail and, though living in the United States, I have much the same feeling that I had when in London, namely, that I am working in sympathy with thousands of others, known and unknown, who have at heart the progress of the moving picture, just as we had at heart the progress of stationary photography.

With the consciousness of this fact the lucubrations of Hector Jedediah "place" themselves, without any necessity on my part to traverse his stupid distortions of fact. There is, to quote his own words, "both humor and pathos" in the situation. It is the humor and the pathos so well portrayed by Sir Edwin Landseer, one of the great painters of animals of the last century. One of his pictures, which has been largely reproduced, was called "Dignity and Impudence." It represents a large, good-natured dog, gazing mildly out of his kennel while an insignificant little puppy is yapping, barking and spitting in the foreground. Precisely which of these canine roles fits Hector Jedediah Streyckmans, I will leave the readers of The Moving Picture World in Chicago to decide for themselves.

MORE MOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY IN THE MAKING.

Streyckmans, the renowned motographic historian of the "Show World," has a rival for the honors of the situation. A rival in the person of the editor of another moving picture journalistic freak who writes in the last number of his sheet in the following terms of "Kinemacolor":

"In the Concert Hall of Madison Square Garden, Saturday, December 11th, there were gathered one of the most select audiences it has been our province to meet in the motion pictur industry, and the verdict is as above. In 1899, Mr. Charles Urban took us into his confidence, and explained some of the principles that he and Mr. C. Albert Smith were then experimentiug on, along the lines of cinematography in natural colors. Previous to this we had been in full touch with Joly-Ives, Lippman, Sanger Sheppard, Friese-Greene, and the Lumiere process, all of which we were at this time working out in a practical and commercial business. Experimenting along these lines with J. Hill Norris, Dr. Hall Edwards, and J. Flammanck, we were not theorizing at that time, nor have we been working on theory since then. like another writer we know who is simply filled up with bombastic verhosity, and who really knows nothing practical concerning the processes of which he tries to make a bluff as kuowing, and which he utterly failed to perfect, when he was given a free hand some few months ago. If he was present at this meeting in Madison Square he must have hung his head and confessed himself utterly defeated. To say that the exhibition was a success is very, very faint praise, and if, as we uuderstaud, the Motion Picture Patents Company is going to exploit the Urhan-Smith process in America, we would willingly change ouv coat and go over to them on Kinemacolor. If they gain this coup, it will be one of the fiuest and most popular acts they could perform if they give it free for all who wish it."

This is the season of the year when agreeable fiction forms the staple reading of millions of people, and in the foregoing extract there is just about as much condensed fiction as would supply the groundwork for half a dozen Christmas numbers.

In the first place (though this is a detail), the whole article is so pathetically ungrammatical that if a small boy of nine or ten perpetrated it at a public school, he would be soundly whipped. Now for the fiction end of matters. Mr. Charles Urban never took the writer into his confidence in 1899 because in 1899 Mr. Charles Urban was not experimenting with color kinematography and had not then met Mr. G. Albert Smith. We, who write this, were living in London at the time and we know exactly what was doing then, and neither Urban nor Smith was doing the work. Then, with regard to "Joly-Ives." Dr. Joly is a Dublin professor, whose color process was not, is not, and cannot be applied to the moving picture. Mr. F. E. Ives is a resident of the Palisades, N. J., and a personal friend of our own. His process is not applicable to the moving picture. Professor Gabriel Lippman is a professor of physics at the Sorbonne, Paris. His interferential process of color photography is utterly inapplicable to the moving picture. Mr. Sheppard is also a personal friend of our own and he has not worked towards the moving picture end of things. Nor have the brothers Lumiere of Lyons, whose work again has no bearing whatsoever in the making of moving pictures in natural colors. With regard to Friese Greene, though we are one of this gentleman's severest critics, he is nevertheless a personal friend of our own. His work was not published until about three years ago. We saw it at Brighton, England, in July, 1907. The historian, whom we are quoting, has never seen it. He has never met Dr. Joly, he has never met Prof. Lippman, he has never met Mr. Sheppard, and, to put it mildly, these men, like G. Albert Smith, the other night at the Madison Square meeting, have never heard of or rather have never had any dealings with this would-be authority, who is in the same class with Dr. Cook.

Finally, we are going to give the author of this paragraph a little of Birmingham history. Dr. Richard Hill Norris, not "J. H." Norris, was a collodion worker. We, ourselves, used dry collodion plates prepared according to the Doctor's formulae. Dr. Hill Norris, with whose career we are intimate, never published any experiments bearing on the making of moving pictures in natural colors. He died several years ago before moving pictures became popular. Dr. Hall Edwards, whom we know personally, is a renowned radiographer, at present sick through the exercise of his profession. Dr. Hall Edwards, we go the length of saying, has never published any experiments in the direction of moving pictures in natural colors. He would be the first, we believe, to disown association with the work. As regards J. Flammanock, we never heard of him and we do not believe that anybody else has. So much for this writer's distortions of history. If you see it in the "News" it is ever thus.

The other parts of this amusing extract need no reference except this: that in the art of "changing his coat" on the smallest provocation the writer of the paragraph is, like J. J. Jeffries, unbeaten and invincible.

KINEMACOLOR.

Some Practical Aspects of the Process.

[From The Moving Picture World, August 14, 1909.]

The film is made panchromatic by suitable dyes, and it is exposed in the camera, behind a revolving shutter in which are fitted two filters (or screens) colored red and green. Thirty-two pictures a second are taken, one for each filter. When the negative is developed a positive is made from it and this is projected through red and green filters at the rate of thirty-two per second on the screen. The eye of the observer then perceives the moving picture approximately in the colors of nature.

In the hands of an ordinary moving picture photographer, unless he be of phenomenal knowledge and skill, the process is doomed to failure at the very start. Observe that a panchromatic film must be used—and made. For the information of those unversed in the chemistry and technique of the subject, a panchromatic film is one that has been sensitized for all rays of the spectrum; and it cannot be handled in an ordinary dark room. It must be placed in the camera in total darkness and it must be developed in total darkness, or the image will fog. Red light does not affect an ordinary moving picture film; red light would ruin a panchromatic film. The successful manipulation of panchromatic plates and films is one of the most difficult things in the whole field of photography.

The Smith process is hampered by difficulties at the very start. Thirty-two pictures a second must be taken and projected, instead of about half that number. This is not a fatal drawback, but it is sufficient of a departure from ordinary practice to constitute a disadvantageous innovation, always a risky thing to attempt, for it involves some interference with existing methods. Taking the process as it stands, special provision would have to be made for it at very great expense, and it would have to be worked with extraordinary care.

[From The Dramatic Mirror, December 25, 1909.]

The objections raised against the process may be briefly summed up as follows: Necessity for rebuilding American projecting machines to make them capable of standing the wear and tear of double speed in operation; the cutting in two of the time of a picture, making a reel of 1,000 feet equivalent in results to only 500 feet of present film, or the doubling in capacity of all projecting machines so that they will accommodate 2,000 feet instead of 1,000; the shorter life of the film owing to the damaging speed at which it must be operated; the higher cost of the color film, owing to twice as much being resuired to obtain the same results; the lack of definition or distinctness of outline; the impossibility of getting color effects from artificial light, and last, the effect on the eyes of spectators, which is claimed to be more serious than in the case of standard black and white films.

After twelve months of careful study, the Novelty Slide Company are about to bring out a brand new novelty in the slide line, which without question will create favorable comment wherever introduced. This new idea was perfected and thoroughly tested out about a month ago, and beginning with January 3 will be upon the market. We have been requested to withhold the detailed information concerning this new lantern slide feature until our next issue, when same will be carefully reviewed. The very few exhibitors who have seen this new attraction in actual use, proclaim it to be one of the most novel, interesting and amusing subjects ever introduced in a moving picture theater, and all speak very highly of this new departure in lantern slides.

Lake Charles, La.—J. P. Pittman has bought the Imperial Theater, which has added high-class songs and is doing S. R. O. business. The Happy Hour and Theo's 5-cent show have closed. The Lyric is doing good business.

St. Paul, Minn.—The Palace Theater, 445 Cedar street, is a new and up-to-date moving picture theater. It has a seating capacity of 400, and we are assured by its manager, William A. Sobelman, that it is one of the finest and best equipped theaters of its kind in the West.

"The Law of the Mountains" (Kalem).—A subject which may seem exaggerated to those who do not understand the inexorable law of honor which prevails in the mountains of the South. Here is a man who for the sake of a sick child gives information by which revenue officers are enabled to capture some moonshiners. But in doing this he has violated that unwritten code of honor which controls and he is shot from ambush, while his wife and child are forced to leave the place. Such subjects are strongly dramatic, showing unmistakably the rude ideas of justice which prevail. In this instance one's sympathies are divided. There is the reverence for law which the moonshiners are guilty of breaking and there is sympathy for the man who sought to obtain money to purchase medicines for his sick child. It might be said, for example, that inasmuch as his own community permitted him to suffer he was justified, even though he violated the unwritten code, and that his death was a gross perversion of what the mountaineers argue is justice. Such pictures often start a train of speculation difficult to follow, yet, perhaps, in some ways beneficial to those who undertake to reason out some of the abstract questions touched upon but incidentally as the film passes.

"The Lucky Number" (Pathe).—A play upon the superstition regarding the No. 13 which is funny in that it gets a miser into trouble through the influence of his averice, and instead of getting the benefit of a fortune which he supposed a No. 13 ticket won he gets instead his serving maid for a wife and her assistance in spending the hoard he has so carefully treasured all the years. The denouement when the miser discovers his mistake is as funny as anything the Pathès have shown recently.

"A Strong Tonic" (Pathe).—A slight change from the familiar strong man's feats. He takes a dose of the magic medicine and immediately begins performing all sorts of impossible stunts. He is finally arrested by a whole bunch of policemen, but drops them all over a bridge into the river. At last he is safe in a cell, but breaks down the wall and astonishes the captain and his men as they talk over his herculean feats of strength.

"A Gift from Santa Claus" (Edison).—A story full of the pathos of a child's sorrow and the cruelty and neglect of those who should have been her friends. But her father wasn't lost after all, even though his ship did go on the rocks, and his return is almost coincident with the visit of Santa Claus. The result is a happy ending to a picture that at the beginning excited the strongest sympathy in the hearts of the audience. To see a child suffering or abused at the Christmas season is enough to bring tears, and in this instance all hearts are touched. The ending is so happy, however, that the grief is forgotten. And yet the thought will obtrude itself that in real life there are not always such pleasant endings to stories of the sorrow and grief of children. Dramatically the picture is well maintained. Photographically it is clear and the work is well finished and of even tonal quality. Altogether it is a satisfactory picture for the Christmas season.

"The Shepherd's Flute" (Gaumont).—A pretty fairy story in which by means of a magic flute a poor shepherd boy triumphs over his inhuman master, a body of peasants and a detachment of soldiers, making his escape unharmed. Fairy stories are always interesting and the excellent photographic quality of this one adds to its attractiveness. The beauty of the film and the pleasant story will appeal to most audiences very strongly.

"Cambyses, King of Persia" (Gaumont).—A strongly dramatic picture of a supposed episode in the history of Persia that occurred over 2,000 years ago. Of the passion and intrigue little need be said. They seem common to all courts, no matter what age of the world, but there is an element of instruction in this film, since it shows the costumes and in some degree the manners of that period, and to that extent at least is to be commended. So far as the king's infatuation for another man's wife goes, a good many kings have had the same, and this is not especially new. The film is strong dramatically and will appeal to many people for that reason.

"Hector, the Angel Child" (Pathe).—A picture with some elements of humor, yet scarcely one that leaves a favorable impression. Of course much license may be permitted boys to show deliberately and for the edification of other boys how it is possible for one to deceive his parents may be of doubtful utility. The glimpse of the gay life some young men lead in France possesses some glimmer of interest, yet one must say that the picture as a whole is unsatisfactory and does no apparent good by its reproduction on the screen.

"The Honey Industry" (Pathe).—One of this firm's instructive and interesting industrial films. Perhaps no more interesting worker exists than the honey bee, and in this series of clearly photographed pictures the audience is shown the entire mystery of honey production from the time the bees begin work until the rosy baby in the last picture enjoys his feast of the golden sweet. As has been said before of the Pathe industrial films, this carries instruction and interest at the same time. Any sort of industry properly presented is interesting and when one as unfamiliar as this is presented in such an altogether delightful way the pleasure of the audience is doubled. The Pathes cannot produce too many of this sort of pictures.

"The Spanish Girl" (Essanay).—A lively bit of real life illustrating what occurred on the Circle A Ranch. Spanish girls are represented generally as pictures of unrequited passion or jealous rage. This unfortunate seems to be afflicted with both disorders. It leads her to commit a serious offense and almost separte a girl and her lover. It is not necessary to describe all that happened, yet in the picture itself these occurrences form an integral part of the story. It is melodrama, rather overdone, yet lively and interesting because the characters do something. There is action and plenty of it, and the story is told with much force and directness. The photographic quality is satisfactory and some picturesque Western scenery is introduced.

"Three Christmas Dinners" (Lubin).—Here is a complication which will amuse. Three boys accept invitations to dinner from each of their three mothers. The first dinner was good and they attacked it with the most ravenous appetites. The second one did not appeal to them so vividly and the third one was not appreciated at all. The picture is worked out with close attention to the details which would probably be invoked to make such dinners appetizing and attractive. And the effect is indescribably ludicrous. The contagious good humor is one of the principal attractions of this film and results in hearty laughter wherever it is shown.

"Through the Hood River Valley and Along the Columbia River, in Oregon" (Selig).—A beautiful scenic and educational picture, composed of selections from a great number of negatives recently made in that region of scenic and industrial wonders. It is as good as a trip to see this series of views and represents the united work of many long and arduous journeys before it was completed. The salmon industry, for example, is as clearly depicted as the average traveler would see were he actually there. The great apple producing region, the Hood River Valley, is clearly shown and the story of apple growing upon the largest scale in the United States is represented. In the fifteen or twenty minutes it takes for this film to run the average person will learn more of the industries of that wonderful region than he would discover in six months from reading books. Clearly here is an important province of the motion picture which is not overdone. Representing the industries of the country and placing them before people in such a vivid manner is well worthy the attention of those most anxious to disseminate accurate information.

"The Modern Dr. Jekyll" (Selig).—A comedy which will set the audience laughing and keep them at it until the picture ceases. It is one of those pictures that compels attention by its absurdity and then keeps up a roar of laughter by its pure fun. Photography and acting are both good.

"A Trap For Santa Claus" (Biograph).—Who can tell the story of this film? Only he who has undertaken the task of playing Santa Claus for the children. Yes, and he who has been in the depths of despair because of misfortune, who must see his children go without even the simplest remembrances for the Christmas festival. The trap to catch Santa in this instance worked better than the children suspected. It caught Santa, but it also caught their own father, who, during the depths of despair, to which he had been driven, had wandered away and did not know his family's improved fortunes and entered the window to commit a robbery, falling into the trap his own little ones had set. But he is hastily drawn into another room and dons the Santa Claus suit which the mother had intended wearing herself and the little people are wild with delight when they discover who Santa Claus is in this instance. It is a beautiful Christmas story. It is well told, and there is more than a suspicion of mist about the eyes before it is entirely done. And, after all, it breaks into the glad Christmastide of the year, when all differences and disturbances should be overlooked and forgotten. This story will be helpful and may give more than one person a new view of the meaning of the Yuletide.

"The Forgotten Watch" (Vitagraph).—Jumping at conclusions, especially if they are wrong ones, has brought more than one man into a ridiculous position. Perhaps this trite observation is illustrated in quite as amusing a way as it ever has been in this lively Vitagraph comedy. The absentmindedness of Forgetry, a police commissioner, gets a young man arrested for stealing a watch he never saw. And then the young man gets even by deftly removing the commissioner's watch after the latter had made the humblest apologies imaginable. The facial expression of the absentminded commissioner when he discovers what has occurred is well worth the price of admission. Such comedies are sufficiently heavy to maintain interest by requiring good acting, but there is nothing about this one to offend, nor is there a suggestion of silliness.

"Cook Makes Madeira Sauce" (Vitagraph).—A rough-house comedy which represents a number of persons in various stages of inebriety, dishes broken, a manager doused with the contents of some of his own dishes, and the whole melee ending with the firemen driving the drunken cooks from the kitchen of the hotel with a hose. This company has proved by its other release of the same date that it can produce more satisfactory comedy, and it would seem as though it would do well to adhere to that type. Unquestionably some in any audience will vigorously applaud such a picture, but a majority will not, and indicate very plainly that they do not care particularly for such rough and destructive films.

"The Stranger" (Gaumont).—A graphic representation of the trouble an indifferent stepmother may cause in a family, though this designation by no means applies to all. In this instance a little girl is driven from home and then her letters are misread. But the picture has a happy ending. The child is restored to her father and the heartless stepmother is banished. Fortunately this picture depicts merely an exceptional instance, yet perhaps it will exert considerable influence and will set many people thinking.

"A Happy Accident" (Edison).—A pretty Christmas story, well told by the capable Edison actors. Because of an accident to an automobile two poor children are made happy and receive a liberal share of Christmas cheer. If the picture causes thoughts of others and their possible Christmas needs to arise in the minds of even a few who see it, one may well understand that it will accomplish great good. The spirit of Christmas, which, after all, is but the spirit of goodwill and helpfulness, is fostered by what one does for others. Consequently pictures of this type are unquestionably beneficial in proportion as they arouse this feeling, which for one reason or another may be lying dormant.

"The Mischievous Elf" (Edison).—A film with tricks and magic, an elf and a witch, with mystifying combinations and situations, and many laughable scenes and incidents. The elf gets the lovers into trouble in a laughable way, but the trail of magic sand was too much for him and the young man promptly fastened him in the box and disposed of him. The story ends happily, with the lovers in each other's arms, and the supposition that they enjoyed unalloyed bliss ever afterwards.

"Death of the Duke D'Enghien (Pathe).—An exceedingly well acted and photographed picture of a historical episode in French history, which occurred during 1803-1804, when Napoleon was first consul. It relates graphically the fate of the Duke D'Enghien, who was supposed to be plotting against Napoleon and planning to place a Bourbon on the throne. Napoleon assumed that the Duke was the Bourbon prince who was to succeed to the throne, though he had no proof. Spies reported the Duke's absence for days at a time, but he was much in love and was really at the home of his innamorata, or engaged in the pleasures of the chase. Nevertheless, he was condemned to be executed, and even though some excuse for pardoning him was sought, none was found and he was shot at Versailles. The action is very vivid. The characters do their work in the spirit of the piece and occasion, and one imagines for the time that the actual scene is transpiring before one's eyes. The Pathes have been particularly happy in their reproductions of dramatic incidents in French history, and this picture is no exception to the rule. The interpretation is so convincing that one acquires almost unconsciously a keener understanding of the men who were instrumental in enacting the roles here reproduced.

"Beyond the Rockies" (Centaur).—A Western melodrama with robbery, kidnapping, the pursuit of the criminals, several running fights, closing with the rescue of a girl from the hands of a bad gang and the death of the bad man at the hands of his own men. The picture is full of the free, rough and coarse life of the plains and wilds. While one may not like the appearance of the kidnapped girl in the clutches of the bad gang, the picture has many elements of strength which appeal to the average audience with a good deal of force. The setting is very picturesque, giving a good idea of realism. The photography is reasonably clear. Though this firm has not yet mastered the art of keeping their tones clear black and whites marked improvement is noted over some of the former productions of the same trademark.

"The Love of a Savage" (New York Motion Picture Company).—An Indian love story which is based upon the jealousy of one Indian for a rival. There is some good presentation of Indian trailing, one or two shootings, a life and death struggle in which one Indian is killed by a knife thrust, the capture of an Indian and his torture, ending with fastening him to a stake to be drowned by the rising tide. The maiden releases him and they go away together in a canoe, disappearing in the distance, leaving the audience to imagine all sorts of beautiful things concerning them. So far as may be judged by those not counted expert this picture is a reasonably accurate and satisfactory picture of Indian life, representing what could occur, though perhaps no one can say it did occur. However, there is much of interest, and the various picturesque contests are watched with more than ordinary interest.

"The Policeman's Christmas" (Lubin).—A touching little story which will set one thinking. A policeman surprises a burglar in his own house, but when the old man says that he was stealing toys for his children because he could not afford to buy them presents, the policeman investigates and, finding the statement true, turns Santa Claus himself. The picture is not great, but there is a bit of heart to it which causes one to feel the warmth of the season and brings to bear upon perhaps the most indifferent something of the influence of the Yuletide. These little home subjects, with their appeal to the heart, are always attractive and always help in creating a better attitude among those who are trying to do the best they can.

A Coming Headliner—Pathe Film d'Art.

LA DAME AUX CAMELLIAS.

If the opinion were taken of well-informed theatergoers of Paris, London and New York as to which was the most popular play of the last century, it is probable that they would declare for the "La Dame Aux Camellias" ("The Lady with the Camellias"). It is a play by Dumas and under the name of "La Traviata" it was made an opera by Verdi. Ambitious actresses aspire to play Marguerite Gauthier in "La Dame," because it gives a woman on the stage the opportunity of showing off the variety of her histrionic gifts. And the story of love and tragedy is an effective one. The subject, then, is familiar on its merits, and by reason of the fact that every noted actress of international renown, such as Sarah Bernhardt, Duse and others have essayed the part of the heroine, it is a theatrically popular one.

It was inevitable that this picture should form the subject of a Pathe film, and Pathes accordingly are about to release this picture January the 12th. We have no doubt that it will form as great a success as "La Tosca," "Rigoletto," and other noted recent releases of the Pathes.

WM. WRIGHT, OF KALEM COMPANY, IS HONORED BY CHICAGO FILM MEN AND PRESENTED WITH A LOVING CUP.

A banquet in honor of Wm. Wright, the popular and able Chicago representative of the Kalem Company, was held at Hotel La Salle, Wednesday evening, December 15. The festival was given by film men of Chicago as a farewell dinner to Mr. Wright, giving expression of their esteem and friendship now when he is in a few days going to leave a town and territory where he has made innumerable friends. As previously announced in this paper, Mr. Wright has been promoted to general sales manager for the Kalem Company and will leave for New York City, Thursday, December 23. The banquet was a great success, and among those present were Geo. Kleine, Wm. Selig, Geo. K. Spoor, Ivan Runkle, Fred Aiken, John Rock, E. H. Montagu, C. J. Hite, J. Harding and Jos. Hopp. Mr. Kleine acted as toastmaster and the dinner was most delightful from a social as well as an epicurean point of view. At the coffee Mr. Wright was presented with a beautiful loving cup as a sentiment and souvenir of the occasion.

A TIMELY ENTERPRISE.

A new enterprise, incorporated as the Central Park West Amusement Company, is erecting a motion picture theater situated at 36-38 Cathedral Parkway, New York City, to cost $10,000. This house, to be known as the Parkway Theater, will be modern in every way—slanted floor, a special 20-inch opera chair, Power's No. 6 machines, with double dissolving attachments, and Power's inductors.

The company also has a valuable option in the way of an airdome location nearby, which gives it a monopoly of a high-class apartment section. It is understood that Wall street capital is back of the proposition, and that other houses, making use of choice sites on the West Side, will be opened in the near future.

The company feels that the motion picture industry is still an infant, and with the strides that are being made to bring it to perfection, will prove a lucrative investment for such capital as will invest itself under proper lines.

THE MIRROR SCREEN.

In several of my letters I said that New York was the slowest cinematograph city of the United States. Such a statement cannot be denied, as Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Baltimore and many smaller towns show us marvels in moving picture theaters surpassing in beauty, in comfort and in decorations the Unique, ranked as the best New York house. Yet, every person connected with moving pictures goes to New York as the great center, believing to find there the latest improvements and novelties.

I proved that Lancaster, Pa., had the best lighting system to keep the audience out of total darkness without destroying the brilliancy of the pictures; that Pittsburg gave birth to the most ingenious instrument to reproduce the sound effects, etc.

The new "mirror screen," just placed in the "Blue Mouse," of Baltimore, Md., is the greatest sensation of the year. It is a revelation. If I was to tell you that the mirror screen improves the picture 100 per cent., you would not believe me. You must see it to believe it; no mere words can convey the proper impression. I have been long enough in the business to know something, yet I could not realize the wonderful effects of this mirror screen until Mr. Bryan, the manager of the Blue Mouse Theater, demonstrated to me that the picture shown was not one specially prepared to show to advantage the merits of the mirror screen. Mr. Bryan covered part of his new mirror screen with a piece of the old linen screen. It was then night and day. Half of the picture appeared as bright and as clear as could be, with much depth and relief, while the other half appeared flat, dull and dark. This mirror screen makes the picture stand out, gives it an artistic finish and makes it pleasing to the eye.

We have been educated by the great improvements made by some of our manufacturers; we want the best; we appreciate good photography, good acting, good staging, etc., and as the new mirror screen will act as a magnifying glass, our interst will be increased. J. M. B.

FORT LEAVENWORTH PHOTOGRAPHED BY ESSANAY.

Enterprising Chicago Firm Makes Pictures of America's Greatest Army Post.

Several attempts have been made by various film manufacturers to make a successful military picture, but each attempt has met with failure. The Essanay's success is probably due to the fact that their camera men assumed absolute command of the entire Fort Leavenworth forces, with the hearty cooperation of the officers in command. Six thousand feet of negative were used in making the pictures and the choicest parts of these combined films have been condensed into 1,000 feet, making a reel of superlative value.

The writer has never viewed a film of this kind which has presented a more comprehensive display of methods and maneuvers in modern militarism. The film pictures everything from wall scaling practice to the operation of the field wireless. We see the artillery in action, rough riding and bareback riding and pontoon bridge building. This latter feature is most interesting. A strong, serviceable bridge is constructed before our very eyes in less than ten minutes. The picture is a full reel subject and is booked for release Saturday, January 15.

NEWS FROM CHICAGO AND VICINITY.

Mr. Maurice Fleckles, of the Laemmle Film Service, is building a magnificent theater at Waukegan, Ill. The house is located corner Genesee and Washington streets. Contractors are F. O. DeMoney, 144 La Salle street, Chicago. The seating capacity will be 900. Decorations very elaborate, in marble, white and gold. High-class vaudeville and film service, of course, from Carl Laemmle. The house will open in March and the cost will be approximately $20,000.

Another theater will soon be opened at Tennessee street, Waukegan, seating 300, and devoted to pictures only.

OHIO NOTES.

By W. C. Kunzmann.

The Peerless Theater, located on St. Clair street, East Cleveland, Ohio, has been opened by Mr. Chas. Hackenbush. Under his successful management this theater has been packing them in nightly. Mr. Hackenbush believes in holding coupon drawing contests weekly, giving away silverware, cut glass, etc. Since following this policy Mr. Hackenbush states that the box office receipts have increased nightly.

Mr. Sid. Gleichman, a member of the Operators' Union, Local No. 160, I. A. T. S. E., Cleveland, Ohio, is in charge of the booth at the New National Theater, Fifty-fifth street, East, this city. "Sid," as they call him, is an expert operator and electrician, having had years of experience on the road with various road attractions. Mr. Tom Cohen, who has had charge of a number of theaters throughout Ohio, has accepted the position as manager of this magnificent theater.

* * *

The Mall Theater, Superior avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, formerly under the management of the Mall Amusement Company, with Mr. Nolan in charge, has changed hands. Mr. Louis Beck, formerly proprietor of the Dreamland Theater, Euclid avenue, this city, has purchased the Mall and will assume the management in the future.

* * *

The moving picture and vaudeville theater, which recently opened in the Miller Building, East Seventieth street, Cleveland, Ohio, is reported to be doing an immense business.

The Alvin Theater, Woodland avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, opened again on December 1. This theater has been closed for the past three weeks, undergoing new improvements. A new Edison machine has been installed, also the front remodeled and decorated. Mr. Heineman, the manager, reports good business.

Cleveland, Ohio, during the past month, welcomed the opening of the Marvel, a new vaudeville and picture theater. This magnificent playhouse is owned and controlled by the Marvel Amusement Company, with Mr. E. Wagner as acting manager, a man of wide experience in the theatrical world. The new Marvel is one of the prettiest theaters in the city, with its beautiful front of light brick and stone, large lobby and box office, commodious foyer, 600 opera chairs and two handsome boxes, asbestos curtain, large and well equipped stage and dressing rooms. Manager Wagner has given his individual attention to every detail in the construction and furnishings of this new playhouse. There is no doubt but what this theater will enjoy a flattering business, as the old theater did under his management. The latest and best pictures are run here and only first-class vaudeville acts are employed. Mr. C. Pogilalas is chief electrician and operator at this theater. He is a member of the Operators' Union here, Local 160, I. A. T. S. E. Success to the Marvel.

The Union Film Exchange, of Harrisburg, Pa., are building up a good business by taking pains to please all customers.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WHO IS TO BLAME—THE RENTER OR THE EXHIBITOR?

Torrington, Conn., Dec. 6, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Being a lover of good motion pictures, I would like to ask, Why don't we see better pictures in the country? There are three licensed picture places here, and while one is much better than the others, they all have very "rainy" pictures, more or less, some without titles and some with titles and sub-titles unreadable. Some films are not a month old and yet look as bad as some a year old. The other night I saw "The Auto Heroine," which I saw about a year ago, and two or three nights after saw the Biograph "The Open Gate," hardly two weeks old, at the same house. This latter picture, however, was in good condition. Are not licensed pictures over six months old supposed to be destroyed, or am I wrong? And why do the film censors pass such pictures as the Biograph's "Nursing a Viper" and the Vitagraph's "From Cabin Boy to King"? I saw ladies turn from the brutal scenes in both these pictures. And why do we see the same story in some new picture we have seen in old ones, such as "A Dull Knife," "The Violin Maker of Cremona," "Entombed Alive," "Tom Thumb," etc., etc.? This town was picture crazy, but business is dropping off. "There's a reason." "A PICTURE CRANK."

"GET THE MONEY" VS. SQUARE DEALING.

Chicago, Ill., November 6, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In the series of articles headed "The Modern Moving Picture Theater," some very pertinent remarks are made in Chapter VIII., issue of November 6, concerning the matter of advertising a program and not giving it in full.

There is more asininity displayed by alleged "managers" (?) in this one thing than in all others combined. There seem to be thousands of theaters in the hands of men who cannot see one inch beyond their noses. "Get the money" is all they know, or seem to know, and their actions would indicate that either they believe their patrons to be inmates of an asylum for feeble-minded or else they have utterly forgotten there is a to-morrow.

They will advertise three reels and run one, and that one goes through like a horse race. They run utter junk Saturdays and Sundays because, say they, the house will be crowded anyhow and the rottener the show the sooner they will give up their seat to someone else and the more money I'll get. Yes, true, the more money he will get that day; but you just watch the career of that manager. No matter how good his location you sooner or later hear him lamenting the fact that "business is rotten," nor will he apparently be able to account for that fact. His ignorance will probably be most dense and he will deeply and roundly curse the public which declines to be further buncoed by his "get the money" plan of running a theater. The old saying that you may "fool some of the people all the time, all the people some of the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time," holds true in the nickel theater business as well as in any other and sooner or later the swindling manager (it amounts to just that) will get his.

The writer has just opened up a small house in a German neighborhood here in Chicago. This particular house has been opened by several managers before me and was each time a dismal failure from the start.

It had as a consequence an exceedingly bad reputation and many were the predictions of failure when I took it. There is absolutely no transient trade, but the section is amply sufficient to support the house and it is one of the few Chicago locations where there is practically no competition.

The writer first thoroughly cleaned and redecorated the interior and front. He engaged the very best piano player he could get. He engaged a good singer. He put in a $100 graphophone. He put in the latest model Powers machine and a Kosmic transformer (economizer). He engaged film service of two reels on a basis of ten and twenty days from release (one reel ten and one reel twenty). He got out two thousand hand bills and engaged a lady solicitor to place one bill in the hands of the woman of each house in the territory, as far as the bills would go, accompanied by one complimentary ticket. He cautioned the film exchange that as his largest crowds would be Wednesdays, Saturdays and Sundays he must have extra good programs those days in any event. He bought every German song record the Victor people have that is good, and runs one German song each performance, having the piano player rehearse and accompany it.

Result.—He lost $20 the first week. He expected to lose more than that. This is the last end of the second week and every night the crowds increase and it is a fact that every man, woman or child that leaves my theater is a walking advertisement for me. I expect soon to have greater crowds than I can accommodate and right now, for the last four nights, I have "held them out." But I propose to adhere rigidly to my program and I absolutely will not cut one single thing or hurry anything even though 500 people be waiting admittance. I had rather return their money and let them go for that night. That way, I am firmly convinced, lies permanent success.

Let me illustrate the extent to which I go in giving my patrons a square deal: The exchange promised me the film "The Millionaire Cowboy" for one night. By a blunder they sent it out of town so that I could not get it for that night, though I had advertised it. I made the exchange give me an extra reel of feature film and I put up a sign on the front of my ticket office that "owing to unavoidable accident 'The Millionaire Cowboy' cannot be shown to-night," and then I ran three reels of good pictures, one German song, an illustrated song and a spotlight song. This, you may say, is too much for a nickel. It is! Sure it is; but I had broken faith, however unintentionally, with my people and I did all that to square it with them. I succeeded! Will it pay me? You just bet your sweet life it will! My people are learning that there is no bunco business in connection with this theater. I won't make so much in a short time, but I will secure a good, steady, solid patronage which will make me ten times as much in the long run as would a spurt, a bunch of money secured by methods bordering on dishonesty, and then—house closed. I will succeed where others have failed.

Sooner or later, and the sooner the better, the moving picture theater manager has got to learn that he must keep faith with the public. The printed program is not practical for all of us for various reasons. I cannot use one for the simple reason that I cannot get the best film selections and book any way but from day to day, except in case of some feature film like "The Millionaire Cowboy." Don't, don't, don't put on a bunch of junk Saturday and Sundays simply because your house will be full anyhow. Put on the best programs of the week on those days, for you will have the greatest number of people to speak a good word for you or hand you a knock. Very many of them will do one or the other, too, and in time it will tell. F. H. RICHARDSON.

NO. THE EASTERN EXHIBITOR WOULD SAY: "WOT'S DE GUY TRYIN' TO GIVE US?"

Editor Moving Picture World,

123 East Twenty-third street, New York.

Dear Sir—I have been using Independent service for over a year and am well satisfied with it. I continually get stuff like the enclosed letter from this licensed exchange, which in my opinion is the worst sort of rot I have ever read. If their service is as rotten as these letters, I would certainly hate to use it, and would rather close up my house and go back to railroading. Do the houses in the East receive such ridiculous literature as this? Yours very truly,

A. B.

Cinematographic Gargoyles.

To Our Friends, the Exhibitors:

Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad. One indication of ire is an effort to juggle with weighty words the puny can't lift. The fact is, the film renting business is becoming infested with goffs and troglodytes who lack cogitability. Their dissertations cause otalgia, because, when they tell the number of reels they are buying, they are evidently afflicted with amnesia; and when they count the number of reels they don't get, they suffer from strabismus. But their veracity is quite nuncupatory, existing only in nominal form. They lack pulchritude and are most prominently identified by the hulchy, gibbous head. Posing as gonfaloniers of the film business, they are really the coifs and sans coulottes, getting along in dilatory fashion by vermiculation. In fact, instead of being gonfaloniers they are simple little vermicules giving distinct indications of necrobiosis. They act and talk the language of the sawdust arena, but display insuetude when in the presence of educated and refined people. Their exact status is nuncupated the moment they break out at the mouth or attempt polite diction. In nature they are tartarous and especially so when leaders in the film renting business refuse to join their sartances. With all who do not agree they are sophomorical, but this will suddenly subside, for the violent outbursts of vituperation indicate only too plainly their coming relegation to the category of the oreodon and the tragelaph.

Pardon us for this awful outburst, for we are highly amused. Unable to successfully attack the sterling value of our film service, the tenderfoot squad is trying to decry personalities. And right there is where their cause is weak—a sort of six-reels-a-week strength against the behemoth of more than twice that number. Gift of gab gets no customers when the actual reels are not behind the chatter. It may delude the inane, but only for a week or two. The fact is, the exhibitors are keeping wise and they know what is what. When an exchange like this is particularly strong and willing to help its customers, word is sent along the line by a sort of wireless telegraph. Only the blind cannot see the light pointed out. There is not an exhibitor who will not admit and even boast of the fact that the ——— ——— Exchange is the leader in the business. True, there are some who for reasons good and bad would not get service from us, but there are not many such. They will all admit that we are progressive, capable and ambitious. and backed by ample capital to carry out anything we undertake. And we have undertaken to set a pace none other can follow. To try to stem the tide of dissatisfaction with their service our dear friends, the troglodytes, have formed a combination and agreement we absolutely refused to join and the chief tenet of which is to buy only six reels and trade off with each other every two weeks. You know this is true. Are you one of the victims of such trades? Do you have to change the source of your film service every two weeks to get the one or two good reels you need? And do you have to take apathetic productions to fill out your required number of films. Why do they get them and try to force them out on you? Because we refuse to buy such junk and they must get something to keep away from our deluge of the fourteen best on the market, with two more next week and one more the week of November 15, when Essanay gets out the first of the two reels a week shipments. Stop monkeying with fate. Come to us for film service.

THE MOVING PICTURE IN AUSTRALIA.

By W. H. H. Lane.

On this side of the world the ever growing moving picture, instead of showing any signs of falling off, seems to be like the proverbial brook, flowing on forever.

West's Pictures have moved back to the Glaciarium and are doing an enormous business and, with their many and vast undertakings, having no less than fifteen shows running nightly all over the commonwealth and New Zealand, and I do not hesitate to say that they deserve success, for they command it.

One of the features of all their entertainments is the superior class of music that they provide with their shows, and here you will hear Mr. Louis de Groen's Vice Regal Band, of thirty performers, in the very highest class music and appropriately selected to suit the nature of the subjects screened.

Mr. Edwin Goech, the managing director, is ably seconded by Mr. Gee, while Mr. Harry Musgrove has his hands full to look after the piles of coin and correspondence that the vast enterprise entails. Your correspondent is made welcome here, as the flowers of Spring, and it is seldom that he misses a week's program, as he can find as much good entertainment for the eye and mind as if he were at a first-class theater production. Mr. T. J. West looks after the big London end, where he has several shows scattered over the provinces, and besides keeping them supplied, has to see that there are no breaks in the weekly shipment of films to keep so many entertainments going in these parts as well.

Mr. West has secured the sole rights for some of the high class art films that are produced by Pathe Freres and others, and these of course can be seen at no other places on this side. No one wishes them better luck than the writer, for Mr. West is "white" and knows how to treat his empolyees and all who come in contact with him, and the writer extends to all the firm "the season's greetings," that their coffers may continue to overflow, and that good luck may at all times attend them. The West's proprietary has just completed one of the finest, if not the finest moving picture places in Melbourne, which is well looked after by Mr. J. A. Miller, well known to all members of the music and dramatic professions, as well as the artists of vaudeville, as he runs the finest theatrical printing works in Melbourne and has a large clientele.

Mr. C. Spencer, of Lyceum fame, has also his hands full, and he has got one of the best films from a money point of view that has been seen in these parts for many a long day, and that is "Lieut. Shackleton's Dash for the South Pole." Mr. Spencer has had the films on tap at the City Hall (town hall) for four nights, all the time that he could get, and he did an immense business, thousands having to be refused admission long before the show started, and as Professor David, one of the principals of the party, resides in this city, was one of the first nighters and pronounced a very favorable verdict on the truth of the films, and much so, when the recent expose of the film of "Hunting Big Game in South Africa" was shown to have been taken in Chicago, and which as a film were most elaborately commented on in the press, showing the great risk to which the operators of moving picture cameras were exposed, have created no little talk.

The writer, who has been in that part of the world supposed to have been represented, wants to compliment some of the talent that made up as Zulus, and especially the fellow with the big ring in his nose, as he would not hesitate to have sworn that they were the "real cheese," but there used to be a saying that, "the camera cannot lie"; well, that day has passed since moving pictures came on the scene, and nowadays you cannot believe your own eyes, as to what you see with them, on the screen. Mr. Spencer has transferred his "Shackleton" films to "The Lyceum," before taking them on tour, and he was rewarded by a house as full as the proverbial tick. On looking in to see what it was like, I found that I could get my nose inside the theater, but that was about all, and that is the kind of houses I like to see, even if there is no room for poor me.

Mr. Goodman wears a smiling countenance all the time, and Mr. and Mrs. Spencer are simply looking too pleased, if such a thing be possible for any one to be in that mood. Mr. Ernest H. Higgins, the operator who took the Burns-Johnson fight at the Stadium on last Boxing Day, still looks after Mr. Spencer's factory, and is turning out work that is the equal of any produced in any part of the world, and if some of the American firms could get hold of some of his work on this side, and have it displayed to their American audiences, they would get a far better idea of the beauties of this part of the world than by reading books on the subject for a year.

Mr. Spencer is prepared to supply manufacturers of films in the United States with negative films at very reasonable prices, and has all the best and most up-to-date machinery for that purpose, and will be very glad to hear from any of them, that may read these lines. Mr. Spencer has certainly pushed his way to the front as rapidly as any person that I have ever known in the moving picture business, and he has striven to give a good, clean show, and where he is located, he would have to do so, even were he disposed to do otherwise or not, for the building is owned by the great Methodist Church, and they take good care to see that a show be not given that will in any way reflect on their strict, Puritanical ideas of what is good and what is not.

No one ever regretted to see the Lyceum pass from the hands of the former owners into the hands of the church more than the writer, and it should never have been allowed to have done so, as good theater locations in this city are very scarce, and hard to get, and the location was an ideal place for what it was built for, i. e., a theater. Now on Sundays it is used as a place to preach in and to hold prayer meetings, etc., but as it is in a very expensive locality, and the city rates are no respecter of persons, these have to be paid. They are like all other places of worship, constantly on the lookout for the dollars, and how to get the most of them; and perhaps after all, it's the only thing most people live for, and not for the good of their health.

The Victoria Theater will be reopened on the 30th inst., having all been pulled down and rebuilt specially for a moving picture theater or hall, and it is in strict accordance with the latest acts of Parliament, relating to moving picture theaters and will be one of the most delightful places in the city. Mr. King, owner.

The Bijou Theater, next to the Glaciarium, at the Railway square, is doing a splendid business, and have one of the best machines in this city; they certainly show as steady a picture as any place I ever visited, and the operating room is made from asbestos, and should a fire be started in it, it by no means could get outside of the operator's room, the only chance for it to do so, would be through the lens holes and the peep hole used for focusing the pictures on the screen. This show is run by The Bijou Amusements, Ltd., and their address is Sydney, N. S. W. Herr Thiele, who was formerly managing director of this concern, has sold out his interests and has taken a long lease of the New Queens Hall, which has been all remodeled to suit the new act, has been renamed "The Globe," and is doing a good business. Herr Thiele says that the only trouble is, that the place is not larger. All the latest and best films are shown, and the programs are changed every week, with the same care used weekly to see that the program is right up to the standard laid down at the commencement of the season.

The "Colonial." This is the Old Oxford Theater, on George street, which has just changed hands and has been taken over by Mr. J. D. Williams, of Seattle, Wash., and has been beautifully fitted up with an American arched entrance and well iluminated with lots of incandescent lights, tastefully arranged in the arch and front of the theater, done in pure white in imitation of marble, and he has introduced an innovation into this part of the world of continuous performances from 11 A. M. to 11 P. M. How he has done, I am not prepared to say, as I have neglected to call in on him since the opening day, notwithstanding that I have a season ticket, available at any time; but my son went, and he says the pictures, while good, are not up to date, and that he will have to keep right up to date if he wants to draw Sydney patrons, for all the big shows here have, in many instances, pictures screened before they are in the United States.

Messrs. Pathe Freres have opened a large place in Melbourne, and will carry full lines of this firm's goods. The fewest films screened here, seems to be the Edison make, and why, I am at a loss to understand, but such is nevertheless the case. Mr. C. Spencer is the sole distributing agent here for the Edison make of films, and yet, strange to say, he seldom shows one on his long and varied program.

Messrs. Harringtons, Ltd., seem to be doing the greatest film business, but Messrs. Baker & Rouse Proprietary, Ltd., run them closely, and they are the agents for Gaumont's. Messrs. Jerdans, Ltd., handle a lot of film, but they do not take a single trade paper, and that I am also at a loss to understand, as they used to be large advertisers at one time, and they know the use and value of advertising, yet they informed me that they did not get one of any kind in the moving picture trades. Strange if true, and I have no reason to doubt it.

If some, or all, of the advertisers in your paper would post me their catalogues and best export prices, I would place them where they could be at all times inspected, and where they would do them some good. There would be a good field for slides on this side, if they were to try to capture some of the business going, and I would be only too pleased to help them to do so, and if they care to post me a sample or two I will show them to the trade and see what can be done with them. All letters must be fully prepaid, as I am getting tired of paying short-paid letters with the heavy fines attached, and in nearly every instance we have to pay on American correspondence, but never have I had to do so on continental correspondence. Address Dr. W. H. H. Lane, Q. V. M. Branch, Sydney N. S. W. Postage for letters is 5 cents each half-ounce or fraction of same. Please see to this, that postage is fully paid, and if you write for information, and expect replies, please enclose six two-cent United States postage stamps, or 12 one-cent, as I can use them all right.

New York City.—The old German Mission Church, at 141 East Houston street, has been converted into a moving picture theater, the old pews being used as seats. Steiner & Markow are the proprietors and will conduct it as a first-class show house.

Aberdeen, Wash.—The new Bijou, on Heron street, was opened on October 25 by Harry Chancellor and H. B. Fauntleroy. The Bijou is a very pretty show house, with a seating capacity of 800. Elliott Johnson, formerly of the Empire, is in charge of the electrical equipment.

New Brunswick, N. J.—The Unique Theater, 210 Neilson street, reports increase in attendance. This theater is under the management of Messrs. Phillips and Schmurtz, who exhibit nothing but first run films and up-to-date song slides. It is a well-conducted house and the employees are very courteous.

New York City.—The Yonkers Amusement Company, located at 482 Third avenue, are giving four vaudeville acts and pictures. They do not give illustrated songs, as they are competing against a house in the immediate vicinity that gives a larger number of vaudeville acts, together with moving pictures.

New York City.—The Crown Theater, on West 116th street, under the management of Mr. Schwartz, reports good business through exhibiting Independent pictures. He says that every one of them proves to be a drawing card for him. His young lady vocalist sang very nicely to a set of De Witt C. Wheeler's slides.

New York, N. Y.—Allen Lexow, owner of the moving pictheater, at the corner of Third avenue and Fifty-fifth street, is having plans prepared for the remodeling of the entire structure.

Clarkshill, Ind.—Purdy Bros., from Kirklin, Ind., have opened a new moving picture theater here.

Elk Rapids, Mich.—Harold Spring and Wm. Cranford have purchased the moving picture show of H. F. Silver and have taken possession.

Philadelphia, Pa.—George Hogg has a contract to build a moving picture theater at 515 Moyamensing avenue for Charles A. Calehuff.

Connellsville, Va.—Hopton & Evans have erected a new moving picture theater here and will run first-class moving pictures and vaudeville.

Havana, Ill.—Arrangements have been made for the erection of a new moving picture theater, at the corner of Plum and Market streets.

Philadelphia, Pa.—A permit was granted to John Wilbraham to erect a moving picture theater at Frankford avenue and Sergeant street.

Palmer, Mass.—The New England Amusement Company has leased the Opera House and will convert it into a first-class moving picture show.

Aberdeen, S. D.—C. T. Smithers is now president and manager of the "Idle Hour" circuit, having bought out the interest of V. B. Valleau.

Huntington, Ind.—Schuster & Curtis, of Findlay, Ohio, are making arrangements to open a moving picture theater here, on West Market street.

Moundsville, Va.—Asher T. Lewis has purchased a half interest in the Oscar Manes Nickelodeon, at the corner of Third and Jefferson streets.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Franklin Amusement Company has opened a new picture house at 1205 North Fifty-second street, which will cost $9,000.

St. Joseph, Mo.—A new moving picture theater has been erected on the west side of Ballinger's building, under the management of Fred Cosman.

Washington, D. C.—Harding & Upham have completed the plans for the construction of a new moving picture theater in M street, Georgetown.

New York City.—Carney M. Marre and John Galella have leased the Everett Hall, 31 East Fourth street, and will convert it into a moving picture theater.

Chelsea, Mass.—The Gordon Brothers Amusement Company have made application for a license to operate their new moving picture theater on Broadway.

Reading, Pa.—Geo. W. Bennethum, of this city, has purchased the Dreamland Theater, at Third avenue and Main street, Coatesville, from J. W. Dettra.

Marquette, Mich.—J. C. Woodworth, of Ispheming, Mich., has purchased the Grand Motion Picture Theater here from Mrs. Bennett and has taken possession.

Little Rock, Ark.—The colored people here will have a new moving picture show. It is to be in the old Metropolitan Hall. Louis H. Slaughter is to manage it.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Architect E. Allen Wilson has completed plans for the erection of a new moving picture theater at 1420 Point Breeze avenue for Daniel Gallagher.

Baltimore, Md.—The Waverly Amusement Company has purchased some land on York road, near Gorsuch avenue, as a site for a large moving picture and vaudeville theater.

Muskogee, Okla.—The Merchants' Theater Company has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $5,000. The incorporators are W. P. Hill, A. E. O'Lirien and L. B. O'Brien.

Hoosick Falls, N. Y.—A new moving picture theater in the Lurie Building, on John street, has opened its doors, with Samuel Schweizer as its manager. The seating capacity is 300.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Architect E. Allan Wilson has completed plans for a moving picture theater to be erected at Fifty-second and Sampson streets for the Auditorium Amusement Company.

Chicago, Ill.—The Chicago Theater Construction Company has been awarded the contract for the erection of an amusement park for the Roosevelt Park Company, at Irving Park boulevard and Fifty-second street.

St. Joseph, Mo.—J. F. Blitz, proprietor of the Bijou Dream, is not satisfied with controlling one theater, for he is contemplating on constructing another, to be christened the Princess, and to cost $10,000.

Norwalk, Conn., will in future be a moving picture town. A New York concern is interested in the enterprise. This is the first time Norwalk folks had a chance to see moving pictures in their home town.

The Crescent Moving Picture House, 37 West 135th street, has recently opened for business. They purchased, through the Actograph Company, 107 East Seventeenth street, a Power's Cameragraph No. 5, New York approved equipment.

We have to thank Mr. F. Montgomery, the moving picture man of Memphis, Tenn., for a handsome desk blotter with the compliments of the season. The same to you, Mr. Montgomery, and many of them.

No more useful, lasting or more appreciated Christmas gift reached us this year than a neat, leather-mounted desk calendar, embossed in gold, with the compliments of the Vitagraph Company. The calendar inserts are good for two years—a fitting symbol of Vitagraph vitality. The members of the Vitagraph Company have our hearty thanks and sincere wishes for a prosperous New Year.

H. A. Spamuth, proprietor of the Dandy Film Exchange, 10 East Fifteenth street, New York, is the general agent for the Roto Puzzle Pictures on which we commented in last week's paper.

The United Film Service, of 121 East Twenty-third street, are adding customers to their list probably faster than any other exchange. Their liberal purchases of all new Independent films places them in a position to talk exclusive service.

Geo. M. Krupa, the leading moving picture exhibitor at Lancaster, Pa., who owns the Dreamland Theater, has installed a 35 to 40 ampere Hallberg Automatic Electric Economizer for 110 volt direct current, which is producing as fine a light as is possible on the sheet. This Economizer was specially constructed in view of the keen competition between the Dreamland and the other Lancaster theaters, and Mr. Krupa spared no expense in securing the results he was looking for.

NOTES FROM TRENTON, N. J.

The Trenton moving picture managers complain that the Motion Picture Patents Company is giving them no protection for the $2 they are paying each week. For nearly ten months the State Street Theater has been waging the most bitter fight against the moving picture places, in showing from four to five reels of pictures and from four to five vaudeville acts for five and ten cents. The Dreamland closed its doors, while the other five houses have done their best to hold out, but have made no money. Even the shows near the Roebling works have suffered, as two of them are a thing of the past. During those ten months the M. P. P. Co. has collected from $400 to $500 from the Trentonians and not one cent of this money, paid for protection, has been applied to put a check on the unfair competition of the State Street Theater.

On the other hand, the Trenton exhibitors are constantly in receipt of letters from the Motion Picture Patents Company asking them questions as to how many reels they use, what they pay for the service, etc.; in other words, trying to dictate orders. The exhibitors are very willing to pay $104 annually for protection, but they do not want to pay this tax if they are simply bothered with inquiries which amount to nothing. The Motion Picture Patents Company cannot plead ignorance, as this same subject has been exposed several times.

At the Nicolet, the "Life of Moses" was shown, being one of the best productions of the Vitagraph Company, and the interest was greatly increased by an appropriate lecture by W. Stephen Bush.

The Star, also a licensed house, is strongly opposed to vaudeville and believes that good pictures will win each time. The Bijou has been tempted to try a few vaudeville acts, but after two weeks of experience the manager informed me that he was going to return to pictures only.

The Limit, a theater near the Roebling Works, claims that the "limit" of patience has been attained with the non-inflammable film. On account of the location, in a working dictrict, the Limit having only three hours' show from 7 to 10, cannot show first run and claim that the non-inflammable film is practically hors de combat after three weeks of service.

TO SAVE HER SOUL.—There are two deaths, the physical and the moral, and the moral death is unquestionably the most fearful. Moral death crushes its victim eternally, and wounds those who are near and dear to the one crushed. How fervent should be our prayer "Lead us not into temptation," for temptation is the germ which inoculates us with the fatal disease of sin. Insidious and vulpine are the toxic allurements of temptations; and so powerful, that once given rein, no amount of resistance can subdue them. In just this position was placed Agnes Holley, the pretty little choir singer of the village church. Paul Redmond is the young curate of the church and has taken quite a fancy to the little singer, not fully realizing that he deeply loved her until one day while Agnes was practicing the music on the organ her beautiful voice attracted the attention of a party in an automobile that has become disabled on the road outside the church. The occupant of the auto is none other than a great vaudeville manager, who, struck with this fresh young voice, offers the little singer an opportunity to shine at his music hall. It is now that Paul realizes how much he loves the girl, and appreciating the danger, that may beset her, tries to persuade her not to accept the offer. Despite his pleading she goes and is soon introduced into a new and dazzling circle. Arduous study and rehearsals fit her for her debut, and her first night is a triumph. She is destined to become the toast of Bohemia. Paul reads in the newspapers of her success and decides to go to see her. He views her performance with elation until he hears the flippant remarks of the men seated around him. He feels that her fate will be that of the oft told story, and he resolves to save her. Hastening to the stage, he arrives just after she has left with one of the reckless swells on their way to a banquet given in her honor. Upon arriving at the house, he forces his way into the banquet hall, and the sight that greets him freezes his blood. Wine is flowing like water, and little Agnes, with a glass of champagne in her hand is standing upon a chair about to respond to a toast to herself. Paul's abrupt entrance is met with derision, but Agnes, stunned at his appearance, consents to an interview in the anteroom. Here she, now inflamed by the wine, derides and mocks him, and refuses to go away from this awful place with him, when he espies a revolver, and crazed by jealous love, would have killed her that her soul might remain pure. This move is a shock to Agnes, and it tends to awaken in her the love for Paul that has laid dormant all the while. She now appreciates the escape she has made, and we next find them kneeling side by side at the altar of the little village church giving thanks to God for her deliverance and His blessings.

THE DAY AFTER.—"R-E-M-O-R-S-E-, the water wagon is the place for me." How many will sing this well-known refrain on the first day of the New Year, making their determination to turn over a new leaf all the stronger. "Never Again!" will resound throughout the land like a reverberating echo, and the ice-water pitcher will be pressed into active service. This Biograph comedy shows a party, the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Hilton, seeing the Old Year out, in the time-honored custom. The guests begin to arrive, each couple costumed to represent a particular month or season. In the anteroom is a mammoth bowl of punch, but as Mrs. Hilton says, quoting a well-known administrator, "John, this is for the guests, not for us." John is content, as his resolution was now young and healthy. Mrs. Hilton was the first to feel the chill of this unresponsive greeting, and turning to John says, "We'll take just one glass with these, our best friends." This one drink with our best friends is repeated many times until—well, John is feeling pretty good, and Mrs. Hilton is by no means in the depths of melancholy. In the ballroom, things are pretty lively, and when the Old Year, typified by an old man with a scythe, appears he is hustled off to give place to a young girl representing the New Year. The assemblage now becomes dithyrambic, blowing horns, hurling paper ribbons and confetti and dancing madly about. Meanwhile, John is having the time of his life as is also Mrs. Hilton. But, Oh! What a difference in the morning. In John we see a sorry sight. He is a sick and contrite being. He realizes his conduct has not been very becoming, and despairs of receiving his wife's forgiveness. However, he learns that Mrs. Hilton feels herself a most guilty personage, and that she is totally ignorant of his escapades, so he assumes an air of austere dignity and most condescendingly listens to her pleading for forgiveness, which he grants.

CHOOSING A HUSBAND.—This is one of the most momentous undertakings in the young girl's life. It elicits as much concern as the selection of a horse or any other beast of burden. Many things are to be considered—is he stable in nature? being the most important. Fickleness would be the greatest of sins. Hence, when Gladys is sought by each of the four jolly bachelors on the third floor back, she resolves to test their sincerity. To this end tells each to call on the morrow. This quartette of would-be benedicts are ignorant of each other's intentions. The morrow has arrived, and Galdys enlists the services of her pretty little sister to test their imperviousness, while she in hiding notes the result. They arrive one by one, at the appointed hour, to be told that Gladys is out, but unfortunately they find little sister most entertaining and fall one after the other. At their rooms they learn the cause of each other's dejection and indignantly vow to visit her en masse for satisfaction. No sooner suggested than done. Off they go and arrive only to find sweet Gladys enfolded in the arms of Harry, her sweetheart, who has just arrived from abroad.

EDISON MFG. CO.

TOBACCO MANIA.—The gentleman photographed read a newspaper account of a new disease called "tobacco tremeus," caused by excessive use of tobacco, and having the same symptoms as delirium tremens. With the thought of what he had read uppermost in his mind and considerably worried over his own craving for "the weed," he retires for the night, half determined to give up the habit. It is then that the power and effect of suggestion is conclusively shown to us. In his dreams he is seated in his library, deriving comfort out of the stem of his favorite pipe, when an enormous snake glides across the floor at his very feet. Before he can recover from the shock a teddy-bear brushes his elbow from a convenient position on the stand and an imp of the devil dances his greeting, appearing and disappearaing in bewildering fashion. Seized by a panic, the gentleman dashes from the house along a moon-lit road, peopled by pursuing animals and torturing fiends of all descriptions. Just as he is run through by the sword of His Satanic Majesty he wakes up and, realizing that the creatures that have caused him to suffer the tortures of the damned exist only in his disordered imagination, he is so relieved and impressed by the wonderful realism of the dream that he swears off smoking at once.

THE FALLEN IDOL.—Tenors are proverbially temperamental in constitution, but the actions of the one pictured on this film prove that the word is more often than not employed as a polite way of saying "the man has a nasty temper." This particular one had been feted and petted by an admiring public until, as is invariably the case, his head became completely turned by the excessive attention shown him.

Two young matinee girls worship this tenor from afar off, and when one of them reads an ad in the paper for a maid in his household, she applies for the position in order to be constantly in attendance upon the idol of her dreams, whose home life she is positive must be ideal. She secures the position very easily, but doesn't remain long, as the tenor in his home life has a horrible temper and is not afraid to show it to either his wife or his servants. He is exactly the reverse of all that she had fondly pictured him to be and her awakening is both rude and lasting, as well as humiliating, for she is compelled to perform all kinds of the most menial offices for him. He is a perfect tyrant in the amount of attention and despatch that he demands. When, indignant at his overbearing manner, the maid leaves, she upsets the household by visiting retribution, swift and plenty, upon her "idol" to such an extent that he is unable to appear at the concert that evening, but is compelled to stay at home for repairs.

THE CAP OF FORTUNE.—An old woman was walking through the woods one day, so extremely hungry she could hardly stand. A gentleman (that is, in appearance) passed by, refusing her plea for alms. Shortly afterwards a poor man, while gathering nuts for his own starving family, found her lying in a faint by the roadside. He hastened to a pool and, filling his hat with water, carried it to where she was lying and revived her. When he heard of her hunger he immediately gave her all of the nuts he had gathered. The old woman was a fairy who, as a reward for his kindness, gave him a cap, the wearer of which would always have in his pocket one golden crown, no more and no less.

Naturally, the good man was overjoyed at his good fortune and, after testing the power of the cap until assured that its magic was unfailing, he hastened home to tell his wife. On the way he was attacked and robbed of the cap by two robbers. They did not retain possession of it very long, however, for the old fairy changed herself into a black bear and frightened them so badly that they ran away, leaving the cap on the ground. The old fairy then changed herself to a young fairy and, finding the two little children of the man to whom she had given the cap originally, she led them to where the cap lay and hurried them home with it. The poor man had arrived at his home heartbroken at his loss, and his good wife was doing her best to console him when the children arrived with the cap. Imagine, if you can, his joy at recovery, for, of course, as long as he had this cap, he need never want for anything.

JACK'S BIRTHDAY.—Jack O'Rourke and his wife, Molly, have just moved into their new flat and it happens that Jack's birthday comes on the same day that they take possession of their new domicile. On his way to the new abode, Jack has stopped to visit some of his bartender friends, taking with him from each place a small parcel, until when he pulls up at the street door of the apartment building, he is carrying with some difficulty a large sized "package." Besides the package he has managed to bring with him other articles—a turkey, handbag full of bottles, a small pup, etc.

Jack finds he has left his latch key at home and after ringing the bell for some time with no answer, borrows a ladder from a workman nearby and enters his new flat via the fire escape.

Molly, in the mentime, had awaited patiently for hubby, and each time the bell rang had answered it to admit a messenger boy. The first one brought Molly a new hat, the second a large bouquet of carnations and the third a portrait of some gentleman individual whom she did not know. Each token bore the legend, "From your loving Jack." The latter gift mystified her, but she resolved to wait until Jack came home, when he would undoubtedly clear up the mystery.

When Jack enters Molly has gone in search of the janitor and Jack immediately suspicions something when he discovers the new hat flowers and the portrait of the gentleman on the sideboard.

Molly and the janitor enter and Jack crawls under the table. He is convinced that the janitor is his wife's lover. There is finally a fight in which the janitor is sadly worsted and kicked out of the room.

A few minutes later the first messenger boy enters and says the hat he had delivered some time ago belonged to "de loidy" upstairs. The hat is turned over to the messenger boy, while the two other gifts, which Jack had destroyed, are substituted with clever imitations.

Finally the janitor brings in a policeman to arrest Jack, but the officer of the law is unceremoniously rolled into the folding bed and the bed closed on him.

Jack and Molly then sit down to their repast, while the policeman peeks out from the side of the folding bed and looks dolefully on.

THE POLICEMAN'S REVOLVER.—The story concerns Officer O'Toole of the City Police and his sweetheart, Kathleen. Officer O'Toole, on his rounds, has stopped at Kathleen's house to bid her "the top o' the mornin'." They chat awhile and then the big policeman bids his sweetheart good-bye.

He has been gone but a few minutes when Kathleen discovers her sweetheart's revolver on the front step, it having slipped from his pocket unnoticed by either of them.

Kathleen, brandishing the heavy weapon, starts down the street at a run throwing the passershy in a panic, upsetting many, and generally disturbing the peace and quiet of the neighborhood. By the time she has traversed a few blocks she has quite a following of citizens, who either think her mad or intent on murdering someone.

In the meantime the arm of the law has walked his beat, unconscious of having lost his pistol. He enters a park and is attracted by the screams of a woman in distress. Hurrying to the scene of the outcry he finds a woman struggling with a sneak thief, who is endeavoring to snatch her handbag from her.

He grapples with the thief and they roll over and over on the gravel walk. Policeman O'Toole, reaches for his revolver and finds it gone. The thief finally gets the best of the fight and is about to make short work of the officer when Kathleen runs up to them, pulls the thief off and hands the revolver to her fiance.

Kathleen has arrived in time to save her sweetheart's life and when the angered citizens who suffered indignities through her haste learn the cause of her hurry, they shower congratulations on her.

A WESTERN MAID.—Nell Hargrave, our heroine, is the daughter of the general storekeeper at Dobson's Corners, Tex. Thirty miles from the nearest railroad, the settlements far and few between, Hargrave's Emporium is the hub of the surrounding territory. Uncle Sam has installed a post office and the Great Western Express Company has made Hargrave their agent, while the stage coach, arriving at noon each day, changes horses, leaves the mail and whatever express there may be.

On the day that our story opens the stage driver leaves in Hargrave's care a small, heavy box, addressed to the Southwestern Mining Company, and containing several thousand dollars in gold, pay for the mining company's employees. Word has leaked out, however, that the money is to be sent on this day and as the coach drops the box and continues its journey a horseman, dodging behind a clump of trees further down the road, wheels suddenly about and gallops off in the opposite direction.

THE DAY AFTER

SEEING THE OLD YEAR OUT

The first day of the year is the day of resolutions, and almost everyhody gives free rein to their habits until the stroke of twelve, when the new leaf is turned over. The awful remorse of the next morning makes us more determined to keep the resolve. Mr. and Mrs. Hilton celebrate seeing the old year out in a time-honored custom. Hilton is guilty of little indiscretions induced hy the punch-howl, and the next morning he is afraid to meet his wife; hut when she confesses that she had imhihed too deeply of the punch to notice anything, it is then his turn to play "Mr. Dignity." Length, 460 feet.

CHOOSING A HUSBAND

Four jolly hachelors are each unknown to the other in love with Gladys, and she is unable to decide, as they are all rather attractive, so she tells each one she will give him an answer on the morrow. On the morrow she decides to test their sincerity and sets a trap. Her pretty sister receives them, while Gladys in hiding watches. Each falls a victim to little sister's artlessness, and is dismissed. In their room each confides the cause of his dejection and they indignantly revisit Gladys, only to find that her old sweetheart Harry has returned from abroad and won out. Length, 531 feet.

Special Quotations for Large Quantities

An hour later the horseman pulls his rein at an isolated "dobe," whistles and is joined by his two accomplices. A hurried word of explanation and the other two leap into their saddles and follow their leader back to Dobson's Corners.

They arrive at Hargrave's store and find the old gentleman alone. He is overpowered, dragged from the place and forced to tell them where the express box is secreted. He volunteers to do so and they enter the store again.

Nell arrives on the scene, peers through the window and sees her father struggling with the thieves. She resolves to summon help and springing into the saddle of one of the highwaymen's horses, catches the bridle reins of the others and hurries away.

When the thieves, having secured the booty, leave the store they find their mounts gone, but confident of making their escape they hurry away on foot.

Nell, in the meantime, has arrived at the Trumbull ranch, told her story and enlisted a half dozen cowboys to aid her in capturing the bandits. They ride back to the store, the father is released and then the cowboys, headed by Nell, dash away in pursuit of the thieves.

Finally they strike their trail and are soon upon them. Leaving their horses behind the cowboy posse and the girl follow the bandits through the timber, exchanging shots. Driving the robbers into the open, two of the baudits are shout and wounded, but the chap with the money eludes them.

The fight in the timber is resumed. The last bandit, concealing himself behind a clump of bushes, refuses to surrender and hold all at bay. He proves himself a most able defender, for every shot he fires takes effect.

The cowboys are about to give up in despair and look about for Nell to ask her advice. She has disappeared. They are panic stricken when they come to a conclusion that she must have met her death from one of the bandit's bullets, but a moment later they hear a feminine yell of triumph and Nell appears from behind the bush with the thief before her, his hands above his head. She had come up on his rear and cleverly surprised him.

The last of the bandits captured and Nell the hero of the hour. She is given a hearty cheer for her courage and diplomacy, even the thief smiling to think that it took a woman to beat him.

WHY HE DID NOT WIN OUT; Or, Grandpa's Wig.—Grandpa is quietly dozing in his arm chair in his room when his two mischievous grandchildren, Nellie and Grace, steal into the room intent on playing a joke on the old fellow.

Downstairs their mother is entertaining a number of lady friends, among whom is a handsome young lady, whom Grandpa has taken something of a fancy to. Indeed, his aspirations have been most giddy and when with her has been encouraged to propose matrimony.

He has waited all afternoon for an invitation to join the card party, but he has waited in vain and finally fallen asleep.

The two little ones hit upon a scheme to bring the old gentleman to his senses. They steal noiselessly out of the room, go to a wig store and purchase a bright red "Bridget's" wig.

When they return the old gentleman is still in his slumbers and, deftly removing his own wig, they slip over his bald pate the hideous feminine thing. Then waking Grandpa they tell him that he has been invited to join the ladies at a game of cards.

Grandpa hurries out of the room and enters the parlor where his daughter and the guests are assembled. His entrance is greeted by screams of laughter from the trio. He looks at them painfully, questioningly, then his hand steal to his head, which appears to be the cause of their hilarity and removes the wig!

Grandpa collapses, then beats a hurried retreat from the room resolved to annihilate the two youngsters who had played the trick on him. But they—wise ones—had hidden themselves in the cellar, choking with laughter, fully satisfied that their pennies had been well invested.

A SLAVE TO DRINK.—This film illustrates the story of a man's struggle to overcome an inherited love for drink. Although yet a young man, the enemy of his family had already sunk its claws firmly upon James Grant. A man of superior intelligence, his habits hold him down to the lot of a common laborer in a small saw mill on the St. Johns River. About two years before the opening of the picture he had met and fallen in love with Jenny, the daughter of a small farmer, living near the saw mill. Under the influence of her great love he has succeeded in throwing off the burden of his hereditary desires. For three months he has not touched a drop of liquor.

Scene I.—Grant Has Broken His Pledge to Jenny.

Scene II.—The Inherited Thirst for Drink Overcomes Grant's Love.

Scene III.—The Insult—Jenny Witnesses Grant's Downfall.

Scene IV.—Grant Determines to Forswear Love.

Scene V.—Grant Resists the Tempter.

Scene VI.—The Fall—Grant Decides to End It All.

Scene VII.—At Death's Threshold.

Scene VIII.—Grant Departs for the Struggle.

Scene IX.—The Victory Won.

Scene X.—Five Years Later.

A CLEVER SLEUTH.—Mr. Fox, the eminent private detective, sees an announcement in the paper of a burglary having been committed in the mansion of Mr. Astorhilt.

All the efforts of the police to locate the culprit proving futile, Mr. Fox determines to take the case in hand himself.

Accordingly he goes to Mr. Astorhilt's house, where he finds the police engaged in a vain search for traces of the culprit.

As soon as the robber learns that Mr. Fox is on his tracks, he takes to his heels.

Tobacco, however, proves to be the undoing of the thief, for the astute Mr. Fox picks up a cigarbutt dropped by him, notes the rank odor of it and by this means, after a most careful search, succeeds in tracking him to his hiding place, where he cleverly effects his capture.

HUSH MONEY.—Mr. Cook, a man of neat appearance, makes it his business to frequent department stores, where he extorts money from patrons by the following clever ruse:

He takes something off the counter, puts it in the pocket of a respectable old gentleman and goes away. After a few moments he returns and, addressing his victim, claims to be a store detective and says that he will have to arrest him for having stolen a certain article.

Of course, the gentleman protests his innocence, but upon the false detective making him turn out the contents of his pockets and produce the article in question, the poor fellow offers a sum of money to avoid further trouble and possible arrest.

Next, Mr. Cook meets with a family consisting of the father, mother, son and daughters. He puts something in the son's pocket and levies blackmail on the father.

His third venture results differently. His victim sees him and has him promptly arrested.

THE LEGION OF HONOR.—The scene opens in Germany at the time of the French revolution. The French army is on German soil. Between the fighting of two battles. "Fan Fan" comes into the world. He is the son of a soldier and his wife, the canteen woman of the regiment. The infant is baptized in the chapel of a castle which has been taken by the French. The servant of the priest acts as godmother. At the age of eight years Fan Fan drills like an old soldier before Napoleon Bonaparte. Six years later France is again at war with Germany. Fan Fan and his father, when leaving the camp, fall into an ambuscade. They are taken before the commander-in-chief and staff of the enemy, who now occupy the same castle where Fan Fan was baptized fourteen years previously.

Fan Fan's father is led away to be shot, as he refuses to disclose the whereabouts of the French army. Fan Fan is imprisoned in the belfry-tower of the castle. Noticing the big alarm bell hanging over his head he barricades himself in and then rings the alarm bell, hoping that the French will hear it. His wishes are realized. The French come in, surround the enemy and rout them.

Fan Fan falls mortally wounded in the tower, where his mother finds him later.

Napoleon decorates the young hero with the cross of the Legion of Honor and orders him to be buried, wrapped in two flags captured from the enemy.

BURIED ALIVE.—Two old prospectors, John Hanford and Jim Rowe, do their best to accumulate a fortune by digging for gold. Rowe's son, Simon, is in love with Lucy, daughter of Hanford, but she is, as yet, undecided as to the status of her feelings towards her ardent lover.

After months of work, the old partners strike a rich claim, and in connection thereto are two men of dissolute habits, who believe in the axiom that "the end justifies the means." By name they are Pete Horner and Jake Rooney. Their mode of living has been by the robbing of sluice boxes of poor Chinese prospectors.

They hear of this "strike," and proceed to scheme whereby they may secure some right or title to it. Horner makes love to Lucy, thinking that thereby he may locate just where the claim lies, and she almost reciprocates his pretended affection.

We see Horner and Rooney following the two miners. On their way they meet a Chinaman "washing gold." Desiring possession of that gold a fight ensues in which the Chinaman is bested. Thinking him "hors du combat" for good and all, the two men proceed farther until they reach the mine. Seeing the entrance they set dynamite and fuse in hopes of entombing the men within. This done they turn to leave and find that the "Chinee" has followed them. Another struggle ensues in which the Celestial is thrown over a cliff, and the two men proceed to their cabin in hopes that Hanford and Rowe will die within the confines of their own claim.

The next day Pete goes to the cabin of the two miners. There he meets Lucy and while endeavoring to assure her of his love for her, is confronted by the Chinaman with axe in hand.

Now Lucy learns of the treachery and deceit of her pretended lover, and while the Chinaman holds Pete at his mercy, Lucy speeds her way for the rescue of her father.

We find her meeting campers nearby; she explains her predicament. At once they go to the mine and after much labor succeed in rescuing the miners, who, bewildered and almost suffocated, proceed back to their cabin with Lucy, to behold the cowardly Pete still subjugated by the Chinaman.

During the attempted robbery of this claim, a Deputy United States Marshal has been searching for Horner and Rooney on other charges. He comes and Horner and Rooney are both made prisoners, the Chinaman is given a small interest in the mine, and Lucy, made wiser by experience, gives hand and heart to Simon, who has never failed to be constant as well as persistent in his love for her.

A DAUGHTER OF THE SIOUX.—It's a bleak October morning in the early sixties. It was a scene common enough then, and we owe much to the men who faced death daily in the line of duty that this great region might become a land of peace and plenty. The scene in question was the disarming of a warlike band of Sioux by a United States officer, Colonel David Webb. The warriors are drawn up near an Indian village. A Gatling gun is turned on the village. The Colonel has just ordered the corporal's guard to begin the work of disarmament. Two Lance refuses his weapon to the soldier who has reached for it. A scuffle ensues, the gun is accidentally discharged, wounding a trooper. In a moment all is mad excitement. The "Boys in Blue" have answered the bugle call. White Eagle and his band are rounded up, and he, with the rest, surrender. The Colonel's report reads: "There has been a sharp encounter, but your order to disarm the Indians has been executed." Naoma, the wife of Two Lance, has been struck by a bullet from the Gatling gun, and lies by the side of her husband's dead body; near them sit two children, a baby girl of three and a boy of six. The army surgeon is ministering to the wounded Indians, but an examination shows him that Naoma is past human help. The Colonel steps beside the squaw and is touched by her agony. Naoma reads the sympathetic look in his eyes; her dying thought is for her children and by signs she asks the Colonel to care for her little ones, soon to be left motherless. The Colonel is a bachelor and the appeal in the woman's eyes strikes a cord in his nature which responds. He adopts the children.

Washington, D. C.—Fifteen years later. A reception is given by Colonel Webb and his officers to the Colonel's wards, who have graduated from the government school. They are back with Colonel Webb. Lorna is a beautiful Indian girl, as graceful as a fawn. Young Beverly Graham has fallen madly in love with this dark-skinned princess, and has asked permission of the Colonel to propose for her hand. Their courtship is interrupted by the arrival of a messenger from army headquarters with a message for the Colonel. It is an order for him to join his regiment and put down an uprising of the Sioux, led by no less a personage than "White Eagle." Lorna and Philip stand spellbound as they realize the purport of this message. They must accompany their adopted father while he goes to subdue, and perhaps destroy the people of their race, and Philip, who has enlisted, must fight against them. A few months later they are in the heart of the Indian country; the Sioux rebellion has become formidable. Colonel Webb decides to send for more troops, and in order to convince the General in command of the department, he bluntly states that his force is too weak to cope with the situation.

"The Call of the Blood."—Lorna steals a copy of this dispatch and Philip deserts. An Indian spy, captured a few days before, is released by Lorna, and instructed to join "White Eagle" and report the news of the fort's weakness. Beverly witnesses this act and is forced to arrest the woman he loves. She is brought before the Colonel. The defiant girl is locked up, escapes, and joins the band, and leads them herself to attack the weakened garrison. The Colonel's messenger gets back with help, however, and "White Eagle" is again defeated. The remnant of this war party, together with Lorna and Philip, are placed under guard and brought to the fort. Lorna pleads forgiveness from the Colonel, but he orders her into close confinement, awaiting trial for her defection. As Beverly steps forward to lead the misguided girl away, Philip, in a frenzy of hatred, jerks a revolver from the holster of a nearby officer, and turning, fires at Beverly. Lorna, has read his intention, however, and by a quick turn, shields the officer and receives the bullet in her own breast. "It was for the life I loved; the law of the white man would never have looked with favor on our union, Beverly. There where dwells the great White Spirit we will be equal; there you can claim me as your own and then you won't be ashamed of the Daughter of the Sioux. Good-bye; forgive Philip, he is my brother."

The bandits determine to capture him at his castle gates. Fiorella warns her lover, who, with his retainers, overpowers the brigands and brings them into the castle for trial.

The lord of the manor is about to sentence them all to death when the girl reveals her identity and pleads for her father and his associates. Then upon her obtaining their pardon, she has to decide whether she will desert her own parent to be married to her lover or whether she will give up the noble lord altogether and return with her father. She finally decides on the latter course of action, and the scene closes as she bids her lover farewell and leaves with her father and his band of brigands.

THE PARK OF CASERTA.—The small agricultural province of Caserta on the Mediterranean contains unquestionably the finest of all the many wonderful artificial parks of that land of beauty, Italy.

In no country is man so aided by nature when he attempts to outdo her works of art. There it seems man needs but to drop the seed and leave all care to the warm sun and balmy, moist breezes of that beautiful clime.

Sure it is that in this royal park, now for the first time shown to the world at large, man has been marvellously helped. For, though the sculptor and the landscape gardener have seemingly outdone themselves, it is the great wealth of foliage and blossom, with the depths of light and shadow thus made possible, which makes this park seem the most beautiful we have ever been privileged to visit.

Beautiful streams tumble in terraced cascades down the sides of picturesque hills, at the base of which they lose themselves in mirror-like lakes which are surrounded by wonderful groups of statuary.

It is utterly impossible to enumerate here the wealth of art treasures which fill every portion of the park not set aside exclusively for the marvellous flowers and shrubs. A film worth the time of the busiest men.

BATTLE IN THE CLOUDS.—Section 1.—Preparation. The Aero camp—Loading supplies—Start of the airships—The inventor of the airship destroyer—His love story—The parting—The alarm—The aero fleet in full flight—The aerial torpedo and its inventor.

Section 3.—Defense. The inventor with the assistance of his sweetheart sends his airship destroyer on its mission of vengeance. The torpedo, steered through the air by wireless telegraphy—One flash and the airship is doomed—It falls, a mass of scorching fire, into the waters of a lake.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE POWER OF THE PRESS.—Bill Mawson, the Mayor of a small Western town, runs things for his own profit and with a high hand. He has had one enemy in "The Trumpet," a local paper, and has succeeded in driving the editor out of town. As he is leaning up against the bar of the only hotel in town, listening to the fawning of his toadies, John Marsden, the new editor, arrives and Mawson attempts to make friends and show the new editor that if he will be his tool he will be well rewarded. Marsden refuses and enters upon his duties and begins to denounce the Mayor and expose the bribery and corruption in every issue of the paper. Mawson is furious and starts a conspiracy to run the editor out of town or get him lynched. The Mayor's niece overhears the plot, and as she is indebted to Marsden for shielding her from the insults of some hoodlums, she slips away to the editor's office to warn him and urges him to fly for safety. Marsden disdains to fly and Nettie rides to the police headquarters to get assistance.

Meanwhile Marsden places a revolver handy and goes about his work as usual. He hears footsteps and looks up. Before him stand several masked men, who order him to come with them. He draws a revolver and threatens to shoot the first man that advances, but they rush on him and he is overpowered, but not before he has pulled the mask from the face of one of the men and recognized Bill Mawson, the Mayor. Marsden is bound and dragged out and marched to the outskirts of the town, where a tree and a coil of rope suggest what will happen to him if he does not desist from his attacks upon the political grafters. The question is put to him—"His silence or his life?" He refuses and the rope is put around his neck. Just as the end of the rope is being thrown over the limb of the tree, Nettie dashes up with the marshal and a posse of police. Nettie jumps from her horse and unbinds Marsden, who takes her in his arms and graciously intervenes for the release of the discomfited Bill Mawson, who extends his hand and promises to mend his ways.

CUPID AND THE MOTOR BOAT.—A Summer idyll. This fascinating sketch of love and bravery shows that vitagraph producers can give the touch of realism while depicting the stronger passions without presenting anything that is morbid or suggestive.

An old fisherman and his pretty daughter are shown gathering up their nets, which they place in a boat, and row out to sea to set the nets.

While they are gone a handsome motor yacht arrives at the dock and the yachtsman throws a line to a tough-looking sailor who is loitering around. The owner of the yacht steps ashore and greets the sailor, who accepts a tip and casts envious glances at the well-groomed yachtsman. The sailor is allowed to look through a pair of field glasses which the yachtsman carries.

Meanwhile the fisherman and his daughter have set their nets and returned to the dock, where the old man is helped out of his boat by the yachtsman, who also assists the girl, and mutual glances of admiration are exchanged. The fisherman admires the trim-looking yacht, and both are invited on board, where the engineer explains the motor to the old man while his daughter is allowed to handle the steering wheel as a short trip is made around the bay. The girl is so delighted with the view obtained from the binoculars that she is asked to keep them, but modestly declines.

The trip over, the girl and her father bid goodbye and return to their cottage. She is accosted by the sailor, who is evidently in love, but he is dismissed.

The yachtsman wishes to renew the acquaintance, so he wraps up the binoculars and sends them by a boy to the fisher lassie with the following note:

"Will you kindly accept this gift from the skipper of the Runaway. I hope to see you again. Your sincere admirer."

The girl shows the note to her father and asks him if she should accept the gift, and he consents, seeing that it will give her pleasure. The sailor has followed to renew his love-making, and seeing the binoculars, upbraids the girl for receiving presents from a stranger. She orders him off the premises and he leaves, vowing vengeance.

Days passed by and frequent meetings, but the yachtsman could not persuade the simple fisher maiden that her lowly position should not prevent her from becoming his wife. The jealous sailor was aware of this and determined to get the skipper out of the way. He invites him to try his hand at managing a sailboat, and, while the yachtsman's back is turned, pitches him overboard and leaves him struggling in the water. The girl who has been watching through the binoculars, sees this, and, rushing to the dock, tells the engineer of the motor boat to go to the rescue. He explains that he cannot manage the engine and steer at the same time. "You to the engine; I'll take the wheel!" she cries, and off they dash to reach the exhausted man just in time. The girl jumps in and holds him up, while the engineer lowers the steps.

Now that his life is hers, the yachtsman has no trouble in winning his suit, and a Summer idyll comes to a close by the old fisherman giving his consent to the union and overjoyed at his good fortune.

THE LIFE OF MOSES.—Biblical film de luxe, produced under the personal supervision of the Rev. Madison C. Peters.

Scene 1.—The first reel of this series ended with the child Moses being adopted by Pharaoh's daughter. The Hebrews are still under bondage, and we see them laboring in the brick fields, beaten by the taskmasters, as they build those gigantic specimens of Egyptian architecture, many of which stand to this day. Moses has been reared and educated in the Egyptian court, and is now in the prime of life, but he does not forget that he is of Hebrew blood, and, as he watches his brethren in their slavery, his blood boils at the outrages and he looks toward Heaven and cries, "How long, oh Lord, how long?"

Scene 2.—A number of Hebrews are digging clay, which is filled into baskets. The load is too heavy for one of the laborers, and the taskmaster beats him unmercifully. Moses sees this and kills the taskmaster.

Scene 3.—The other Hebrew slaves, horrified at the enormity of the act, run away, and Moses, afraid of the consequences, hastily buries the body in the clay pit.

Scene 4.—Two days after this, Moses seeks to separate two of his brethern who are quarreling, and one of them says: "Wilt thou kill me as thou didst the Egyptian?" Moses is terrified when he knows that his crime is known, and decides to flee from the country.

Scene 5.—He seeks refuge in the home of a Hebrew laborer and Scene 6.—Bargains for a suit of the laborer's garments, with which he disguises himself; he also purchases provisions and a water bottle, and departs.

Scene 7.—Moses is seen crossing the desert. Tired and dusty, he rests and drinks from his water flask.

Scene 8.—Still toiling on through the arid desert, he reaches an eminence and looks back to see if he is being followed, and, seeing no one, he gives thanks for his deliverance.

Scene 9.—Moses has at last reached the land of Midian. He discovers a well and refreshes and rests himself. While he is resting seven daughters of Jethro, a Midianite, come to the well to draw water for their sheep and cattle. Other herdsmen also come to the well and ungallantly drive away the maidens, but Moses comes to their aid, and draws the water for them.

Scene 10.—The home of Jethro, the priest of Midian, father of the seven maidens. They enter and tell of the encounter at the well, and how they were aided by a Hebrew traveler. He says the man must be his guest, and—

Scene 11.—Hasteus to the well and greets Moses and invites him to the shelter of his house, which offer is accepted.

Scene 12.—Moses enters the home of the priest of Midian, where he is effusively greeted by the whole household, and—

Scene 13.—We see him seated and enjoying a meal with the family. ("And Moses was content to dwell with the man . . . and he gave Moses his daughter, Zipporah, to wife.")

Scene 14 (Forty years later).—Moses is now a shepherd, and, while tending his flocks in the land of Midian—

Scene 15.—The voice of God speaks to him out of a burning bush and commands him to return to Egypt and deliver his brethren out of the bondage of the Egyptians.

Scene 16.—Moses bids farewell to Jethro, his father-in-law, and, with his family, journeys to Egypt. On the way he meets Aaron, who had been commanded by the Lord to meet Moses, and together they arrive at the Egyptian court.

Scene 17.—The court of Pharaoh, a young man, the elder Pharaoh having died while Moses was in Midian. The officials announce the new arrivals, and Moses and Aaron are ushered in and demand, in the name of the Lord, that the Children of Israel be set free. The Egyptian King refuses, and Moses tells him that if he does not consent the wrath of God will come on all the Egyptians.

RICHELIEU; Or, The Conspiracy.—Adapted from Edwin Booth's version of this dramatic period of French history, as recorded by E. Lytton Bulwer. In the magnificent reception room of the chief executive of the French capital, Baradas and a number of conspirators are seen plotting. Julie, the beautiful ward of Cardinal Richelieu, enters, and Baradas attempts to show his regard for her. Chevalier DeMauprat also enters and greets Julie, and the two men exchange jealous glances. The Cardinal is announced and all fall back while he affectionately greets Julie. The plotters show their hate of the Cardinal behind his back, but quail under his searching glances. The Cardinal passes on, and DeMauprat is seen to make love to Julie. This is discovered by the Cardinal, who has DeMauprat seized and accuses him of conspiracy, and, while pretending to send him to his doom, in reality ushers him into the room where Julie is waiting, and gives his consent to the marriage, thereby winning DeMauprat's devotion.

Shortly after the wedding Julie is separated from her husband and imprisoned in the palace of King Louis XIII. on the pretext that the marriage had been without his consent. In reality the King is infatuated with Julie, and he is aided in the abduction by the jealous Baradas, who informs DeMauprat that it is Richelieu that is responsible for the loss of his bride. DeMauprat swears to kill Richelieu, and that is just what the arch-traitor and conspirator Baradas desires.

Julie, a prisoner in the royal palace, is terrified as the King enters and makes love to her, but the Queen enters and the King, repulsed slinks away. The Queen aids Julie to escape and she reaches the Cardinal's apartments at midnight and tells him what has occurred. He secretes her in an inner room, and knocks are heard at the door. Opening the door he confronts DeMauprat, who is masked, and who calmly informs the Cardinal that he has come to kill him. The Cardinal defies him and dares him to reveal his identity. DeMauprat unmasks. Richelieu orders him to his knees to ask pardon, as he calls Julie from the adjoining room, who flies to the arms of her husband. De Mauprat, seeing that he has been deceived by Baradas, determines to save the life of the Cardinal, and draws his sword to defend him from the other masked conspirators who are clamoring for entrance. Richelieu suggests a ruse, and, sending Julie out of the room, lies down on the bed and feigns death, while DeMauprat admits the conspirators, and, pointing to the outstretched form, explains that he strangled the Cardinal.

Baradas and DeMauprat meet and fight. De Mauprat is arrested by order of the King. Consternation reigns as the supposed dead Cardinal appears and denounces Baradas to the King. Baradas whispers something in the King's ear, and he orders DeMauprat a prisoner and sends a letter to Julie demanding her presence at court. The King's messenger is defied by Richelieu.

The final scene of this dramatic series of events shows the King on his throne, surrounded by Baradas and other courtiers, who are really aspiring to dethrone the King. Julie enters and pleads for the life of her husband. The King refuses and says that DeMauprat must die. Here the Cardinal totters in, seemingly very weak, hands a paper to a page, which is given to the King to read. Louis starts, as it unmasks Baradas as the arch conspirator who had been in secret connivance with the King's enemies. Louis orders the arrest of Baradas and the Cardinal, throwing off his simulated weakness, triumphs over all his enemies. DeMauprat is released and he and Julie embrace and kneel to the King and to the great Cardinal, who blesses them.

THE RED CROSS HEROINE.—"All is fair in love and war" it would seem that this maxim is the foundation of this New York Motion Picture Company production. Two chums are seated, chatting, when Joe goes into the house. While he is absent, Mae, his sweetheart, enters, but is informed by Jim that Joe is not around. She accepts his escort home. Jim returns and he and Joe resume their conversation, which, however, is interrupted by a note from Mae. When Joe discovers that Jim deceived him, they argue and part had friends. Mae comes to assure Joe of her love, when he is summoned to war. Joe is next seen in uniform at a tent. In the lieutenant he recognizes his former chum Jim, who will not acknowledge an acquaintance with Joe. The day's commanding officer is Jim. The mail bag is brought to him and he sees among the letters one for Joe, written by Mae. This he opens and finds she has become a Red Cross nurse. His hatred of Joe increases tenfold, and he orders that Joe come before him. Jim demands that he do the cleaning of the tent. While Joe is performing this duty, Jim succeeds in putting some government papers in Joe's coat pocket. Joe finishes and departs. The commanding officer returns and asks for papers, which cannot be found. Jim reports that Joe was in the tent. He is called in, searched, and when the papers are found, arrested. Shortly after Jim is wounded in a skirmish, and he is fortunate enough to be nursed by Mae. He is lying on a cot, when word is brought that Joe is to be shot at sunset. His dying deed is to write a confession, which Mae takes, and mounting a soldier's horse, rides to save her sweetheart. Joe is standing blindfolded, with all guns aimed at him, when Mae enters with papers, which the commanding officer reads, and releases Joe. Mae and he then fondly embrace.

THE DECEIVER.

Annie Welsile, a charming society girl, and her maiden aunt Julia are stopping at a Winter resort in Florida, where they meet Jack Barton and Bill Lamson, who are pals. Both are gamblers, but honest, big-hearted and true.

Jack is a handsome, dashing fellow, very manly, somewhat rough, but one of nature's noblemen. Annie falls in love with Jack, but conceals the fact from her aunt, who is a great stickler for propriety, and Bill falls desperately in love with Aunt Julia.

Lewis Waldron, who is also in love with Annie, tries to poison her mind again Jack, telling her that he is a gambler. Annie refuses to believe this; she defends Jack and dismisses Waldron, telling him she never wishes to see him again.

Jack appears, offers Waldron his hand, which is refused. Waldron leaves vowing vengeance. Jack declares his love for Annie, and in spite of her aunt's objections, is accepted.

Bill, his pal, taking courage from Jack's success, tries his hand at love-making, but is a dismal failure; however, he does not despair, and concludes to try again.

Seven years elapse. We find Jack and Annie happily married and living on a ranch in Colorado. A little daughter (Irma) has been born to them, who is the pride of Jack's heart.

Aunt Julia visits them, and Bill, who has been a true pal to Jack, sharing his fortune in the West, again meets her and renews his love-making in his earnest and ridiculous fashion, and this time with more success, as Aunt Julia accepts him on condition that he renounce gambling, which he does.

Waldron, under the guise of a friend and brother, has also followed them West. Jack has implicit confidence and trust in his false friend, and being called away to Texas on business, leaves his wife and baby under Waldron's protection. After an affecting scene, Jack takes his departure, but in his grief leaves his traveling bag behind.

No sooner has Jack gone than Waldron proceeds to poison Annie's mind against Jack, telling her that there is another woman, and Jack has gone to Texas to open a gambling house. He convinces her of this by false proofs.

In her desperation she decides to leave him and return with her aunt and Waldron, whom she regards only as a brother.

During this scene Jack returns for his bag, he overhears the conversation and learns of Waldron's treachery. As they are about to depart, Jack intercepts them. Here follows a thrilling scene in which Jack attempts to kill Waldron. Annie stops him and pleads for Waldron's life. Jack permits Waldron to go unharmed, but tells Annie they can no longer live together. At this point Irma, their little daughter, in her baby way tries to reconcile them. Jack demands that the child choose between mother and father. The child attempts to join their hands. The father relents and decides to go away and leave the child with its mother, giving Annie, his wife, the house and all it contains.

While he is in another part of the house looking for the deeds, Waldron returns to take Annie away. She sees her error and tells him to leave the house. He atempts to embrace her, when she picks up the revolver Jack has left on the table. She levels it at him and commands him to go. He does so.

Jack in the meantime has returned and witnessed this scene, unseen by them. He goes to Annie, who is sobbing, and he begs her forgiveness. As he takes her lovingly to his arms, Irma kneels before them in attitude of prayer.

THE OUTCAST'S CHRISTMAS.—Cast out by society and moved on from place to place by the police, a young tramp is seen coming along the road weary and tired, and pursued by merciless guardians of the law. Not even on Christmas Eve they leave him alone, and he cannot understand the reason why he should be hunted across the country. Reaching the farmyard of a well-to-do farmer, he looks through the ice covered window, and the sight of the happiness inside brings tears to his eyes. Tied onto the door of the house is a weary old horse of the country postman, and he compares his position with that of the horse and cannot find much difference. Inside is peace and happiness, outside is hunger and cold and he pulls his last crust of bread out of his pocket and shares it with the horse. He then creeps into the stable to rest himself in the hay, but he has hardly entered as the door opens again. He starts back frightened, but it is only the farmer's little girl, who prompted by childish pity brings the old horse out of the cold into the warm stable. Also the little girl gets frightened, but she soon overcomes her fright and innocently asks the tramp why he does not come inside. When the tramp sadly shakes his head she asks him if he is hungry and if he wants something. Now his face brightens, and she asks him to take good care of her new dolly, while she runs into the house to fetch some food. She soon returns, and quite astonished she watches the man who quickly swallows all the food she has brought him. Suddenly he springs up exclaiming: "The police!" and is ready to run away. She asks him to stay, but as he explains that he cannot, she does her very best for him and hands him her little doll as a present. Deeply moved the tramp presses a kiss on the forehead of the little innocent, and without another word runs out in the cold, dark night. Quietly the child goes back again to the house and falls crying into the arms of her mother, having had the first glimmer of a cold, cruel world.

"ME" AND SANTA

Wish you a dickens of a Merry Christmas and an oh-be-joyful New Year.

We pledge ourselves never to charge you "ten per cent." for changing your stocking from the left side to the right side of the chimney-place; never to charge you two dollars a week for the right to use and play with toys which you have already bought outright; never to enter into any agreement the object of which is to get the moving picture exhibitor into a corner and squeeze and squeeze and squeeze him. The Laemmle Film Service now has more customers than ever in its career. Those customers are happier than they ever were under the old conditions imposed by the ten per centers. They are bubbling over with enthusiasm because of the astounding improvement in Independent pictures and they look forward to the best year's business they ever enjoyed. Some of them thought they were assuming big risks when they became Independent, but now they find they jumped into the surest money-making proposition in the moving picture business. Send for my latest list of films, scratch off the ones you've had, return the list to me and get my gilt edge offer by return mail. Don't be a victim of the compound ten per cent. conspiracy a minute longer!

Our New Year's Resolutions

TO

give the exhibitors dealing with us the very best Independent pictures that money can buy.

TO

buy the entire output of both European and American Independent manufacturers thereby assuring an unequalled variety of subjects.

TO

give each and every exhibitor, dealing with us, just exactly what we promise at a fairly legitimate price.

TO

guarantee absolutely against repeaters and to give everybody a square honest deal. What more can anybody ask for?

To the moving picture trade in general we extend our best wishes for a Merry Christmas and a Happy and Prosperous New Year.

KALEM FILMS

Issue of December 31, 1909

A SLAVE TO DRINK

LENGTH 950 FEET (Approx.)

A SLAVE TO DRINK

is the first of the new Florida series, done by the KALEM COMPANY'S STOCK COMPANY, in all the wealth of tropical scenery and environment that characterized the Kalem Southern pictures of a year ago.

A Slave to Drink is unquestionably the greatest temperance lecture ever told in films. Lest you forget:

We again call your attention to our regular release for Dec. 24, i. e. the first of the new Kalem Series of Fairy Stories for Children, entitled:

THE CARDBOARD BABY

The way in which our orders for this subject have jumped has convinced us that the idea is making a great hit with M. P. Theatre Managers, and we are pleased to announce that we will shortly bring out another film along the same line, entitled:

COMING JAN. 7, 1910

THE DEACON'S DAUGHTER

Kalem posters can be obtained from your exchange or by mail from the A. B. C. Co., of Cleveland, O.

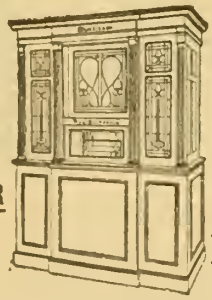
55 YEARS LEADERS IN MUSIC

BETTER MUSIC AT SMALLER COST



FOR ALL MOVING PICTURE THEATRES

Have you investigated the Wurlitzer PianOrchestra?

The leading Nickelodeons are putting in this marvelous Automatic Orchestra. It furnishes better music than a regular orchestra of 5 to 25 pieces, is always "on the job," and cuts out the enormous expense of musicians. The money saved pays rent.

Easy terms, less than paid to musicians. We supply the U. S. Gov't. with musical instruments. Write for big 96-page catalog & testimonial booklet showing Wurlitzer PianOrchestras in leading Nickelodeons.

WHY—The Motiograph is the Best Motion Picture Machine

Because the Pictures are More Brilliant. The special patented Shutter is so arranged that it saves a lot of illumination otherwise lost.
Because Flicker is eliminated by the new patented Shutter.
Because the Pictures are Rock Steady when using a good film, and are restful to the eyes of your patrons. The result is because of accurate workmanship and excellence of design.
Because it has patented quick Rewind (one and one-half minutes) connected to main crank handle. No other similar.
Because it has the only perfect Fire-proof Shutter, automatic and absolutely reliable.
Because it has Enclosed Spiral Gears. They work smooth and wear longer.
Because it has a Perfect Take Up. Easy on the film and always reliable.
Because it has inclosed Framing Device. Wears longer, is quickly removed and patented.
Because it has "Wide Open" Lamp House, convenient for changing carbons, adjustment, etc.
Because it is absolutely Fireproof.
Because it has Double the Wearing Qualities possessed by other Machines.
Because it is almost Noiseless; runs more quiet than any other.
Because it has Heavy Pedestal Base, adjustable and patented.
Because it has more than 40 other points of special merit. Boston, New York, Chicago and San Francisco approved.

SEE WHAT USERS SAY:

ON MARCH 28TH, F. L. F., CHICAGO, ILL., SAYS:
"I purchased my Motiograph Machine latter part of August, and have not spent one penny for repairs since. To say that I am pleased can hardly express it."
D. F. E., DENVER, COLO., FEBRUARY 1ST, SAYS:
"I have not sold a Motiograph to anyone who is not delighted with it."
O. T., GREAT FALLS, MONT., JUNE 7TH, SAYS:
"It's running fine, and we get the picture and the 'Biz.' We cannot say enough for the Stereo Motiograph. A snap for any operator."
M. F. F., OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., MAY 18TH, SAYS:
"The Motiograph is the talk of the town."
E. T. S. CO., PHILADELPHIA, PA., JUNE 2ND, SAYS:
"Machine at the Grand Opera House is a dandy, and is daily making Motiograph converts."
P. & K., ST. ANTHONY, IDAHO, APRIL 16TH, SAYS:
"The Motiograph projects the best picture in the country. We show a much better picture than our competitors."

Your satisfaction comes first--or ours not at all

We are not satisfied unless we give our customers more both in Quality and in Service than they can get elsewhere. Otherwise this would be an ordinary Film Exchange.

The results is the established confidence—both in our Film Service and in ourselves—of an unusually large number of very particular exhibitors.

It is only by giving the best of ourselves as to both Quality and Service that we achieve the customer's own idea of satisfaction in a Film Service.

Just now we are proving the sterling merits of Premier Film Service to over a hundred accounts.

Can we add your account.

FILMS

RELEASED DECEMBER 27, 1909

THE NEW CHIEF

The new superintendent of the house of refuge has heard of many abuses and determines to make a personal investigation. Word is passed along the line and the subordinates prepare for a visitation. A tramp who just applies for lodging, is taken for the new chief and treated accordingly, while the new chief gets all intended for the tramp. A screaming comedy. Length, 495 feet.

THE PERSISTENT POET

Notwithstanding the many disappointments coming his way, the poet reads his works to unwilling victims until he falls into the hands of the police, but not even this stops his ardor. A good comedy with plenty of action. Length, 525 feet.

RELEASED DECEMBER 30, 1909

THREE FINGERED JACK

Three-fingered Jack, a habitue of the slums, falls in love with a lassie of the Salvation Army; incidentally she discovers that Jack was a thief. She saves him from jail and saves his soul. A play of heart interest. Length, 940 feet.
